6) Original: non penitenckurn; Löscher: non poenitencknni. Because we have not been able to make sense of these words, nor can the old translation: "so that I do not forget the important article of free will and faith," satisfy, we have assumed praotornnittonäurn. For Eck did not have this in his first series of theses of Dec. 29, 1518, but inserted the thesis of free will and faith as the seventh in the series of theses before which our writing is placed.

of Saxony, my most gracious lord, and the joint council of the noble University of Leipzig and the theological faculty had admitted our disputation (since that spirit of Luther refrained from giving them the heart to reject this deal), 1) so in my letter I also challenged Luther as the one who is the first in this matter (principalem), that he would either defend his own or reject ours. I have also indicated this to the theological faculty at Leipzig. But, 2) that Luther tries to secretly lead Andreas Bodenstein away from the battlefield, 3) I will not suffer that, since he is so brave in writing invective and sang the victory song long before the victory. He refused to go to Rome, to Paris or Cologne, claiming the costs and the long journey. And since I followed him to the door of his fatherland, did he want to refuse the fight and retreat to the fortifications? That would be the behavior of a degenerate and cowardly soldier! But if he had now become more learned and made a recantation of his errors by following the Roman church, then I wanted to kiss the man warmly as a friend and almost as my other self. However, I have laid the axe to the root, since I have put forward six theses against D. Bodenstein and sent the seventh in writing, in which I believe I have summarized the entire essence of our letter. Therefore, I have not touched on this as an incidental matter, nor have I been deceitful, but have held these theses against Bodenstein in theological simplicity. However, I did not impose them on you, Luther, nor did I falsely impose them on you, 4) rather, I could point out to you with my finger where you have brought forward these monstrosities. Would God that I had not found them in you.

But that he further accuses me of the vainest honor, that I published the disputation note before I was sure of the consent of the gentlemen at Leipzig: that I admit; and what blame can this lay upon me? Yes, he says: "After you had learned from me that they reject it altogether." 5) Of course, this is a twisted lie. My note was printed in Augsburg before the month of January, while I was traveling from there to my fatherland. The letter Luther's letter, which I have in my possession, is dated Leipzig, January 7; I received it on February 8. Behold, Reverend Fathers, that my disputation note was printed sooner than Luther wrote the letter to me. I am silent about the fact that the letter was delivered to me somewhat slowly because of the long distance between the places. I believe that you now understand what is meant by the "wretchedly clever tricks", the "images formed from nothing", the "subtle cunning" and the "sleepy cleverness" 6).

By the way, that he jokes and mocks at me, that I bear and suffer; far be it from me that I boast; if I have disputed as a young man at some universities of Germany or Italy, then I have done this to exercise my intellect. May I still be a sophistical quibbler for Luther and Bodenstein, a bad theologian, a sophist, an arch-aristotelian, a scholastic, 7) a disputator, may I know nothing, they may know everything; I know that I have little stock (quod mihi sit curta supellex). I may be a flea, the other 9) a Goliath, the other a Hercules; they may be my unfortunate teachers according to their opinion, which I consider happy, they may strive to dishonor me in every respect, I will suffer if they only let me be a believer and a Christian. If I have done all that the LORD has commanded me, I know that I am a useless servant; how much more am I, since I realize that I have not done it, quite useless. But all that I have received through God's gift, I will gladly do to protect the truth of the faith and the Catholic Church, and, as much as God gives me, I will fight against errors and eradicate them. For Gregory says that no invectives need induce us to deviate from the right way and from the certain rule. However, Luther pretends that my friendship toward him is a feigned one. I confess that I made friendship with him because of the sciences and studies, since I had not yet seen him (as I am wont to do with learned people), but only because he was recommended to me by our common friend, the highly learned Christoph Scheurl, 10) a very honest jurist. But believes of this university, with due modesty, so that the truth may be preserved, not ruined. It pleases me, however, that all of this should be marked by reliable notaries in the manner of Augustine and Jerome, and should be fully known to the city [of Rome] and to the whole world. This I have wished to indicate to you, most worthy patrons, and through you to the whole Christian world, since you hold sacred truth very high, and venerate the head of the Church, Christ's governor, the pope, and pray unceasingly with your brethren for the welfare of the Church and the See of Peter. And this cause of truth, for Christ and Peter, be at ease with me. Fare well, God-loving prelates. From Ingolstadt in Bavaria, March 14, in the year after the birth of the Virgin 1519.

Can I be a friend of the one who is fighting against the unity of the Church? St. Jerome says that he was eager for the enemies of the Church to become his enemies as well. I love man; I hate error with Augustine. Does that mean to cherish something monstrous (monstrum alere), if one protects the truth and the pope and seeks one's neighbor's return from error? For I have seen and read with great sorrow the presumptuous writing of his actions at the Legate of the Apostolic See 1) and the Appeal to a future Concilium, and have taken out some sentences not without sighing. I would have expected that under the black robe there would be more sobriety and patience. Would that God had followed, or was still following, the modesty taught by the martyr St. Cyprian [in the letters] to Rogatianus and Cornelius, who testifies to Pupianus that heresies arose from contempt of the clergy. And in another place he says: "These are the beginnings of heretics and the origin and effort of evil-thinking schismatics, that they please themselves, that they despise the superior with proud pomposity. Thus one departs from the church, thus an unholy altar is erected outside, thus one stirs up sedition against the peace of Christ and the order and unity of God. For not from anywhere else (he says to Pope Cornelius) have heresies arisen or divisions arisen other than by disobeying the priest of God. How well Luther would be advised to accept what St. Bernard advised the Pisans with regard to Pope Honorius: Honor your father and the father of the whole world (universitatis). But Luther sets the old ashes on fire again, and brings forth the new weeds of the old harvest, 2) to use the words of Ambrose. The Almighty God, who took it upon Himself to remain with the Church until the end of the world, enlighten the hearts of the faithful and give us His peace. By the way, as I have offered myself, I will argue against both of them for the truth of the faith and for the protection of the apostolic see, with Christ's help; not in a worldly house and in corners, but in the school of Leipzig, which is in the highest bloom, before the highly learned fathers.

After this letter follow in the original the "thirteen theses of Eck against Luther and Carlstadt", which we have already communicated, likewise newly translated from the original, in the 18th volume of our edition, Col. 712.

363 "Brother Martin Luther's Disputation and Apology against the Accusations of D. Johann Eck," as Luther's response to the previous writing. May 16, 1519.

In the 18th volume of our edition, Col. 718, we have already described the original and the individual editions of "Luther's Thirteen Theses against Eck", to which our writing forms the preface, and also indicated the location in the collections. The time given above results from the fact that Luther sent a copy of our writing to Johann Lang on this day. We translate according to the Weimar edition, Vol. II, p. 158.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Brother Martin Luther wishes the worthy reader salvation!

My corner is angry, dear reader, and he has consecrated to the apostolic chair another disputation note, which is full of his anger and accusations against me, and he has added to the previous theses One that is very angry, that is, if I did not fear that there would be an obstacle to the future disputation, a fine opportunity to respond to his vituperations once and for all. But everything has its time. That may now be enough.

That he accuses me of being an enemy of the Church by citing the sayings of some holy father 1), understand it this way, dear reader: by "Church" he means his opinions and those of his "heroes who have labored in the cause of indulgences". For he is an ordainer (consecrator) of the apostolic see, and speaks after the manner of his supposed heroes, who use the words of Scripture and the Fathers, like Auaxagoras 2) the elements, so that, having consecrated the same to the apostolic see, the words, immediately transformed (trans- substantiata) at their pleasure, (wonderful to say) from anything to anything popular, are also apt to signify what they either dream in a fever or deliriously put forward in the incapacity of feminine spitefulness; nay, their knowledge is of so little use to them, that even what they have learned that is good, they never rightly understand, and as the apostle says [1 Tim. 1, 7], they do not understand what they say or what they put, that is, they have not learned to put the predicate together with the subject, nor the subject with the predicate, in a categorical sentence. We hope that in the future disputation he will present us with other testimonies with equal skill, so that there will be no lack of them, so that the children may also laugh. I had hoped that Eck would have learned from the letter of Erasmus, 3) the master in the sciences, then from the insurmountable "Vertheidigung D. Carlstadt" 4) the limitations of his head; but Eck's patience overcomes everything; it is enough when he displeases everyone else that he pleases only himself and his heroes.

But that he puts the ungodly vice on me, that I am a heretic and a Bohemian, by saying, "I set the old ashes on fire again," 2c., he does according to his modesty or according to his office of consecration, through which [Consecrate] everything he consecrates, using no anointing oil other than the poison of his tongue.

But you (so that I do not acknowledge this evil name [which he gives me]) should know, my dear reader, that I do not despise the venerable agreement of so many believers in Italy, Germany, France, Spain, England and other countries for the sake of the sole rule (monarchia) of the Roman pope. I ask only one thing of the Lord, that he never let me speak or say (sentire) anything that would please the corner as it is now, so that I do not make a mockery of Christ, the Son of God, because of my free will, and deny him for the sake of the Roman Church, that Christ lives and reigns in India and in the Orient, or, so that I also speak something in riddles for this fine riddle-maker, so that I do not open the Constantinopolitan 5) Cloaca anew with Eck and, because of the old murderous deeds of Africa, cause new martyrdom of the church. So that you are not hurt by the annoyance of his poisonous rhetoric, you should know, dear reader, that among the articles of John Hell some also include this one, that he said that the papal supremacy of the Roman bishop comes from the emperor, which Platina also writes clearly. But I have stated that this supremacy is not proved by imperial, but by papal decrees. Thus the Lateran Church 6) in Rome itself sings about the circumference of its brow that it is at the same time by papal and imperial decree (dogmate) the mother of the churches 2c. The verses are known. 7) How now? It is

1) In Eck's original disputed note, each time the name of a holy father appears in the text, this name is fully expressed in the left margin.

5) In the Weimar: Constantinopolitanain, the other editions offer: Constantinopolitanain. The reading of the Weimarschen is correct. The opinion is: the Cloaca of the city of Constance, that is, the Concl there, which burned Hus 2c.

6) The oldest church in Rome and the episcopal church of the pope.

7) "Since the verses to which Luther refers form an important point in his rebuttal and are not likely to be as well known as they were in the Reformer's time, they may follow here. Oo^mate kapali äatur 6t simul Imperiali tzuoa kirm eunetatum Mater, Oapnt Heelesiarum. It is necessary that Eck himself is a Hussite and sets the ashes on fire again. Then, because she sings like this by order of the pope with the approval of the cardinals, the whole of Rome and the general church, it is not surprising if Eck is tired of the old ashes and, after his office of consecration, eagerly seeks to consecrate a new burnt offering to the apostolic see, and at once wants to turn the pope, the cardinals and even the Lateran church into new ashes. Thank God that at least one corner is left who is Catholic-minded, the loneliest persecutor of "standing alone", since all others are corrupted by the poison of Bohemia. But what is it to wonder that the sophists do not know such histories, since they do not understand even their categorical propositions? Of course, I have never dealt with this subject, nor have I thought of disputing it. But Eck, who has long been embittered against me by the most severe hatred, and knows that these propositions are detestable, has hoped, since he despaired of victory in other matters, to bring about indignation against me at least in this, since he has learned (how to speak) to strike the young lion before the lion's eyes, and to make a tragedy of hatred out of a disputation about truth.

But they may consecrate innocent as much as they want, they may consecrate their flatteries to the apostolic chair, they may consecrate to the bench and the stool, yes, they may also consecrate to the apostolic money box (since this belongs to the matter of indulgence and to the supremacy most of all), they may limp around the altar of their Baal, they may call out loudly (for he is a god, he poems, or has to create, or is about field, or perhaps sleeps) that he wakes up [1 Kings. 18, 26. f.]. It is enough for me that the apostolic see neither wants nor is able to do anything against Christ. In this matter I will also fear neither the pope nor the name of the pope, much less these Little feathers and little dolls. 1) I have only one thing in mind, that the robbery of my Christian name is not to the detriment of the completely pure teaching of Christ. For here I do not want anyone to expect "patience" from me, I do not want Eck to seek modesty, neither under the black nor under the white robe. Cursed be the glory of that godless laxity in which Ahab let Benhadad, the enemy of Israel, go [1 Kings 20:34]. For here I would like to be not only "a hero in biting" (which hurts the corner), but also unconquerable in devouring, so that I could devour the Silvesters and the Civesters and the Cajetans and the corner and the rest of the false brothers (fratros), who fight Christian grace, in one mouthful (to speak with Isaias [Cap. 9, 12.]). They may frighten another with their flatteries and consecrations; Martin despises the priests and consecrators of the apostolic see. The other in the disputation and after the disputation. But also D. Andreas Carlstadt, who is already a victor over Eck's error, will come, not as a fugitive soldier, but he will confidently receive this dead lion thrown down by him. But in the meantime we allow the wretched conscience to rejoice in the feigned hope of triumph and the vain boast of threats. Therefore, I also add to my theses a thirteenth one, which is opposed to the wrath of Eck. God will have to bring something good out of the disputation, which Eck stains with so much evil, with spitefulness and dishonor.

Farewell, dear reader.

364 D. Carlstadt's sharp letter to D. Eck, as a response to D. Eck's twofold challenge. April 26, 1519.

This letter forms the preface to "Carlstadt's 17 Theses against Eck for the Disputation at Leipzig," which we have included in our edition, Vol. XVIII, Col. 714. In Latin they have the title: Oonoln8101168 6arol8taäii kontra IOUNN61N I'kkiuw Hp8ius 27. Innii tiiknūa". This letter sammt den Thesen is found in Löscher, Res.-Acta, Vol. III, p. 284 Latin.

Translated into German.

1) In Latin, a play on words: xaxain- xaxpoa - PNPPU8.

immediately by imperial appointment I am given to be the mother of all, the head of the churches. Therefore, they have sanctified me with the name of the Savior, the Giver of the Kingdom of Heaven, since all things were accomplished. So we ask with all our heart with fervent petition: that this our house may be a famous seat to you, Christ).

To the excellent D. Johann Eck, the metaphysical theology advocate and Magistr noster, Andreas Carlstadt wishes salvation and a better mind in the Lord!

If I did not love, venerate and honor the most holy in Christ Father and Lord, Mr. Leo, by divine providence the tenth pope of that name, and the holy church of Christ, I, my unconquerable disputator, would not appreciate your somewhat coarse and boorish insolence of this answer. Therefore, I will answer only insofar as you know that I am, as I hope, an obedient member of the papal name, as well as of the body of the Lord, which was redeemed with the precious blood of Jesus.

2nd But you argue against it: that you also took the defense upon yourself, and therefore Cyprian's, Jerome's, Augustine's, Ambrose's and Gregory's proofs thundered as a terrible barking. But I see your grips and secret plots quite clearly. Against the Wittenbergers, you shoot your light arrows from afar, but in doing so, you also wound Christ's teaching and, under our name, pervert the holy Scriptures, tear them apart, yes, overthrow them, since in many ways you always seek to draw heavenly wisdom to your false conclusions and sayings of the pagans, so that the simple, who cannot examine learned things so carefully, are infected by your poison. For you lead the church scribes who are not so perceptive that they can see what is to be proved or not, and who think it is enough to gather testimonies from everywhere, but do not consider what probative force they have, or whether they are suitable to lift the scruples or to untie the knots of doubt, so that many can be caught.

Therefore, my reader, remembering the judgment seat of God and His judgment, do not fall to me or to the adversary, and do not look at the persons who dispute, but at the cause and testimonies, so that we may prepare ourselves. Yes, I want to have reminded you, my reader, that as I speak with fear and timidity before God, so also you should hear me, D. Eck does not lead the ecclesiastical writers honestly, and is not without gall, but lays ropes and traps among them. He draws on the testimonies of Cyprian, Augustine, and others, the deceitful hypocrite; but is the good also true? the true also good? Is it mostly in the right place? Rarely. Does he always present true things? No!

often not. Good things, but they are not suitable for the matter. With one ointment he wants to cure all eye pains on everyone. His cunning way is suspicious. For the propositions he proves are beyond doubt for both, since I as well as he base ourselves on them. But by such art he blinds the eyes of those who do not understand, and makes them think as if we disagreed on a matter quite known and undisputed. But there, where the main thing sits, everything is weak with him, and easily broken through. The fencer who is addicted to fame desires nothing more than to gain a little fame among the semi-scholars or unscholars, because he strives for fame in such a way that he is not ashamed to seize it by force and childish antics. In the case of those in Vienna, the bawler has miserably drawn the short straw; his heart is still weak and sore from the stabs with which his opponents pierced it; but he has hissed at the victors with a tongue that concealed the wounds. As soon as he picked himself up from the muck of the battle and left, he made up a praise and comforted himself with the victory he never received, and made the praise known to those who were many miles away from the battle. Various people who heard him throwing around metaphysical crickets in Vienna testify to this.

Now the fox can leave the skin, but not the species; for the loose scabies artist still itches, he is looking for someone on whom he can rub himself, whom he can harm and pin the disease on him; but one should, as it seems to me, not scratch this disease with healthy strength, but with juniper thorns. Nowhere in my writings, which I have published against this fox, will one find that I have ever fled the judgment of the Roman university or other scholars. And yet Eck treacherously takes the liberty of blaspheming me, as if I did not want to suffer the judgment of the church and were a rebel. I have submitted to the judgment of everyone who examines the church teachers a little more diligently and more closely; what the first page 2) of our defense shows; and yet the malicious chatterer must not be ashamed when he pretends that I have eluded the judgment of many. I do not deny that such unfruitful and vain bickering, which Paul also forbids, displeases me in a fair and natural way, because one does not seek the truth in such a fight, but each one only makes a noise and wants to gain signs of victory, that he also with painted

The bullet is victorious, be it rightly or wrongly. In the past, I also thought, like my little enemy (inimicu-lus), that it would be a disgrace for me to remain silent as a conquered man when the truth wins. But nowadays I think it is shameful and pernicious not to agree with the truth right away. The exceedingly impious woman Calphurnia, by an impudent complaint and disturbance of the authorities, brought it about that an order went out not to complain impudently to the praetor, but that honor and decency should be considered; but my impudent striker and his like screamers raise a feminine din and disturb everyone, and do not even respect the theologians' office, so that they do not consider any decency. I give way to wordy quibbles, however, with contempt and contradiction: But small negotiations, which fit the Scriptures, by which the fruitful truth is explored and finally the hidden understanding is brought to light, I gladly accept so, if it is written out. For if the matter is not 1) put on paper, the adversaries shamefully depart from one another. For the impudent are thereby put a bit in the mouth that they cannot lie so easily.

5 I am surprised that D. John has collected so many laws and canons because of his oath, by which for his side lumpinesses are highly exalted, with omission of the best ones, and has not opposed the collector, that the holy fathers have decreed that one should act important things in writing before judges, so that one does not give room to the wickedness of men. Secular and minor matters of bodily things are set forth in a written complaint, disputed with objections and counter-arguments, with double and triple objections and counter-arguments, yes, even further legal remedies, according to opportunity, driven and explained, so that, after the matter has been set forth completely from the bottom up, and the mystery of the matter has been removed, finally, by judicial pronouncement, the disputes are ended at once. But you, D. Johann, in a holy, spiritual and quite glorious matter, in which the salvation of souls is at stake, and which concerns the majesty of God, would very much like to have only arbitrators with ears, not also perceptive ones, or only those who see above and rush the matter, or who at least do not investigate anything properly; who, if they have not yet recognized the beginning properly, and what is doubtful has not yet been proven, nor has the dark been explained,

I know for certain that our matters will not stand up to the metaphysical bad theologians, because, even if they are Christians, they only hear with pagan ears and thus do not even let in anything but the divine wisdom in my name. I know for certain that our matters will not suit the metaphysical bad theologians, because they, even if they are Christians, only hear with pagan ears, and thus do not even let in anything but what they mix with their slobber. They may, however, pause with their judgment and wait until the end of our questions, lest pure and honest theologians complain that they had rather washed something away in a drunken sleep or in ignorance or out of hastiness than judged. The excellent teachers of Leipzig University, my superiors, whom I always seek to honor, I desire to be listeners to our struggle, but in such a way that the matter remains undirected until we look at the matter more closely and more deeply and bring the hidden meaning of Scripture to light. For we shall have to seek the examination of our struggle a little further, since I see that you have taught heretical things, namely those that are manifestly contrary to the holy Scriptures.

(6) But what was the use of going through and insulting me as a fugitive soldier before the whole world, and dressing up your lies so covertly? It is a disgrace that you so rudely engage in your antics and lie figuratively. But if I had been willing to evade the sophistical tapping and to remain within the walls, would I then have to be called a despondent and cowardly soldier? Is then one who stays within the walls and contemptuously looks at the enemy's noise, and also only rejects it by taking good care, a cowardly 2) and despondent soldier? A brave man does not make a big show of himself, conducts himself quietly and demurely, does not play any unrighteous and dishonorable game, does not boast about his things, but either overcomes the evil of war or tolerates it; on the other hand, it is the sign of the most timid mind to be frightened by threats and all shadows of a racket. But what is more despondent and cowardly than, when one has an entirely just cause, to pale before the words of a wretched windmaker and shouter? It is said in war: "Those who attack the enemy in a just cause fight with double might. Therefore I do not surrender to the enemy, neither do I brave my bow, but the arm of the Lord, who alone is a righteous man."

gives comfort to the heart. Since I have been so violently and strongly provoked, I will come and attack Goliath (that I may become all things to all men), and I will lay hard at the corrupter of the Scriptures. You may consider what difference there is between the armor of an invited guest and that of one who comes by himself.

At last the pointed head writes: he wants to argue for the Holy See after the manner of the wasps. But ask him, dear reader, how I have ever had, or could have had, anything against the apostolic chair? Where it is not called insulting the church, if one holds the commandment of the church in honor; or, where it is not called insulting the church, if one raises all the things that the church needs, if it wants to serve and sacrifice God holy; or, where it is not called insulting the church, if one investigates the purity of the scriptures and the church teachers' honesty or truth, fights about it and rightly condemns it. Eck is such a hero who has the church standing beside him and throws himself out to protect it; who pretends to defend it and yet shows no authority to do so. O wretched state of the church, which does not even have a protector who constantly stands on its cause! O a dangerous case of the lamb being helped by the wolf! This is the cunning protector who, under the sheepskin, deceives the sheep and seeks his own. O terrible insolence of man, who forces himself upon the quiet church for protection! Who has defended the church so far? And who will defend it when you are dead? What hardly any emperor of the world dares to do, the bold emperor of the theologians presumes to do.

My dear John, if you can persuade me that you can dispel error with the lighter of invective and the plaster of error, I believe you will destroy error. I, however, will venerate the Roman pope, to whom I am especially attached, and the holy church with words and deeds, and will eliminate what I can of the Eckish laundry; even though the mischievous man has gone over the top, and has made statements against me, of which he knows well that I do not doubt them. I, however, from my defense against D. Johann, have carried such here added conclusions to choose at will, which we both take in different ways. As judges, I desire neither friends who call injustice right, nor enemies who seek a knot in the rush. You, however, may diligently consult the church teachers - and be well. Given in Wittenberg, the third Easter holiday [April 26] 1519.

6. how Luther was urged by these and other circumstances to get involved with D. Eck, and both to answer Eck's writings by means of counter-writings, and to decide to engage in disputation with him.

Luther's letter to Spalatin, in which he discovered to him as a secret what he had put in his counter-theses to D. Eck for the future disputation for hidden nets. After February 24, 1519.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltische GefammtArchiv in Zerbst. Printed by Aurifaber, Vol. I, p. 165; by Löscher, Ref.-Acta, Vol. III, p. 972; by De Wette, Vol. I, p.261 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 3. We have taken the latter (after Kolde, Martin Luther, Vol. I, p.382 uck p.197), which is based on the fact that the letter that Carlstadt addressed to Spalatin (whose answer is mentioned at the beginning of our letter) is dated February 24. The other prints place our letter in May, Löscher even at the end of May. The next number belongs to the same time, is probably the "previous letter" mentioned here at the beginning, and may have been written on the same day as ours (but before it). Our translation is according to the Erlangen correspondence, which brings the original.

Newly translated from Latin.

To his beloved Georg Spalatin, canon of Altenburg, his best friend.

JEsus.

Hail! After I had closed the previous letter, dear Spalatin, D. Andreas [Carlstadt] sent me the letter you wrote to him, which is full of the same complaints, so that I too was almost moved to indignation. You insist that I reveal my plan to you. Not as if I did not want you to know what I have in mind, but [I do not like to reveal it] because I know that revealing the counsels is the same as nullifying the counsels, especially if they are from God, who suffers it only with the utmost impatience that His counsels be revealed before they are fulfilled, as He speaks through Isaiah: "Afterward you will know what He has in mind." Therefore, I will destroy this advice of mine, which is admittedly very dear to me, for your sake.

1) Rather Jeremiah [23:20].

will, so that you will not be tormented by restlessness.

You know that I have to deal with a deceitful, hopeful, mischievous, shouting sophist, then that he has only this in mind, that he pulls me through before the people and makes me a victim to the pope with all terrible imprecations. For you will recognize these completely ungodly wiles of his when you read his twelfth thesis. That is why I have also placed the twelfth counter-thesis 1) against these tricks of his, in order to fell him with his own tricks, in such a way that he will certainly be under the illusion that he has triumphed, and while he will sing a song of victory with joy, he will have to laugh at himself in front of everyone, if God wills it.

For I know that he will break in from the side by shouting and making gestures that I cannot prove it, nor that I have not kept the calculation of the years correctly (as you also think), because long four hundred years ago, yes, even a thousand years ago, the Roman Church issued decrees, especially Julius I, who was very close to the Concilium at Nicaea: that the Roman Church is higher than all, and that without it no Concilium may be proclaimed. For he relies on this for certain, and will also (I hope) laugh at my incredible foolishness and sacrilege.

4th Then I will say that those Decretals have never been accepted, but that if 2) Gregory IX, who is the first collector of the Decretals, who under Frederick the Second, after St. Franciscus, Dominicus, 3) also canonized our St. Elizabeth, 4) that is, who is not yet 400 years dead; if Bonifacius VIII, the author of the sixth! Book of the Decretals, if Clement V, the originator of the Clementines, 5) had not collected the Decretals in books, no doubt Germany would not know them either. Therefore, it is due to these three popes that the decrees of the Roman popes have been made known and the Roman tyranny fortified.

(5) But what has this to do with my thesis? I deny that the Roman church is higher than all churches, I do not deny that it (as it now rules) is higher than ours. For when will Eck prove that Constantinople or any church of Greece, when that those at Antioch, those at Alexandria, those in Africa, those in Egypt have been under the Roman or have received bishops confirmed by it? I will prove that the great Gregory I was confirmed by the Greek emperor Mauritius, and that Sylverius was deposed by the Patrician Belisar on the orders of the Greek empress, and many other things. Yes, are the Christians, who are still under the Turk, under the kings of the Persians, the Indians, the Scythians, subjected to Rome? Will Eck deny in such a way the present histories, which he cannot escape?

(6) If I had put the thesis that the Roman church has not been higher than all the churches until today, and that the history of the church has been against Eck until our days, I would have told the truth, but too clearly and without ambush. Now I have put a rope on him quite hidden, but it is now invalid because it has been revealed to you, which I fear GÖtze will not like.

I pass over the fact that the martyr Cyprianus called the churches of Africa to a council, always without first consulting the Roman pope, while he belonged to the Latin church and adhered to the Roman church. Some bishops of Africa did the same in Augustine's time. The extremely well attested writings of both bishops are available. Will Eck or the Roman pope be able to deny this?

5) "Bonifacius VIII publicirte 1298 den lider soxtus, Clement V 1313 die Clementinen." (Erl. Briefw.)

1) That both for Eck and for Luther the thesis about the primacy of the pope and the Roman church is called the twelfth, not the thirteenth, as in the second editions of the series of theses, also proves the correctness of our time determination. Compare the note, Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 712.

2) It seems to us that instead of 6tsi, which all editions offer, ut, si should be read, which the old translator already assumed.

3) Here qui seems too much to us in the original.

4) "Gregory IX had the five books of the Decretals collected by Raymundus de Pennaforte and published in 1234, canonized St. Franciscus in 1228, Dominicus in 1233, and Elizabeth in 1235." (Erlanger Briefw.)

8 Only we Germans, after we had received the Empire, fortified the Roman popes as much as we could. Therefore, as punishment, we have had to suffer them again, the torturers and tormentors with terrible curses and now the suckers of the palliæ and the bishoprics.

9 But that I have called the decrees "quite cold", I have done so for the sake of dragging the scriptural passages to this matter, which speak nothing of supremacy, but only of pasture and faith. 1) But allow, I beg of you, that we dispute, and do not belong to that class of men who, if they do not know the counsels of God (as it should be), immediately despair, because they do not see that it can be led out by their counsel, and allow it henceforth. In these same theses of mine are other ambushes, by which, if Christ gives grace, I will so ensnare man that no one shall be found who has blasphemed the pope more shamefully than that greatest flatterer of the pope, Eck. I do not want this matter to be conducted according to our advice, or I would rather abstain. Therefore, ask me no more, lest I reveal, that is, spoil, the whole thing; rather, pray that Christ may let us seek his glory. I count the papal power among the things that are means (neutrals), such as wealth, health and other temporal things. Therefore, it displeases me greatly that temporal things are drawn into such great controversy, and that one still seeks to assert them above all by the word of God (which always teaches that one should despise them). How can I accept this completely wrong interpretation of the

1) The meaning of this passage is undoubtedly this: the decrees twist the scriptural passages like Joh. 21,15. ff. to the effect that Peter is supposed to have the supremacy, while it only speaks of the feeding [with the word and of faith]. This passage, because io^uentks was not referred to scripturas, has been misunderstood several times, not only by the old translator, but even by the Erlangen correspondence. There we read: "Lücke in Schwarz, theol. Jahrb., Augustheft 1826, suggests to read here instead of pastu: justltiu. But apart from the fact that the original has pastu, this expression, taken in the bad sense (cf. also No. 135, line 33), is quite correct as a contrast to cte uaouar "Uiu. That, by the way, the xastu was already used earlier, is shown by the reading of the 60ä. Isn.: xaoto."

How can I tolerate the power of the Roman church, however it is obtained, however it may be? Farewell.

ducal librarian, his friend in the Lord

Jesus.

Hail! I beg you, dear Spalatin, do not fear too much and do not let human thoughts take away your courage. You know that if Christ had not led me and my cause, I would have brought ruin upon myself long ago through my first disputation on indulgences, then through my German sermon, 2) finally through my explanations 3) and my answer to Silvester, 4) and most recently through my "actions" [at Augsburg], 5) most of all through the journey to Augsburg. For what man would not have feared or expected every one of these things to bring me ruin? Yes, the other day Olsnitzer wrote from Rome to the chancellor

But their intention is to attack me not by knowledge of the law, but with Italian intrigues (for these [Italicis subtilitatibus] are his words); but by this I mean poison or assassination.

I suppress and withhold much for the sake of the prince and our university, which, if I were elsewhere, I would pour out against the destroyer of Scripture and the church, Rome, or rather Babel. It cannot be dealt with, my dear Spalatin, the truth of Scripture and the Church, unless one enrages this beast [Revelation Cap. 13]. Therefore, do not expect me to be calm and unharmed, if you do not want me to leave theology altogether. Therefore let the friends think that I am nonsensical. This thing (if it is of God) will not come to an end unless, like Christ's disciples and acquaintances, all my friends abandon me, and the truth is not to be found.

be alone who saves herself with her right hand, not by mine, not by yours, not by any man's; and this hour I have had in view from the beginning.

3 Although this twelfth thesis was forced from me by Eck, then because the pope will have his patrons in the future disputation, I do not think that it [this thesis] must appear so offensive, unless they were not mindful of the freedom of disputation. In short, if I go to ruin, nothing will be lost from the world. The Wittenbergers have already come so far by God's grace that they do not need me. What do you want? I, a wretched man, fear that I may not be worthy to suffer and be killed for such a cause. This happiness will be granted to better people, not to such a shameful sinner.

I have always told you that I would be ready to leave this place if I seemed to bring danger to the most noble prince by staying here. Finally, I must surely die, although I flatter the Roman church and the pope enough by a German protective pamphlet 2) published by Scholl, if it might help a little or please your taste. Farewell. We Rector, 3) Magistri and Doctoren of the high University of Leipzig, offer our greetings to D. Martin Luther.

(Erl. Briefw.). He is from Lemberg, and, as Löscher (Vol. III, p. 579) notes, gave the final speech at the end of the Leipzig disputation.

The excellent Doctor of Holy Scripture, Johann Eck, has written to the most noble Prince, Duke George, this university and the doctors of theology, 1) and has chosen the theological faculty as a lesbian guide to judge his dispute, asking most diligently that we allow him to dispute with D. Carlstadt in our highly famous university. Since through this examination, by means of disputation, the truth can be defended against the slanderers and, as it were, brought out of the deep pit of democritus 2) into the light of day, we have granted him his request as far as possible and granted him a place to disputation. 3) On this good will of ours, D. Eck has relied on this good will of ours; and after he wants to engage in a school fight here with D. Carlstadt, so that he may leave the camp of Pallas with a flying ensign and deliver a public battle to your champion (as he says), he has issued a note of his disputation, like a banner, by which, as you think, he has announced the fight to your sentences. Since you do not intend to give way to him, you have again challenged him to the dispute of the disputation by means of a printed document. In this, we are highly astonished at you that you write against our decision, which was made in truth, 4) that we had refused or refused him the disputation; but we are much more astonished that you have pretended that such a disputation would be held in our university in Leipzig, since nothing of this is known to us, nor have you obtained such from us, nor even from the most illustrious prince, the gracious Mäcenas of our university. Therefore, since this is similar to a presumption of which you are believed to be disgusted, we most earnestly request that you do not burden us, who know nothing about it, either, if it is not repugnant to you, revoke it, or 370 Excerpt from a very emphatic letter from Duke George to the Bishop of Merseburg, Prince Adolph of Anhalt, who was the Chancellor of the University of Leipzig and who was strongly opposed to the Leipzig disputation, asking him not to hinder the disputation any further.

This letter is found in Latin from the Zacharias Schneider titironie. lüps., lid. IV, p. 168 reprinted in Seckendorf's nist. l'ntsi., lid. I, p. 80, § 57; in Fabricius, OriA. 8uxon., lid. VII, p. 861 in other words, but in the same sense. German in Frick's translation of Seckendorf, p. 187 and in Hofmann's Ref.-Hist. der Stadt Leipzig, p. 68. - Seckendorf reports (l. e. p. 81) that in spite of this serious letter, the Bishop of Merseburg, during the entry of the Wittenbergers on June 24 (Seckendorf wrong: 17. ^unü), had a ban posted on the church doors in Leipzig not to hold the disputation. But the council, by order of the duke, not only had the notice torn down, but also had the one who had posted it thrown into prison. Cf. Document No. 393, § 4.

Translated from Latin.

5) The letter was signed by: D. Matthias Henning, M. Nicolaus Apel of Königshöfen im Grabfelde sBayern], Düngersheim, Matthias Frauendienst of Schweidnitz, D. Paul Schwoffheim of Görlitz, Martin Meenborn of Hirschberg and Lungenschneider. (Seidemann, 1. 6. p. 32.)

J.F.D. is not a little surprised that the bishop would be disgusted with the old custom used by the noble ancestors and holy church fathers to investigate the truth in disputed religious matters, and brought upon them, their descendants. It would be useful and necessary for the recently raised question to be considered carefully, for both sides to hear the reasons for the evidence, and for the truth to be investigated: whether, when the money deposited for the indulgence rings in the basin, the souls of the deceased, delivered from purgatory, will lead to heaven, and whether the silly, simple-minded rabble would not be cheated out of money in this way. It seemed as if the bishop wanted to speak the word of some unworthy, but pompous people (who were like the fearful soldiers, who boasted of great manliness apart from the fight, but, as soon as noise was blown, sought to flee). It would be an old custom to hold disputations in such disputes, to hear the parties against each other, and to let each defend his opinion to the best of his ability and answer the other's objections. If the theologians should not be able to maintain their opinions, which would be wrong, it would neither be detrimental to the pope nor to the church if they were to be instructed better; on the other hand, even if they were to be driven in a just and good cause by the opposite, it would neither be detrimental to them nor to the cause, because they, surpassed by the sophists in a good cause through speed of dispute, could easily appeal to the pope. Nor would this public discussion be annoying to those who were properly instructed and walked in the light, nor would it be disagreeable and repugnant to the pope at Rome and his cardinals, because the common man would thereby be properly instructed in the things that belong to all men's blessedness. It would be in the interest of all Christendom that, if something in doctrine had been falsified through error and ignorance on the part of the teachers, it should be made known to everyone. The theologians who refuse to debate would be acting against their profession and against the high privilege they enjoy above all other teachers, both in other assemblies and in the public courts of the university; But if they should not be able to defend and uphold their office and title of honor, old women or young children could be fed at little expense and with more benefit, who in time would be more useful to the common people and much more obedient to the authorities than such theologians.

The bishop hoped that the bishop's enlightened mind would consider what use a dog could be to the sheep, a dog that could neither bark nor attack wolves. He wished that the bishop would consider, according to his enlightened mind, what use a dog that could neither bark nor attack wolves would be to the sheep. He asked the bishop not to defend the lazy clergy, but rather to impose on these night birds, who shun the light, that they take up this fight, which their profession and office demanded, because it was not forbidden by the pope to fight bravely and fearlessly against heresies for the Christian truth. If they would bravely defend the truth, neither the church nor the university would be endangered; thus the outcome of this disputation could not be detrimental to him, as a Christian prince. In the contrary case, if neither the bishop's reputation nor his, the sovereign's, well-meant and faithful admonition should catch on with these theologians, this obstinacy would be an indication from which he and all reasonable people could conclude that they were not theologians, but such people who dealt only with how they would like to deceive the common man, but in doing so neither reveal their opinions nor know how to refute and overturn the errors of the heretics and newcomers. If, however, they were to seek evasion, he wanted to testify in a public patent before God and all the world that he had no other intention, nor would he have had, than that by such means the dispute that had been raised might be rightly recognized and the truth brought to light; but the theologians, because of their clumsiness and ignorance, would not only have rejected such disputation, but would also have worked tooth and nail against it, so that it could not gain its continuance. The bishop should well consider for himself how fine this would be for the church, how praiseworthy it would be for the clergy, and what reputation and praise it would win among the descendants. Finally, he asks and admonishes him: that he would prove himself manly in such a high and important matter, and as a bishop in work and in deed.

and promises to see to it that the university is not harmed in any way. Jan. 31, 1519.

From Hofmann's Ref.-Gesch. der Stadt Leipzig, p. 72.

By the Grace of God Adolph, Bishop of Merseburg, Prince of Anhalt.

Our greetings and favorable will beforehand, worthy and highly learned, dear devotees! We have received your letter, with avoidance, as that the illustrious Highborn Prince, Lord George of Saxony, our dear lord and uncle, Doctor Andreas and Eck 1) in his dear University of Leipzig to disputiren attributed, and you, to him such to favor, ordered, which you were not able to resist, therefore asking, not to heed to ungraciousness, also, according to our promise, to be helpful to get the lost Canonikat, and further content, read; and what we wrote to you before, on account of the disputation that Eck intends to do at the university in question, not to permit it, we did 2) out of special concern, and also because we were moved to do so; but that our lord and uncle should procure otherwise with you, we leave to his discretion. Furthermore, when you wrote to us on account of the canonry that you had been at our will with it, the university of our oversight has not progressed to any harm or disadvantage, and we have spoken with Ern Sebastian, Noble of Plote, our cathedral provost at Merseburg, if he has recently been here, and if he intends to come to us again in a short time, we want to take further action with him on account of the prebend, and talk to him; We will let you know in the best possible way what we achieve and obtain from him. We are inclined to show you favorable will. Given at Merseburg, Monday after Conversionis St. Pauli [Jan. 31] Anno 1519.

To the worthy and highly learned, Rector, Magistris and Doctors of the Leipzig High School, our dear devotees.

To the eminent theologian and philosopher Martin Luther, the famous man, full professor at Wittenberg, the Lord and Superior Ecks, Augustinian 3) at Wittenberg.

Hail in the Lord, and in Jesus' right mind! That the highly learned men of the University of Leipzig had refused the complaint to hear us, such was vehemently repugnant to me, and I did not know at all how I should advise the matter. But then Mr. Georg, Duke of Saxony 2c, my most gracious prince, at my request, acted with his university and brought it about that they finally consented; as I have received letters today, both from the most noble prince as well as from the university and faculty. I have therefore fixed the 27th day of June, 4) on which we will begin with the disputation, but on the preceding 26th day we want to compare notes in the theological faculty as to who is to be the opponent in the first battle. Since Carlstadt is your champion, but you are the most prominent, who, according to my small and poor understanding, has spread this false and erroneous doctrine throughout all of Germany, therefore it is fitting that you come there yourselves, and either defend your opinion, or overturn mine. But how I would like you to change your mind and obey the apostolic see in all things, to listen to Leo the Tenth as Christ's governor, and not to seek singularity, but to submit to the general opinion of the teachers, and to be sure that Christ would not have left his church in such error for 400 years (as you suppose). For you see from the disputation note that I have not set my propositions against Bodenstein as well as against your teachings. God be with you, dear Martin, and let us both pray that God may enlighten us. Given at Ingolstadt, February 19, in the 1519th year after the birth of the Virgin. Your most devoted corner. 5) will engage in a disputation with Andreas Carlstadt, Archidiaconus in Wittenberg, for his life, that is, his Corollaria. The place of battle will be the theological auditorium; our mataeologi 1) have been appointed as arbiters; the day, however, has not yet been named. Both sides are making great preparations for this battle. One will bring the Augustinians; the other the Dominicans, who are always present when their interest is in need. People will flock from all places to witness this rare quarrel. It is a fine pair of Scotists who will fight. Shall I tell you beforehand how it will go? The affair will end with great clamor in a quarrel that is likely to be bloodier than the one so artfully described by the gentleman in his Esesino and Pacidiano. This will be the outcome. For I know well the heat of both. Ten democriti will get enough to laugh. I will report the course of events when it is otherwise deserved. In the meantime, I want to blow the whistle on these duelists with these words: Be wise, and remember the weapons of your knighthood. Jan. 6, 1519.

Johann Eck, the most distinguished among the pen fencers and grand speakers, who, like that Socrates in Aristophanes, despises the gods themselves,

From the way of disputing, especially in theological matters, of P. Mosellanus, Protegenfls, speech, which he held in the name of the most illustrious Duke George of Saxony in a large assembly of distinguished and learned people.

I. I do not wish at all, most noble princes and you other excellent men, however many and of what rank may be assembled here, that they should cheer me, one who is despondent at the beginning of this speech, by their benevolence, or listen to the speech of a young person with amazement (for I did not appear in such

This young person 1) quietly and attentively heard the most illustrious and most wise Prince George, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia, Margrave of Meissen, speak, this our famous university all-mildest Mäcenas and protector, a hero who deserves an eternal memory; whose principality, armed with weapons and crew, endowed with all excellent arts and adorned with Christian manners, in short, in every respect in the highest flourish, may be preserved and protected until the end of this world, which will perish, by the prince of all princes, God, who alone is kind and wise, who alone is in truth the Most High, from whom all power comes, whether in heaven, where there is constant harmony without any tumult of war, or in this world, which, because it is in trouble, often deviates from its first image, the heavenly community, and thus plunges the human race into great misfortune. Our dearest father and prince tries to avert this evil from us and from our civil as well as our scholarly community to the best of his ability, and therefore does everything, tries everything, and makes it his utmost concern. And since he is interested in knowing what is going on publicly and particularly in his lands, and how it is due, he has instructed me that in the name of his Serene Highness I should not, of course, instruct you who have come together for this public doctrinal battle (since you are highly learned yourselves), but only remind you; not what reasons you should use against your adversaries, but how great modesty respectable theologians have to show in the holy business, who in a foreign country, under another prince, from the meek doctrine of JEsu Christ, the patient Lamb, in the intention to investigate the truth, raise a public dispute, and that not without great spite even of the great ones. But even though my age is still weak, my teaching somewhat young, and my eloquence not so ready that I can properly represent the person of such a great hero, I do not hope that my simple speech will take away anything, even the least, from the reputation of such a wise prince. For the simpler and more unaffected the speech is, the more clearly it reveals the prince's opinion.

and come closest to the truth. For, to my mind, Polinices says much more correctly and truthfully in the tragic poet: the speech of truth is simple and simple, that it would not be necessary for the interpreter to make many a circumlocution, as Hecuba, in another fable by the same poet, pompously says: that the reputation of the person also makes an unjust speech credible or valid. Yes, with common listeners who do not look at the reason as well as at the sound of pompous words, and who look more than is fair at the great being made in the trade than at the thing, what Hecuba says here may be true. But the prudent, on the other hand, looks not at who says something, but at what is said, and does not take the well-known word for an empty saying: Often also a lowly man (olitor == cabbage gardener) has spoken very well to the matter.

(2) But what is the use of using much worldly evidence in a holy matter? Since in the Gospel, the one who wants to come to the kingdom of heaven, that is, to Christianity, as the true theology, is absolutely denied all access, who does not become a child again, and shows this age, manner and manners in all simplicity. Samuel not only walks as a child in the house of the Lord, but is also chosen by divine call to be a prophet. And we young men, if we are born, not of the blood and will of a man, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God and His promise, should be denied to do great things and (to speak so) to do things belonging to the ancients? Yes, Christ himself (which comes to my mind in passing, but at the right time), who wanted his whole life to serve as an example for us, did not spend this age in childish things, as usually happens, but, since he was barely twelve years old, out of eagerness for heavenly wisdom, He sat there quietly and calmly among the public teachers of wisdom, sometimes asking some of them meekly, sometimes answering others who asked him honestly. In this way, of course, he wanted to show by deed that no age of a truly Christian man is excluded from dealing with theology, indeed, that the Holy Spirit, as the only teacher of true wisdom, is nowhere more dear or his presence more visible than in the minds of simple-minded people who have not taken up wrong opinions and doctrines and whom no impurity of sin stains. For God, the Giver

1) In the preface to the above-mentioned single edition of this speech, which is addressed to Otto von Pack, it is reported that Mosellanus wrote out this speech by order of Duke George, which was to be delivered by a boy. Because it was very long, however, Otto von Pack was supposed to memorize and recite it. He became ill two days before the disputation, and so Mosellanus had to deliver it himself (Löscher, Vol. III, p. 579).

He does not count the years, but looks at the hearts. For he respects not gray hairs, but purity of soul. But if someone is so foolish that he only looks for eloquence, and expects painted words and artificial flowers from a simple young man who speaks of the most simple kind of teaching in the most respectable assembly of people, he would be just as foolish as if he asked for roses in the extreme winter cold and snow in the greatest summer heat. I think that I must also speak of the most simple teaching or wisdom of Christ in a simple way. For he is the best speaker among Christians who speaks only purely and without error, and seeks the greatest virtue of speech in the greatest clarity. Let us leave the rest to those who, with I know not what arts and wiles of words, impudently boast of making a great man who has nothing good to say, and of making a man who has better things to say the lesser. But where do I end up? My intention was to give you the order of the most illustrious prince. But I have forgotten myself and have spent a good part of the time talking about myself, so that one can see from this that what Aristotle said about the easy forgetfulness of children also applies to young men, so that one does not think that they have nothing blameworthy about them. If I have made a mistake in this, let it be attributed to my age. Having been instructed by this mistake, I will continue to follow my orders all the more carefully.

First of all, I ask you, you famous men and leaders of the cause on both sides, to consider to what extent you have grown from a small beginning, from what angle (that I say so) you have stepped into such a large arena, and what spark has ignited this great flame of disagreement. For the sharpness of your spirit, since it still rages with full force, will not converge to a doubtful outcome of the dispute, but since it has already been at each other from afar several times through the pen, as a shot arrow, and tested what could be promised, will now, as it were, bring everything to a main meeting in the vicinity, 1) and either defend the boundaries of their confession and faith with proper reasons from Scripture, or give up the field to the victorious enemy and, citing Scripture, make a retraction. One first attacked the matter with mere short conclusions, which in a short time were miraculously spread throughout Germany, indeed, almost the whole of Christendom. Soon they began to trade in attack and protection writings. Since this was of no avail except that the booksellers benefited from it, one finally resorted to the weapons of a public disputation after both sides had agreed to it. This famous seat of studies seemed to be very suitable for the dispute of a final disputation to take place on it, as on a public battlefield. The parties turned to our most noble Prince George and asked him not to deny the place to a matter that aimed at common harmony. The most gracious prince gladly granted it. This day has been set aside for the dispute. There are here two universities, as they are called, namely the Ingolstadt and Wittenberg universities, almost the most distinguished lights, Johann Eck and Andreas Carlstadt, the field heirs of this war; 2) people who are highly famous because of their reputation and scholarship, each with his men of war. Here is the most illustrious prince of Pomerania, Barnim, at the time Rector of the Wittenberg School; probably quite Magnificus. There are high officials of our ducal court here, people who are both great by noble origin and outstanding by exceptional wisdom, who represent our absent most illustrious Prince George by their presence. Here is also the highly respectable Rector of this famous university of ours. You also see the high-born Prince George of Anhalt, a pupil of this school of ours, who is particularly distinguished. There are also at present the fathers of the University of Erfurt; people who are not only adorned with holy life and reputation, but have also attained the fame of a special scholarship. Yes, there are also other very learned people from elsewhere, each of whom has a famous name, all of whom have been lured from afar by such a rare battle. Our whole school is also present: theologians who, in addition to their great erudition, are also of great age. Jurists of special wisdom; physicians of deep insight and experience; philosophers who study nature with all diligence. There is a large number of studi-

the youth are present, as well as the honorable council of this city. In short, all eyes are on you; everyone is sitting full of expectation as to how the dispute will proceed. To fulfill the expectations of these great princes, of so many noblemen, gentlemen and scholars, of so many old and young, this simple way is open, namely, that you, as the importance of the matter demands and as befits your own decency, treat the matter that has been started.

This will be done if you consider carefully, first, what it is that the common people call disputing; second, what it is in theological matters, that is, disputing about God and divine things, and to what extent such disputing is advisable and permissible both according to respectability and according to the most holy examples of men. For this is not right disputing, as those who are a rabble of disputants think, when one, just to show one's wit, seizes every occasion for false accusations, shouts loudly when one misleads the poor adversary with contrived conclusions; when one stamps with anger, when one absolutely wants to be right, and shows that one is full of hatred toward one another (which, God grant it, should not take place at all in the schools of Christians), but when, out of mere eagerness to learn, one considers one's own with others, and does not trust one's wit to everything, but rather wants to listen to another's opinion gently and calmly, and takes it as it should be taken, even if one has taken it rightly, accepts it with pleasure if it is halfway tolerable and good, and rejoices, as it were, in the gain, and would rather recognize that one is a little late in arriving at the truth than that one always wants to err. If, however, it is too clumsy to be accepted as true in view of the circumstances, it must be refuted with clear causes and the error denounced, and all this without anger, without boasting or reviling in a spiteful way; so that one need not give a suspicion anywhere as if one wanted to revile, but show everywhere that one holds Christian love in honor on both sides. He who does not go thus to dispute is not a philosopher, but a philonicos or rightist; not a disputant, but a brawler; not an investigator of truth, but a teacher of error and discord. If we also praise this modest and friendly way of disputing in the pagans, since some of them have given a good example in it, it would be not only shameful but also dangerous for you, men of high value, to use the same in the Christian world.

It is not possible to lack the kind of humility that stands at the bottom of modesty, as it were, and rises through all the levels of virtue to the summit of cordial love between one another. Among the rabble, which tends to be very far from perfection, such quarrelsomeness would not bring so much common harm; but that such evil should be seen tearing at the noblest leaders of the Christian community, the theologians, is almost unforgivable. If the salt becomes tasteless, with what will we wretches be folded against the rottenness of vice? When our light becomes dim, who will illuminate us who stumble around in this darkness of the world?

God's nature, with which the whole of theology has to do, has so contracted into its widest confines, and has so departed from the light of human understanding into quiet and dark solitude, that even no angelic understanding can see through it as it is now, with all its sharpness, that therefore he who has rightly been called a theologian has rightly said: no one can express God and God's nature rightly, let alone reach them with his thoughts or words. Paul, the prince among the apostles, whom Christ chose as his instrument, and who was worthy to be admitted to the mysteries of the third heaven, when he stalled over the explanation of the mysteries, did not so quickly blurt out what occurred to him, but recognized the human weakness and the inexpressible difficulty of the matter, and exclaimed [Rom. 11:33, 34]: "O what a depth of riches, both of wisdom and of knowledge of God! How incomprehensible are his judgments and his ways inscrutable! For who hath discerned the mind of the LORD, or who hath been his counselor?" And we poor people, who are not worthy to untie the apostle's laces, are subject to all things, decide everything brazenly, and would rather let go of a paternal inheritance, even of life, than of our preconceived opinion.

But someone might say: Moses talked with God face to face. I admit that; but he alone, and only on the seventh day, after he had purified himself for a whole six days and then rested from this work of his. And yet it would not have happened, whether he had purified himself for so many days, if God had not lowered himself from the invisible tent of his glory, which he had prepared for himself on high, to the mountain of human reason, which is still nebulous. But what use has such a conversation been to him?

brought? Certainly this one, that he boasts to have seen only God's back [Ex. 33, 23. He is sure of this, that he boasts to have seen only God's back [Exodus 33:23], namely the most glorious glory of God, as it shines forth in the marvelous construction of this world, while Aaron, although high priest, and other chosen elders of the people, heard the sound of God's voice only from afar, and the people, who had not yet given up the dominion of the emotions, were kept far down from the mountain, that is, from touching the heavenly wisdom. For (so Gregorius says) not everyone can attain exact knowledge of God (φιλοσοφείν). It is not such a small thing that she let herself be acted upon by those who crawl on the earth and obey the belly like cattle. She kisses only those with her kiss, lets only those into her closed garden, this queen of all sciences, theology, the quite beautiful virgin, who is not sullied with any stain of human error, who is chosen among many thousands, like that spiritual bridegroom, who, like that spiritual bridegroom, has previously washed the feet of her body, which always resists the spirit, from all filthiness of vicious inclinations with the milk of purity and simplicity, and whose head has been moistened with the dew of heavenly grace at night through the silence of the soul. If Paul, such an excellent apostle, if Moses, the leader of the faithful people, with the highest peace of mind, was allowed to worship more than to look at, to admire more than to expound traces of divine wisdom, how can we think that the right understanding of the Scriptures will not be lost from us, if we on both sides, with bitter tempers and mad cries, confuse everything and argue as if it concerned life and limb? No sensible and intelligent man will like to be at a 'gasterei, where one with the cups dedicated to joy (as Flaccus says), like the Thracians, drives at each other to wounds and blows. And do we think that the peaceable spirit of Jesus Christ will come to such a disputation, which shoots the arrows of sophistical intrigues full of deadly poison against each other?

(7) But let no one think that for this reason I entirely reject ordinary disputation, which is generally accepted, or that one cannot sometimes usefully dispute even in theological matters; but let us remember that when similar disputes arise out of human frailty, one must in such cases be careful.

The first is that we must always keep things in moderation, and that there are certain limits beyond which we cannot go without violating theological decency. For if we believe Paul [1 Cor. 11:19], there must always be divisions in Christendom, either because each has his own opinion, or so that from such a comparison it will be clearer which opinion comes closest to the same life-giving spirit. For we must indeed debate, but to the end that, when we act as Christians with Christians, the ineffable Trinity and the main articles of faith, as the foundation of the theological confession, are not called into doubt and publicly put at stake. But when we are dealing with people who do not accept Christ's teaching, everything must be done in such a way that it does not seem as if we want to win more with deceitful eloquence and fancy words than with the example of a good life and glorious miracles.

(8) Since we have many examples of both kinds, let us leave it at this time to pick out a few special ones from the colorful meadow of Scripture. The apostle Paul (that I speak of the last part first) attacked the Gentiles at Corinth, who were armed with the weapons of Greek worldly wisdom, not with words of human wisdom and eloquence, but with proof of the Spirit and the power of God, that the building of the Christian faith was not based on human wisdom, but on God's power [1 Cor. 2:4, 5]. With these final speeches, which are not taken from Aristotle's Organon, the teacher of the pagans refuted barbaric superstitions of so many pagans, yes, Athens itself, the inventor of such sciences, and brought them to the faith of Christ. These are the weapons of our knighthood, not carnal, but mighty before God, by which one can disturb the counsels of the ungodly, and all fortifications that rise up against the knowledge of God, and take captive to the obedience of Christ all reasoning of the adversaries [2 Cor. 10, 4, 5.] For all Scripture, inspired by God, is useful for teaching, for punishment, for correction, for chastening, so that the man of God may be sent to all divine work [2 Tim. 3, 16, 17.]. For I have never been satisfied with those who hold that to refute the errors of unbelievers, the futile subtleties of the worldly wise do more than the powerful simplicity of evangelical doctrine, since (apart from the prophetic spirit threatening to destroy the wisdom of the

1) This non, which is missing in Löscher, has already been suitably added by the Alte translator.

(In the same way, nothing can be asserted by human reasons that cannot also be overturned by the same reasons. But who will dare to brazenly resist the sayings of eternal wisdom, if there is holy life in it? Shall I make this clearer with an image from ancient theology? The Israelite people fought against seven vicious nations, namely the Cananites, Hittites, Amorites, Perizzites, Gergesites, Hivites and Jebusites; but who was their commander? A Pharaoh, a prince of Egyptian wisdom? Not at all. Who then? Moses, that is, the almighty God's law. And yet, even so, it would not have triumphed if he had not prayed for and obtained the assistance of the clear mind with raised hands from God. And when he lowered his hands, Israel was overcome [Ex. 17:11]. For the mind of the secret Scripture must not be twisted according to human desires, but must be solicited from the fountain of all good, the Holy Spirit, with godly supplication. David also fought as a boy against a stranger, namely Goliath, who defied human strength, but after he had first thrown away the proud Saul's weapons, which he had made man's art, with which he had clothed himself before in vain and had felt more burden than benefit from it. Afterwards he looked for five stones from the brook of secret writing, with which he finally knocked down the enemy, after he had hit him violently on the forehead [1 Sam. 17, 38. ff].

9 And would God that we would be moved by such examples to trust only in the weapons of divine wisdom today, and not prefer them to most of the reasons of human worldly wisdom, or not use them so excessively in theological matters! because many, and perhaps even rightly, think that from such presumption, as from a seed, arise all questions and disputes about words, about which the red spirits are quite mad, and which Paul so often commanded to avoid.

(10) But how? (one will say) are not the pagans also to be refuted by pagan reasons and to be beaten as it were with their own sword? Did not Basil also read pagan writers and command others to read them? Answer: He certainly did; but he also attributes the cruel destruction of the Arian heresies to the teachings that come from outside. Jerome also placed almost too much emphasis on pagan writings.

and allows others to read them in a letter to Magnus the orator. Nevertheless, he also testifies that the philosophers were rightly called patriarchs of heretics, and that the Pelagian heresy came entirely from them; that therefore one can see from these various judgments how dangerous it is if one does not keep moderation in the application of the external sciences. It seems to me that after Paul, whom we must regard as the best model in all theology, the Greeks are the most thoughtful and careful in this, especially Origen, Basil, Gregory, Athanasius and Chrysostom. For the Latins, especially the newer ones, do not keep their beloved captive [maid or slave] so pure, and do not cut her nails so precisely, that she cannot be recognized as a stranger among the maids of the queen, Wisdom. And if it is to be provided on one side, then I would rather be satisfied with the evangelical doctrine of simplicity, and dispense with the external sciences, than go too far over the mark, and almost be suspected of paganism.

(11) In any case, from what we have said, it will be sufficiently seen how Christians must deal with unbelievers. Now we must likewise show by some examples how Christians are to proceed in their disputes. First of all, Peter and Paul, the princes of one and the same religion, had different opinions, but only in observance of the ceremonies; yet so modestly and amiably that after the free punishment with which Paul, as he testifies, resisted Peter to his face [Gal. 2:11.], nevertheless no enmity grew out of it, and no tragedy, because of the error committed, was offered by a public spectacle. Therefore Augustine also took occasion to think differently of it than Jerome. But how they were not at all angry against each other because of this or how they went out (although both of them had a very hot spirit, the one because of fresh youth, which also included the episcopal reputation; the other because of his natural fire and good conscience), is shown by their mutual letters, which are full of love and reverence for each other. And since they got to know each other on this occasion (for they never saw each other with their eyes), they subsequently helped to promote the common good of the church unanimously and diligently, setting aside all differences.

12) So also among the Greeks, Gregory and Basil, two lights of the Oriental world

The two brothers and sisters of the Church, although they sometimes, though very seldom, had different opinions, nevertheless cultivated their friendship, which was finally interrupted by the death of one of them, with great zeal. How gently, and even how lovingly, they try to completely dissuade the highly restless defenders of the Arian heresy from their harmful error, since they soon call them brothers, soon honestly show how they have gradually, as it were step by step, fallen into such an abyss of error through foreign philosophy, and how they could much more easily return to the confession of truth!

And lest it appear that I do not gratefully recognize the blessedness of these times, the great prince of learning Erasmus and Jakob Faber, Stapulensis, disagreed so much in the interpretation of the Psalms that one attacked the other by name. But how Christian Erasmus answered to this, all know, who have read his beautiful responsibility writing. For since the honest man was so cornered that he either had to be called ungodly or had to quarrel publicly with a great, famous friend, he preferred to answer the reproached than to give many thousands of people cause to think ill of him. To think evil of him. However, he acts so wisely and conscientiously that, since he partly refutes the accusation, partly excuses it, and in turn also forcedly punishes one and the other in the adversary, he still does not injure his honor with a single word, or forgets brotherly love. Therefore, Faber would not be praiseworthy if he did not acknowledge such kindness and started the quarrel again. We do not believe that he would be guilty of such a learned and godly man.

Let such examples serve as a model for you. Let your fight be arranged in such a way that you look at them. Take great care not to overpower the other with quarrelsome shouting, to make him laugh as an ignorant man, so that he only wins and is praised by the mob for it, so that he returns to his own with honor, but that he presents his reasons from the holy scriptures with all composure. He should present his reasons, which he puts forward from the sanctity of Scripture, with all composure and allow them to be judged, so that one seeks to preserve the other's honest name and finally either saves the adversary from his error through obvious truth, or willingly surrenders to the truth shown to him and allows himself to be guided. Otherwise, if you only quarrel, what is the big difference between a and a blood-shedding swordsman? There is no difference, except that in the case of the former it is a matter of life, but the latter fights for the most vain glory of the name with even more vain clamor. Yes, we hear that some are even so daring that they also pride themselves on defending their antics so stiff-necked that they even want to take a chance on whether they should also burn over it; while no prudent man will praise such an example. At least neither the princes of the theologians, the apostles, prescribed this, nor did the highest teachers of ancient theology among the Greeks and Latins hold it so. For the fact that very many of them gave their necks into the ungodly hands of the executioners for Christ and for the faith of the Gospel, I do not believe that it would be interpreted as these pompous battles of conflicting Christians.

What else can we expect from our doctrinal battles, if they are healthy, than that we help each other according to the rule of love? In this kind of struggle, what is to be victorious but to bring back a brother from the error that often settles in us under the pretense of truth? and not to put the lamp of the mind lit by God under a bushel, but on the lampstand, so that it may shine for all in the house of God? But what does it mean to be overcome, but to come out of the error into which human infirmity has led us, back onto the path of truth, and to be brought back into the fold of the eternal Shepherd as a lost sheep that has been snatched from the jaws of the wolf? so that one should almost rather desire to be overcome than to overcome, because the one who overcomes does not share his but God's gift with others (for what do we have that we have not received?), whereas the one who is overcome receives the light of truth, which enlightens all men who come into this world, and thus becomes better than he was. It is more praiseworthy to teach others, but to be taught is more useful.

(16) No one should be ashamed to confess his error, but the wise should confess that a good part of wisdom lies in it. For what is it to know oneself (which word is said to have come from heaven, as the ancients believed) but to take one's frailty to heart, and to recognize that good and evil are mixed together among men? especially since all men are like that. Yes, the more a man imagines himself to know, the more he knows.

He is subject to greater and more serious errors. "For we all err manifoldly," says Jacobus [Cap. 3, 2.], "He that lacketh in no word is a perfect man." GOD alone is truthful, but all men are liars. The pagan Socrates is praised by Plato for preferring to be overcome in debate rather than to overcome others. And we Christians, confessors of holy humility, should think that we would lose our name and honor if we let ourselves be led to the truth by others from time to time? On the other hand, the books of Chrysippus, because they contained so much sophist wit and boasting, were burned by public order of the Athenians. And yet, does anyone prefer to imitate the pile-driving of this man rather than the praised humility of Socrates?

Therefore, dear theologians, in theological matters also act theologically! Deal with holy things in a holy way. Think that you are stepping onto the battlefield before the all-seeing eyes of God, and that the whole heavenly host is watching this battle. Think in what a place, before what judges and witnesses, and with what expectation of the whole Christendom you are going to this battle. Everything requires the highest modesty: the high command of our most handsome prince, the reverence owed to these princes here, so many great ones from the court, so many university teachers, so many old and young, in short, the judgment of the whole world. Nothing can be more pleasing to all of them than that Christian peace and harmony should grow out of this quarrel, and nothing more repugnant than that your quarrel should, through obstinacy, seem to have become a drinking bout of drunken men. If I have spoken a bit seriously in some parts, I ask you not to take it amiss. For I have not spoken what seemed good to me, but to my most gracious prince.

B. The actual act of the disputation that took place.

The acts transcribed during the disputation itself and published soon after with a preface, which are reprinted here in their entirety because of their importance. Probably published in December 1519.

Eck arrived there for the disputation in Leipzig on June 22, the Wittenbergers on June 24. On Sunday, June 26, Eck and Carlstadt agreed on the rules according to which the fight should be conducted:

"Namely, that Doctor Eck shall first oppose the Conclusions Doctoris Carlstadt, as much as he will ascribe to him the evening before, then Doctor Carlstadt shall respond, and the following day Doctor Carlstadt shall oppose Doctoris Eck's Conclusions, as he will also ascribe to him the evening before, then Doctor Eck shall respond, and thus continue to proceed one day after the other until the end of the disputation." Furthermore, it was decided that the mutual arguments and solutions be transcribed by four notaries and compared at the end of the disputation. Also, a copy was to be given to each party, but with the condition that the acts should not be published before the judge's decision was received. Luther could not take part in the disputation without the permission of Duke George. Eck, who was burning with desire to compete with Luther, provided him with this permission. Therefore, Luther did not sign the agreement between Eck and Carlstadt until July 4, with the reservation that his appeal to a council would remain justified and that the Curia would not have to pronounce judgment on the disputation. The disputation lasted from June 27 to July 15, with the disputation between Eck and Luther lasting from July 4 to 14. Already on July 14 they united about the arbitration court. For Carlstadt and Eck the University of Erfurt was chosen, for Luther and Eck the Universities of Paris and Erfurt. The latter refused the arbitral office, Paris made its judgement only later.

Before a verdict had been pronounced, the acts of the Leipzig disputation appeared in December 1519 under the title: "Disputatio excellentium .D. doctoru Iohannis Eccij & Andreae Carolostadij q cepta est Lipsiae XXVII. Iulij. An. M.D.XIX Disputatio secunda .D. Doctoru Iohannis Eccij & Andreae Carolostadij q cepit XV. [sic] Iulij. Disputatio eiusdem .D. Iohannis Eccij & D. Martini Lutheri Augustiniani q cepit .IIII. Iulij. Without place and time. 62 leaves in quarto. In his "Leipzig Disputation" p. 74, Seidemann referred to Luther's words in his letter to Johann Lang in Erfurt: "See to it that we get the printed disputations as soon as possible" to the above-mentioned printing, and also expressed the assumption that the acts were printed in Erfurt. It is therefore reasonable to assume that Luther's friend Lang, who was present at the disputation, would also have been the editor, who describes himself in the preface as a listener. Lang could easily obtain a copy of the copy sent there through his connection with the university. He was also not bound by any promise that would have prevented him from publishing it. In October 1519, Duke George sent a certified copy of the notaries' notes to Paris, and around the same time one will have reached Erfurt.

These acts are printed in their entirety only in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, Vol. III, p. 292, with the use of a manuscript which had been made available to him "from the Freybergische LidliotlieeÄ xudliou", of which he assumes that it "was produced at the Acta Disputationik itself". However, according to the exact correspondence with the above print, it can be assumed that it is also based on the notarial transcripts. Walch says, without further proof, that "such manuscripts can also be found in other libraries," to which the Weimar edition remarks: "We have not come across any such manuscripts. In the complete editions of Luther's works, the ver-

Acts between Eck and Carlstadt omitted; those between Eck and Luther are found in the Latin Wittenberger (1550), torn. I, fol. 242d; in the Jena (1579), tom. I, fol. 228; in the Erlanger, opx. var. arZ., tom. III, p. 23, "everywhere full of errors" (says the Weim. Ausgabe, which Löscher noted before it about the two old editions), and in the Weimar edition, vol. II, p. 250. The latter also brings only the disputation between Eck and Luther, but has printed the editor's preface in the introduction, p. 252, and Carlstadt's and Eck's protestations as a note, p. 254. German only in Walch, and that according to Löscher. We have revised the disputations between Eck and Carlstadt according to Löscher; the disputation between Eck and Luther has been retranslated according to Weimar. The correct chronological order of the disputations, which was altered in the original print, has been restored by Löscher according to his manuscript; we have followed him in this, as has Walch.

Translated into German.

The disputation of the excellent Doctors Eck and Andreas Carlstadt, which took place on June 27, 1519.

To the reader.

You have here, dear reader, whoever you are, the famous disputation which we saw and heard in Leipzig, held between the excellent men, D. Johann Eck, Andreas Carlstadt and Martin Luther. Some will perhaps be reluctant to see it published; others, however, will even condemn it for being printed, because both parties are said to have expressly agreed that such disputations would not be disseminated in any way. But do not turn to such speeches, my reader! For if they had really wanted this sea and this immense heap of words to be kept secret, they would not have allowed anyone to catch and copy it at will before everyone's eyes. 1) For since more than thirty copies have been copied there and distributed everywhere among half the world, it is clear enough that they wanted to let it all come to the people; unless they only wanted to bind copies of the notaries (who were specially appointed for this) to these laws. We have seen to it that we would also like to create some benefit for the godly reader. There is much in it that we did not know before, or did not dare to know. If this turns out well, then those who are concerned with the matter may look on, what truth will come out of it. At least one hopes that some freedom will grow out of it, so that one will speak and hear about church matters and Christianity more confidently and joyfully. Although there is much in this great heap that does not rhyme with the matter, we have not done anything about it, but have wanted to tell everything completely according to the bare truth, as it has been spoken and has happened. Furthermore, since we know and think well what we have to do here, we cannot give or take anything away from either part, nor can we get involved in a judgment that will engage or avert the reader's mind. We therefore leave everything to the judgment of each. Since this will undoubtedly be various, we wish that the best may apply, for the praise of God and the common benefit of Christianity. Fare well, godly reader, and read with a godly mind what we present to you in the same way; this you will do if you interpret our effort for the best.

1) Löscher reports that apart from the notaries "otherwise probably thirty private persons have copied for themselves". The following is correct; perhaps Löscher has taken it from it.

Carlstadt's protest by a responder to his side.

First of all, we testify and make it known everywhere that we do not want to deviate from the Catholic Church one finger's breadth, and if something of this kind is found, we want it to be regarded as something that escaped us out of human weakness, without having meant it intentionally, and that it should therefore be considered as good as revoked. We do not take anything away from the scholars' judgment, nor do we want to deprive the public schools of their authority and reputation. Everyone may be free in his judgment, if only he does not blindly follow the Scriptures, but acts completely. But to the holy Scriptures we give the honor of neither setting nor accepting anything without them; in other matters, however, which cannot be clearly taught from them, we leave the supreme place to the church teachers alone, and do not depart from them. Which we have sufficiently testified in the letter to D. Eck, 2) which thus reads: "If I do not have the most holy Father in Christ" 2c., and testify to it again here, as before.

Eck's Protestation.

He called for help.

I testify in theological honesty: How I made this effort for the praise of God, the glory of the churches,

2) This is Document No. 364.

If I have taken upon myself the salvation of souls and the explanation of truth, I do not intend to say or teach anything that is either against the Holy Scriptures or against the Holy Mother, the Church. I am ready to be instructed and corrected by the apostolic see and by those to whose judgment, after yesterday's settlement, we want to submit this disputation of ours: which I testify, as above.

Since one of the main topics of our argument is in the eleventh proposition 2), where this matter is dealt with: how free will behaves in a good and meritorious work, on which other preceding and subsequent things depend, I will prove that this is in accordance with the holy Scriptures, the holy fathers of the Christian faith: That the free will, the human will, has an active Causality, and the power to work out and produce the meritorious work, without excluding the grace and spiritual help of God; so much so, that the contrast is so much clear as to harbor Manichaeism error.

And for this I first of all quote the text of the holy scripture, which has already been mentioned in the "defense" in the ninth conclusion 3), from Sir. 15,14. ff.: "God has created man from the beginning and left him in the hand of his counsel, he has given him commandments and laws. If thou wilt keep the commandments (si voluerissi volueris), they shall preserve thee, and keep the good faith for ever. 4) He has set before thee water and fire; reach for whichever thou wilt. It is before man life and death, good and evil, whatsoever he pleases, that shall be given him. And because many is the wisdom of God, and strong in might, who looketh on all without ceasing" 2c. Here the wise man expressly gives to free will, if one considers the words: "If thou wilt" correctly, the power which we have explained, and interprets such that it is a choice or a will which is worked out or brought forth by free will. And against this, nothing is valid that the Doctor says in his "defense" 5) against it: I would have the knot and the dissolution to-

I have added a passage from Scripture that would be contrary to my opinion, because the wise man speaks of man as he was created in the beginning, and Scripture says that God created man righteous; if righteous, then also with the first grace. This evasion, I say, does not nullify my testimony. For although the wise man remembers man as he was first created, no one need think that the wise man addressed Adam only after so many hundred years and wanted to say, "If you will keep the commandment," 2c., but rather that he addressed the then present and the future men, which is indicated by the words at the end, "Who without ceasing sees all," 2c. Then also St. Jerome in his letter to the Virgin Demetrias, right after the beginning, refers to this saying of the wise man for the people of his time. Not to mention that the opinion of the holy fathers makes no great difference between the beginning of the free will and its continuation, except that at the beginning it was completely unharmed and perfect, but in the further course it was wounded by the stains of sin (as St. Ambrose speaks of the profession of the heathen), and became limping, according to Augustine in the third book hypognosticon against Pelagius. Which Bernhardus de lib. ard., in my edition Columnne 8, testifies quite clearly: Adam, he says, undoubtedly kept the freedom of the will both after and before sin always unchanged; and in the following Columnne: The will still remains, as in good, so also in evil, in the same way. This is more clearly stated by St. Jerome in the third book against the Pelagians, where Atticus says to Critobolus: "This is what I had said from the beginning, that it is in our power to sin or not to sin, and to take the good or the evil, that the free will remains (but he limits it at the end): but according to the nature and time and condition of human frailty.

Carlstadt's response.

The testimony of the wise man Cap. 15,14. ff. is about the first man and the whole human race; because according to the apostle, sin entered through one man to all men. As sin entered through one man, so would righteousness have been imparted to the whole human race if the first man had remained in rightness and innocence, so that he had been created, and each had been free to stretch out his hand for good or evil;

as the text clearly says. He says: "He formed man from the beginning and made him righteous"; and then follows: "has left him in the hand of his counsel". For grace rules the hand and stretches it out. Just as Paul also says: that those who are children of God are driven by the Holy Spirit. And John in his canonical epistle says: "Everyone who does right is born of God."

Secondly, I wonder that the excellent Doctor distinguishes the times by the Holy Spirit, as far as truth and righteousness are concerned, as if the Holy Spirit speaks truth at one time, which he overturns at another; and I refer to what has been said before.

To Bernhard I answer: that his testimony does not serve the cause, because the thesis speaks of freedom from sin, but the testimony cited by the doctor speaks of freedom in willing (volitionibus). And that this is so, Bernhard's words read thus: But he has lapsed from not being able to sin, into not being able to do otherwise than sin.

The words of Augustine, when he cites this saying: "God has man from the beginning," 2c., thus read: This is the first grace, by which the first man could have stood, if he had wanted to keep the commandments of the Lord. This he has now lost, since man has been corrupted by his disobedience, and has become a prisoner through the righteous judgment of the serpent, that is, of the devil (whom he preferred to obey rather than God); therefore it is written: "By whomsoever a man is overcome, that man's servant is he," 2 Pet. 2, 19, and again: "Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin," 2c. [John 8:34.]

To Jerome I say that Jerome was never so ignorant of Scripture as to think that fallen man could avoid sin without grace. Rather he argues with all his might against the Pelagians and proves that good works, good merits are not in man's power. 1)

On Ambrose I say that Ambrose lib. 1, 2. says: The free will without grace, or the will itself, is uncertain, wandering and changeable, which can do nothing of itself that is pleasing to God, just as the church already sang: Sine tuo numine nihil est in homine, nihil est innoxium, i.e., the will of a man is not in his own right.

1) In the manuscript it says in the margin: Eck said: if he had read in the theologians, he would not have said it. But in the print: Thereupon 2c.: he had read it ages ago.

Without the grace of the Holy Spirit, nothing can be done that is pleasing and acceptable to God, but everything he does is harmful.

Eck denies it, and replies.

First of all, when the wise man speaks of the first man and through him to the whole human race, I have what I want, namely of what kind free will is in us. This serves the first purpose.

Concerning the other, that the Holy Spirit does not have different truths according to different times: I deny this with regard to the reminders, commandments and orders, and say that God has given different, even repugnant, commandments according to the times, as when he ordered circumcision in the Old Testament as necessary, but in the time of grace the apostle cried out, "If ye be circumcised, Christ is of no use to you." So this word [Sir. 15,14. ff.] is a reminder, which the wise man could not address to the dead for any benefit, just as this commandment of the Lord: "Go into all the world and preach" 2c. did not apply to the dead.

Thirdly, what the erudite doctor has further cited in his defense does not serve the cause at all. For I have not cited the saying of the sage that free will can do something good without grace, which was the damned heresy of the Pelagians. For in this I gladly agree with him, as a Christian who firmly holds to the Christian faith; but this was our matter, and about this we argued, that free will, our rational power, which is assisted by grace, should not be cheated of its natural working and good-producing virtue; that is to say, that the will should not behave merely sufferingly toward the good, and that free will after sin should be nothing but a mere sound of words, but rather should cooperate when God helps with His grace. And this is the purpose of the text in the holy Gospel Matth. 25, 20, where the servant says: "Lord, you have given me five pounds; behold, I have gained five more." For if free will were merely suffering for the good, the servant would have thanked God and rightly confessed that he had received ten. But since he had received five from God as a gift, and since he had acquired five through his merits and the cooperating grace of God, he confesses in general, without hope, that he had gained five more. For St. Hilarius also testifies that through these pounds the merits of the righteous are understood.

Furthermore, I have not quoted Augustine or Ambrose as if I understood the scriptural passage from said passages in such a way that free will was entirely the cause, but I only wanted to show from the meaning of Bernard, Jerome, Augustine and Ambrose, how the holy fathers unanimously held that free will was not a mere empty name after the fall, but remained unchanged, although wounded according to Ambrose, limping according to Augustine, and to be respected according to the measure of human frailty, according to Jerome. For this also pleases me: that free will without grace can do nothing that is pleasing or pleasing to God.

At first, when the doctor says that he has what he wants from my answer, I say no to it.

On the other hand, since the excellent Doctor cites some testimonies by which he wants to show that the Holy Spirit or the truth of the Holy Spirit has been changed by time, as the commandment of circumcision 2c., I say that it is another when remedies are changed that were prescribed against diseases; another that the truth itself perishes. For this is still true today, that the circumcision of the fathers was valid. Therefore this contradiction is brought forward without good judgment.

Thirdly, I say that this saying does not prove that man, having obtained grace, still has a special natural efficacy that is distinct from grace. For the saying of the five pounds is not contrary to this, although from the outward appearance it has the appearance of benefiting the Lord Doctor, but according to the right view the word of that servant, if he has spoken rightly, must be understood in this way: Not I have gained, but the grace of GOD which is with me; as Paul says, "I have labored more than all, not I, but the grace of GOD which is with me." And so similar testimonies must be understood. For what in one place does not stand at the same time with, is not therefore denied. But what is doubtful must be decided from clear testimonies. Therefore, it does us little harm what the doctor has cited against us in this case in the third place.

Finally, when he says that free will has not the empty name, but also the thing, I answer: He makes the right freedom, who is truly free, namely Christ our Lord.

Fourthly, I say that both Augustine and Ambrose say that the good merits are entirely God's, and not partly ours, according to the activity, but that they become ours through the bestowal of grace.

Eck's rebuttal:

In the first place, that you have said, No, or, I deny it, I could also deny it, but that is not enough.

On the other hand, that this answer does not invalidate my assertion. For I have not said that a truth becomes a falsehood, but that the exhortation [Sir. 15] which the wise man made does not apply to the dead, in whom it would be of no use. Rather, I want it to be, have been, and will remain a theological truth, explaining how God has left man in the hands of His counsel for good and evil.

Thirdly, I say that such an answer does not sound well in my ears, I do not know what others judge about it, that one speaks so doubtfully, whether that servant has spoken well or not; since the Lord praises him and says, "Enter into the joy of your Lord!" Likewise, that his scholarship confesses that the testimony given is in appearance for me, but not in fact, which it has so declared: Here are five other pounds, which I have not gained, but the grace of God, which is with me: so I leave such explanation of the affirmative words by the negative, but am still satisfied with the interpretation, because the servant, whom the Lord praises, will undoubtedly have had the same humility with the apostle. In the meantime, my intention also benefits from such a core and interpretation: for if the grace of God has won with that servant, then one can easily see both of them working; which first of all can be seen from the little word ["with"], which expresses the fellowship. For he who disputes with me, disputes he? and he who works with me, does he work or not? For the rest, St. Jerome took this apostolic saying in just this sense. For he says of the same words, 1 Cor. 15:10, "I have labored more," that is, neither he without grace labored in the gospel, so that he did not add to what he had said before, nor grace without him, so that he retained free will and kept his dignity; by which he evidently testifies, and the Scriptures clearly declare, that both grace and the apostle labored.

Therefore, free will is not deprived of its effectiveness.

Eck said that he would answer the fourth one the next day because the time had passed. Carlstadt added: For the same reason he had left out the testimonies that were not yet brought forward from the Scriptures, because the next day it would be his turn to prove. 1) But Eck answered: he would have lost if he did not answer.

The 38th of June early at 7 o'clock.

Doctor Eck lets it happen that Carlstadt answers.

Carlstadt's response.

To the first I answer no, and point the reader to what has already been said before.

But that V. Eck makes so much of the passage Sir. 15,14. ff.: "If you will keep the commandments" 2c., Augustine answers it quite nicely de gratia et lib. arb. C. 15: By grace (he says) becomes so great a will that he can keep the divine commandments which he wills; for to this belongs what is written, "If thou wilt, thou shalt keep the commandments," 2c. Then the same Augustine says: "The same one who said, "If you will, you will keep the commandments" says in the same book Cap. 22:33: "O that I had a lock upon my mouth, and a seal upon my lips, that I should not fall thereby, and that my tongue should not corrupt me." Now if this be true, "If thou wilt, thou shalt keep the commandments"; why then doth he require a lock for his mouth? And further on, the same Augustine says, "If thou wilt, thou shalt keep the commandments." It is certain that we keep the commandments if we will, but because the will is prepared by the Lord, we must ask it of Him that we will as much as is necessary that we may do by will. It is certain that we will when we will, but he makes us will good things, of whom it is written, "By the Lord his course is directed, and so he wills his way," Ps. 37:23. "He that worketh in us both to will and to do according to his good pleasure," Phil. 2:13. Therefore see the Lord. Therefore, since God bestows both the good will and the good work, see to it that he does not overthrow the free will by an evil interpretation of the Scriptures, and that he does not put into the hearts of ignorant people, who are not well versed in the law of God, a pompous hope instead of theological science.

For I say this, that Christ came to rescue from the devil's jaws the free will that was his slave; for for this reason Christ, who knows no sin, was made sin for us, that in him we might have righteousness in God, as Paul says in 2 Cor. 5:21. Because free will cannot do righteousness unless Christ first takes on the sins of the free will and transfers it into the kingdom of light, that Christ alone may be righteous in the pious, just in the justified, sanctification in the sanctified, and redemption in the redeemed, so that no one may seek his glory, as Paul writes 1 Cor. 1:30: "But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who is made unto us of God wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: that, as it is written, he that will boast may boast in the Lord," as Jeremiah says. This is the right science of theologians, knowing nothing but Christ's power and our weakness. For power becomes mighty in weakness, and grace alone is sufficient for us, 2 Cor. 12:9.

The last testimony: "If you want", does not have the shadow of the Sacrament that has ceased.

On the other hand, as far as the change of truths is concerned, I say that the doctor is seeking deviations and wants to drag me elsewhere so that he can secretly hide himself and his cause. For I have said enough that grace extends the hand of our council for good, but he always brings me the same words again without further testimony.

Thirdly, when the excellent doctor says that he does not like and that it sounds bad in his ears what I said about the servant who answered, "Behold, Lord, I have gained five other pounds," I answer that I have not made a definite statement about it, so that it could be annoying to the ears, and that such doubtfulness does not concern our matter; but I would like D. Eck to take better care of the people who speak and, as Augustine reminds Orosius, to be diligent about who speaks in the Scriptures. Eck would take better care of the persons who speak and, as Augustine reminds us of Orosius, Cap. 9, would diligently observe who speaks in the holy Scriptures. But that he cackles: affirmative words were explained in a negative way, I care little, and one leaves such objections to those who deal with logical trifles and how something can be interpreted. But that he considers this little word "with me" and still attributes to free will its own efficacy, which does not come from grace, is sufficiently known to those who understand St. Paul correctly, how miserable he is.

1) In Löscher: augumöntancki instead of: arxunwntÄnäi.

whose testimony is contrary to the explicit opinion of the holy apostle, who has rejected all work that does not come from grace, because he says: It is not I, but the grace of God that is with me, that is, I am not the one who has a special activity (activitatem), as the school teachers speak, but it is grace that gives me all activity, that gives and offers all powers, that drives and governs me; for "by his grace I am what I am, and his grace has not been in vain to me"; that is, all that I have worked, all that grace has done, all good works the grace of God has bestowed upon me. He says this even more clearly in 2 Cor. 4:7: "We have this treasure in earthly vessels," that is, in weak vessels of flesh we have everything that belongs to grace. But let the Doctor consider that St. Paul does not call them vessels of grace, and pay attention to what follows (why we have this treasure of Christ in earthen vessels), "that the abundant power may be of God," he says, "and not of us." What further testimony can we have? Why do we make do with trifling things? Why do we hover in doubt, since all Scripture, which is high and praiseworthy, clearly ascribes not to our power, but to God's? For love alone suffers all things in us and with us; it believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things, works all things, 1 Cor. 13:7, that is, grace makes us patient, faithful and doers; it also makes our entrance and exit. This opinion is also served by what John the Baptist humbly and truthfully said: "A man can take nothing unless it is given him from heaven," John 3:27. And yet my Lord still wants to work and attribute a special work to free will as far as the works of grace are concerned, since he hears the Lord's forerunners confess that a man can take nothing unless it is given him from heaven. But the creators of good works can only grab themselves, since the Baptist of the Lord cannot take anything, unless it is given to him from above. This is what Ambrose lib. 2, cap. 9, says so elegantly about the calling of the Gentiles: "Grace itself does this with all kinds of healing and help, that in the one whom it calls, it first of all prepares for itself the will, as a recipient and servant of its goods. Behold, he says that grace makes the will capable of receiving, namely, the gifts of grace, and all that pertains to a good work; which John said in the words, "No one can take anything away" 2c. After this he says: that grace makes the will capable of service.

of the gifts of God. But my Lord Eck makes the will the king, because he says: the will has a special effect, which is natural and works in good merits. Hereby, I think, the last quotation from Jerome is answered, because this same Jerome lib. 1. against the Pelagians, Columne 12, the quoted saying of John: "No one can take anything" 2c., likewise draws on the help of God, and many other testimonies more, which serve for my cause, pile up.

Fourthly, I am very glad to see that the excellent Doctor awaits my reasons of proof, with which I hope, and have firm confidence in the Lord, to prove bravely and strongly that the good merits or works in all things, that is, are entirely God's, as far as their efficacy or bestowal (largitionem) is concerned, and that they become ours only in the way that they are given to us free of charge by divine goodness. And it is very dear to me that the excellent Doctor, my former adversary, immediately after the first fight that we had together, agreed with my opinion, yes, with the opinion of the Holy Spirit, and teaches that the free will, or rather the fallen will, can do nothing that is pleasant and pleasing to God before God's grace straightens it out and sets it right again. So then, the school crickets of the [merit] according to equity (de congruo) may have a good night, and also the repentance go their way, which they attribute to the will that has not yet been healed. It may grab Aristotle, who concocted such opinions, who has now been taught for over four hundred years, with great harm to souls, and disregarding the integrity and spirit of the Scriptures! Meanwhile it remains with my eleventh conclusion, 1) which is actually that of Augustine, de spir. et lit. 6. 3. that the free will before grace can do nothing but sin. The twelfth thesis should also be established, which is that of Ambrose, on the vocation of the pagans, lib. 1, c. 2, in the last column: that the will, which is not guided by the divine will, approaches ungodliness the more zealously it is intent on action. There may also pass away what the common rabble of theologians have taught: that if a man do as much as is in him, he can push away the bar which stands against grace; for this has been sufficiently refuted in the thirteenth thesis.

Corner.

Since our action is a disputation and not a lecture written at home, and in order to alleviate the gentlemen's displeasure, I say to the first that I quite like St. Augustine's explanation of grace and free will in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and twentieth chapters; because in these places the holy father leaves the rights of free will uninjured, namely: "As you wish" 2c., and yet does not conceal what is necessary, namely, the cooperating grace of God, which indeed cooperates in such a way that the deed of the good work may be attributed to God and to grace, which are the primary agents. Therefore, a Christian man must both praise grace and defend free will, as the learned Augustine lib. 2, o. 18. taught about infant baptism, and St. Ambrose reminded us in the introduction to voc. gent. Also Jerome reports lib. III against the Pelagians, that he had always been eager to assert the omnipotence of God at the same time as free will. But secondly, that the respectable Doctor reminds me that I do not bring the turgidity of hope into the hearts of crude people with my defense of free will: he should not have suspected this of me at all, for I defend free will in such a way against the abominations of the Manichaeans that I nevertheless place grace, as the noblest thing, far above it, against the damned Pelagians, and that Augustine lib. 3. hypogn. regards grace against free will no differently than the rider against the horse: so I willingly put up with what has been said therein in praise of grace, may God bestow it upon us all! As for the other, I say that I do not insist on anything so often as that I want the law of liberty to have been declared by the wise man, of which also Cyprian remembers Pope Cornelius, and says: Christ did not reproach those who went behind him, but rather turned to his apostles and said: Will you also go away? namely, they keep the law by which man is left to his freedom and, standing in his free will, chooses death or life. This law, I say, I wanted to see presented through the memory of the wise man, and this memory is addressed to the living and the descendants, but not to those who died before.

Thirdly: Thirdly, since the reverend Doctor blames me without reserve, as if I were miserably twisting the Apostle's word: "Not I, but the grace of God, which is with me, is with me," he says.

and ascribes to free will a special efficacy that does not come from grace: I wonder very much how this occurred to him, that he only added Jerome's words to those of the apostle, and I wonder still more that, since he had the transcript of our disputation yesterday from the notary, he interprets to me, contrary to our settlement, that I had taught that free will has its own special efficacy, which grace does not produce, which I had not even thought of; therefore I refer to the transcript of the notary. But what he has finally referred to, more in opposition than in answer, of grace being given from above: who does not know this? since even children know the well-known word of Jacob: "All perfect gift is from above" 2c. Therefore I also gladly accept Ambrose, who makes the will capable of good and a servant of it. But that the highly learned Doctor ascribes to me: I would have wanted to make a king out of the will, I admit, I say, as I have put in my "defense" in the sixth conclusion: 1) If the will is held against the lower forces that put it into work, then it is true that it is in the soul like a king in his kingdom: which I also want to prove; but if it is held against grace and God, then it is certainly only servant and servant.

Finally, since he answers Jerome with attraction to another passage of his from lib. 1. against the Pelagians, Col. 12, I would have liked the Doctor to answer to the words I have attracted from Jerome, which attribute to free will its power to act. For to put forward an instance is not to answer. But one must answer what is interjected.

Carlstadt wanted to draw a conclusion from Eck's objections and what he almost admitted; but Eck argued very cleverly: the time was up, and he did not concede everything to Carlstadt either. The matter was then brought to the regents (rectores) and superiors, according to whose judgment the matter was postponed to another hour.

Corner at 3 o'clock.

Since the word of the servant has been explained by the apostle's word, "I have labored more than all, yet not I, but the grace of GOD which is with me," 2c., I will show more strongly in reply that the apostle meant to say as much in that place: that both he and the Grace have worked, except the explanation, which I have attached yesterday from Hieronymus. For so St. Bernard de grat. et lib. arb., Col. 15, expressly assures me. Hence Paul, when he had related many things which GOD had done through him, says at last, "Not but I, but the grace of GOD with me." He could say: through me; but he rather wanted to say, what is more, 1) "With me"; in that he thereby indicates that he is not a servant by tool effect, but as it were a journeyman of the active one, by attunement. There can be nothing clearer than these words, which alone should convict the opponent, because St. Bernard does not refer to the apostle as a mere servant, but as a journeyman of the effect. After this, the same Bernard teaches in the same Columne that grace and free will together are the complete cause of a meritorious work. According to his statement, I do not divide the meritorious work in such a way that it comes partly from grace and partly from free will. Bernhard's words are these: But it works this with free will in such a way that it precedes it at first, but accompanies it for the rest. No doubt this is why it precedes him, so that he afterwards works together with it, but in such a way that what grace alone has begun is afterwards accomplished by both of them, mixed with each other; not separately, so that they work together at the same time, not alternately, through all good works. Here the holy father explains not only the causality or activity of free will, but also its nature.

Fourthly, did the doctor want to know from me whether I wanted to answer the reasons that his glory would give against me in this? To this I answered in the affirmative, because I had taken such a long way to do so. But what he has stated without need of more than one, wiser than I may judge: whether all religious theologians, even the secular theologians, are to be held in such contempt for 400 years, as if Christ, who promised to remain with us until the end of the world, had left his bride. For my own part, since I am now dealing with theological matters, I do not want to take upon myself the protection of Aristotle, but I know this much to comfort philosophers and philosophers, that Aristotle is praised by the highest and most learned men, whose judgment already has so much to say, and their honesty in praise is so unadulterated, that one cannot reject it in the least. How then do I

I could also easily attract Cicero, Quintilianus, Plato and others. However, as I said earlier, I am now dealing with theological matters and will not take up philosophy.

Carlstadt expressed his sympathy over the reasons put forward by Eck.

To know the Scriptures is not to recite a heap of testimonies from one's head, but to seek and taste the spirit contained in the Scriptures and our Lord Christ, and also to present the testimonies according to the sense of the writers. Therefore, the doctor reproaches me in vain for having come to the disputation yesterday with a prepared lecture.

Regarding the testimony that the Doctor brings forward from Augustine: namely, that Augustine does not abolish the faculty of free will, I say: I have never doubted that grace makes free will effective. Secondly, Ambrose de vocatione gentium is clear that free will receives its effect from grace. On Jerome's testimony against the Pelagians, I say exactly what Jerome also widely proves. In Augustine lib. 3. hypogn. whose testimony he cited, that grace behaves against free will/as the rider does against the horse: so I answer that the Doctor reads Augustine with dark eyes, and cites Augustine against his opinion. Augustine's words are these: And laid him on his beast, that is, on the help of the grace of the Incarnation, since, as it is written, he bore our sins. This is what Augustine says. So the likeness is even greater, that the free will behaves against grace, as a weak, wounded man behaves against the beast that carries him away.

Cyprian's testimony does not prove a special effectiveness of the free will. But there are other testimonies of the same Cyprian, which clearly say that Christ works all good works in the free will.

That the doctor admits that free will has no special efficacy in good works, we accept with all thanks, and we are surprised that he is of such an extraordinarily different opinion and contradicts himself so much in the same dispute and at the same hour. But it is not without suspicion that he had other thoughts, since he draws testimonies by which he wants to prove that free will has such efficacy. I am also satisfied with Jacob's testimony, since he says: "All perfect gift comes" 2c.

As for Bernard's saying: that grace undoubtedly precedes for the purpose that it [free will] may henceforth work with it, that what grace alone has begun may be carried on by both alike, in a mixed, not single, way, nor even alternately, in all good conduct, not partly by grace, partly by free will, but that both do everything in an inseparable way: so in Bernardus himself follows the further explanation: The whole indeed does this (that is, the free will), and the whole (namely, the good work) does this, namely, grace: but as everything in it, that is, the free will, so everything happens from it, namely, grace. So the understanding is this: grace works the good works in the free will, and so grace has the efficacy of the good works, but the free will has the receiving; namely, what the same Bernard says Col. 1 in the very book de grat. et l.

arb.: This work cannot happen without two, namely one, from whom it, the other, to and in whom it happens. According to this, the good works are rather accomplished in the free will than that they happen through the effectiveness of the free will. For Bernard immediately adds and says: God is the author of blessedness, free will is only the recipient or capable of it. Note the word "only", which only allows the ability and takes away the effectiveness. It follows in Bernhardus further: No one can give such (blessedness) but God, nor can anything else seize it but free will. And again: Consequently, free will rather receives good works than works them out; indeed, it does not do good works. Bernard lists three kinds of creatures through which God works salvation or blessedness: namely, through the creature, without it; sometimes through the creature, against it; and sometimes through the creature, with it. Through the unreasonable creature he works without it, because it, since it has no understanding/) cannot even know about it; through the devils and the ungodly he sometimes works salvation against them; but through the pious in such a way that God works with them, who both do and will what God wants. For those who agree with the will do 2) the work of the Lord; what God accomplishes through them He communicates to them. Therefore Paul says: "It is not I, but the grace of God.

tes with me." He could say: through me. But he rather wanted to say what was more 3): "with me", that he did not make himself merely a servant through (tool) effect, but as it were a journeyman through attunement. Bernard does not mean that the free will has any effect in a good work, which God or grace did not create, but that the grace of God gives the will the good attunement, and therefore, he says, it is less said: through me; 4) because God works through some creatures without the same attunement; namely, when he works through unreasonable creatures, or through the godless against their will.

Corner, on the other hand.

Although I must confess the low nature of my teaching, which the respectable doctor holds contemptible, I may nevertheless, with permission, in order to become more learned, say the following against the given answer. For, that he introduces Augustine, when he says: grace makes free will work, he thereby gives us right. For since grace makes free will work, the effect of grace is not in vain; therefore free will will also work something. Ambrose's saying does not serve his opinion well either. For, let it be that free will receives the effect from grace, the conclusion is nevertheless wrong that therefore free will does not work, since not only free will but also other creatures receive the effect from God, so that one may rightly say: When the main cause stops working, all the other lower causes cease to work. The fire also receives its warming power from the Creator, but that is why it warms. But when the respectable doctor says that I looked at Augustine with stupid eyes, I wish that he could see as sharply as I do. But the doctor has accepted for himself one passage that was not attracted, but he has left alone the other one that was attracted. For Augustine acts in the passage attracted for me in the 3rd book against the Pelagians, book, m, since he says: I hold that free will can rightly be compared to the animal; hence also there it says: I have become like a beast before you, but grace with him who sits on it. This allegory leads

1) We have retained the reading that both the manuscript and the print offer: intlisstu Cursus, while Lösscher has put instead of sarsns: prassns, because the latter seemed to him to run counter to the sense.
2) Here we have inserted Lusiunt. Without a change or an addition, the sentence is untranslatable.

3) minus for masus. (Walch.)

4) Minus one sees that it has been quite improved above, by: the several: or one must make above from maluit noluit if minus is to remain. (Walch.)

I do this so that the learned doctor or anyone else will not blaspheme that I have only read the school teachers and that I am only a school theologian, while others are true scholars of God.

That our friend answered Cyprianus: Cyprianus has very often written that Christ works all good in us, so I am in trouble, about which I have also complained in the past, that he does not answer the objections as well as give me an answer. For what Cyprianus otherwise taught I do not want to deny, but I maintain that his opinion of the free will's ability in the cited passage is correct.

The excellent doctor thanks me for agreeing with his opinion and for not granting free will its own effectiveness for the good. But with permission, he states our things in a mutilated way. For I gladly conceded that free will has no special efficacy that grace does not create, but that grace and free will accomplish the good work inseparably with each other, according to Bernhard's testimony, which I have cited. To this the Doctor answered us with a lengthy narration of many of Bernard's words. But since the following would be more suitable for him if he were to make objections than if he were to give an answer, I would still like to know whether free will is merely suffering in relation to a good work, since Bernhard says that grace and free will are mixed and accomplish the same thing at the same time! And would also like to know how Bernard understands the difference between the work begun and the work to be accomplished? If free will behaves in a purely suffering way, it will behave in the same way when it receives for the beginning and when it receives for the completion.

In the same way, the respectable doctor and friend of Bernhardus draws words around from St. Paul. But I would like to know what Bernhardus says elsewhere: if he considered Paul to be a co-worker of grace through attunement, what this attunement is other than the effect of free will. And that this is quite certain, for this I cite the words of Augustine, which cannot be twisted at all, from the fourth treatise on the epistle of St. John, where the holy father treats the words of this holy writer: "Everyone who has such hope in him purifies himself, just as he also is pure." Behold, he says, how he has not snatched away the free will, since he has given said, "Purify yourselves." Who justifies you but God? But God does not justify you against your will, but because you add your will to God's, He justifies you; He does not purify you from yourself, but from the one who wanted to dwell in you. But because you do something with your will, something is also added to you. But it is added unto thee, that thou shouldest say, according to Ps. 27:9, Thou art my helper, forsake me not." When you say, "You are my helper," you also do something; for if you do nothing, why is he given to help? This is what Augustine says. By this he clearly shows that we are given effectiveness, and by the fact that God helps us, he seeks to prove that we also do something ourselves. And certainly, if Augustine had not wanted to defend the law and ability of free will, which the wise man (Sirach) has indicated above, in his books everywhere, then the dear father would not have been so hostile to Julianus lib. 4, 6. 8. that he also said: he was lying, that he had pretended that Augustine had abolished free will.

Carlstadt's response.

To the first, second, third, and sixth arguments I say that grace does indeed give efficacy to free will; and this I have never denied, but only this, that free will has a special and natural efficacy in good works. Hereby I answer the long discourse which the Doctor drew from the fourth treatise of Augustine on the epistle of John. For I gladly admit that God is the helper of free will, that is, gives power and effect to free will.

Thirdly, that the free will is compared to an animal does not serve the cause and purpose of the excellent doctor. For free will is certainly a beast, that it may be tamed and prepared for necessary good works; but that it may be restored to health, grace is also called (the Samaritan's) beast (that carries the wounded), as we have sufficiently shown from the beginning of this doctrinal struggle.

To the fourth I answer on account of Cyprian that it is incumbent on the opponent to prove and expound his speeches so that they can be understood. But Cyprian's saying, because it is doubtful, will never conclude that free will has a special efficacy by nature; as above.

With regard to Bernardus, the Doctor would like to know and understand how a pious and justified person is a journeyman of the working grace.

It has been answered sufficiently that this takes place because of consent, which, however, grace imparts to free will itself.

Eck dawider.

Although our friend, the respectable Doctor, finally drawn over to my opinion, freely admits that he has never denied the efficacy of free will, which he received from grace, I have nevertheless been able to surmise from many of his writings and other various circumstances that the Doctor is of the opinion as if free will has no efficacy at all in a good work; firstly because of his 14th conclusion, 1) since he says: Since D. John does not see how a good work is entirely from God 2c. Next, because my 7th conclusion 2) clearly states this: He errs who denies that free will 2c. Thirdly, because the venerable father D. Martin Luther speaks against me in the 7th conclusion 3): [Who shows that he does not know] neither what faith, nor what repentance [nor what free will is] 2c. And just the venerable father in a printed disputation Col. 13 speaks: Free will after the fall has only the empty name or title; and Col. 14: Free will after the fall to the good 2c. Fourth, because the honorable Doctor often writes in his "defense": free will only suffers and does not work for good; as is evident from b 4. facie 2. and c 2. fac. 1. and g 4. fac. 1. and fac. 2. and in many other places, where the honorable Doctor says: the will alone receives, but does not work. However, if he gives the free will an efficacy that it has from grace, I am already satisfied. If he had admitted such a thing from the beginning of our disputation, namely, that grace and free will work together and mixed, we would not have had to argue against each other. And that he says that St. Augustine, lib. 3. hypogn., who will probably be attracted to me rightly and with good eyes, does not serve the point: so perhaps the respectable gentleman, as people can easily forget something, will not remember that I attracted Augustine. My purpose was to show that grace and free will together would be quite a complete cause of the meritorious work; but in such a way that grace would be the noblest, but free will the lesser (minus principalem) cause. To this my proposition

1) Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 717.

2) St. Louis edition, ibid., Col. 713.

3) St. Louis edition, 1. e. Col. 719. Here one can see in which way Eck citirt.

The symbol of Augustine, who compares grace to the rider, as the most noble cause, and free will to the horse, as the lesser cause, is undoubtedly suitable, according to the opinion of all.

Carlstadt's response.

In the first place, since the Doctor takes from my 14th conclusion that free will has no efficacy, I agree with him as far as natural efficacy is concerned, but as far as the efficacy which grace confers is concerned, I say that free will has an efficacy. But perhaps the doctor does not want to understand either me or St. Bernard, who says that each individual (namely, grace and free will) accomplishes the whole thing in an inseparable way; who therefore attributes efficacy or active action to free will, because the grace of God works in it, so I also attribute efficacy to free will? For the free will acts or works, because in it is worked; as the running is not of the running.

He is satisfied with the other things and did not want to argue about the words: animal, rider 2c.

I cannot be surprised enough that the excellent doctor wants to reject our things at his discretion, 4) since he says: I thought that the respectable doctor believed that free will had no efficacy.

Eck, who did not trust himself with anything good, here interfered with Carlstadt's speech that he should not use a piece of paper or a book; and in order that he might boast of his clever and cunning head, as if he alone deserved praise and the prize of victory with his wit, he said that this was the way of arguing in Italy, that no books were brought forward, but everything was stated from the head, which was the only thing that mattered here. Carlstadt often made humble objections against this. Eck shouted in the middle of the meeting: "The matter will be brought to the prince and the superiors. The most prominent people also stepped down and spoke together, but their judgment aroused more suspicion than justice. Most of them were of the opinion that Carlstadt should leave out the books. This opinion was accepted by all, and Caesar Pflug made a speech with the following content: "Gracious sir, and honorable gentlemen. There has now arisen a contradiction between the worthy gentlemen D. Eck and Carlstadt, namely, that Doctor Eccius did not want to yield to Doctor Carlstadt to read his argument from a book or a piece of paper, and threw himself on the use and practice of other universities and customs, saying that it is not customary to dispute from books. Therefore, Doctor Eccius, out of special request, has yielded to Doctor Carlstadt, from the note today; but if they will not comply with such an objection tomorrow, and henceforth complete their disputation as raised, we will be well satisfied." 1)

4) On the margin it says: Carlstadt read this from a piece of paper.

Carlstadt, however, did not adhere to the theologians' judgment, and finally, after listening to the speech, they unanimously left their place and ran out to the auditorium with a crowd. There everyone shouted that the disputation would now end.

In the evening, however, immediately corners were again scheduled for the following day, firstly because many famous people would have come together from afar; secondly, so that such an important matter would not become a mockery.

July 1, 1519 early at 8 o'clock.

Carlstadt.

The excellent doctor seems to have set some repugnant and self-contradictory things in the matter of faith. Therefore, I will first of all ask the doctor to discuss this with me.

But it is this repugnance in the beginning of his disputation. There he says that free will, which receives help from grace, has its special and natural efficacy in good works. Afterwards, however, in the further course of the disputation, he said that it had never occurred to him that free will had a special efficacy that grace did not create.

Now here I ask: Since having efficacy from another is not the same as having it from oneself, but something foreign, not something proper to man; how such speech contending with itself may be united, so that we do not contend in wind and in vain?

This happened on June 28 early Wider the 11th thesis.

Eck's response.

The respectable doctor and friend pretends that in the past few days I have brought things into dispute with myself, because in the beginning of the disputation I attributed to free will its own, natural and special efficacy in good works, and afterwards claimed that such a thing had never occurred to me:

Thus I answer and say that neither at the beginning of the disputation nor during its progress did I ever say that free will has a natural efficacy in regard to the good work, but in opposition to the Doctor I only assumed it in order to prove that free will has a causal capacity to produce the good work if it is assisted by grace.

1) The preceding speech of Caesar Pflug is German in our original.

Postscript of the notaries. Therefore, since I have added the help of grace, I have attributed to the will not a natural, but a supernatural efficacy, which has been imparted to it by grace, in which opinion I still persist.

That the doctor from this brings forward a double conclusion (dilemma) by asking: whether then to have efficacy from another is not so much as to have an alien efficacy and no efficacy of one's own; and whether that therefore is not so much as to have it not from or of oneself, but from another?

So I answer: that to have an efficacy communicated by another is as much as to have one's own. And although the Doctor has not put on anything for his speech, nevertheless, in order to strengthen my answer, I cite in this matter the testimony of St. Jerome to the virgin Demetrias: Thus, he says, since God willed to endow the rational creature with the gift of a voluntary good and the part of a free will, namely, that he might reach for both things, he gave him the quality of being able to will, so that, being capable of evil and good, he might by nature be able to do both, and the will incline to one of the two. For man cannot have the name that he chooses the good voluntarily, if he cannot also choose the evil. The Creator has given both to our ability. Jerome expressly testified to this and said that man has both abilities as his own. Therefore, this is completely in accordance with the way the holy fathers speak.

But I want to add this to the rest: one must interpret the own effect of free will in such a way that it includes the effectiveness, but does not exclude the participation of another cause.

Finally, I admit that free will has its own and special efficacy for good works, but such as God and grace give.

Carlstadt's response.

The world may judge! 2)

For the other, I ask the doctor: How could there be two causes of one and the same good work, both of which produce the whole work; as St. Bernard, whom he attracted, says? For if not one of them has to do with it in a suffering way, but the other in an acting way, it is difficult to understand how the whole work of both comes into being completely or totally?

2) This is missing in the manuscript.

Eck's response.

Since the most respectable gentleman and friend wants to know from me how two causes, namely grace and free will, each of which can produce and work the whole work, without understanding it in such a way that the one appears to be suffering, but the other to be working and active in it?

So I answer that to everyone who has only looked around a little in philosophy, the question is quite easy and clear, which concerns the kind of interaction of the causes in one thing. For I readily admit that each of these causes produces the whole. But that the doctor finally put the words: completely and totally, we do not accept, because Bernhardus says in the same place that they act in a mixed way or with each other, not alternately. For no one may imagine that many 1) causes work together in such a way that one cause performs one part and the other the other, as the doctor believed in his "defense" when he answers my fortieth sentence 2). For there he says: He binds the rod with which he will receive blows, and to some extent he deviates from what he has absorbed from Scotus. 3) But that would be too bold a beginning, writes Ambrose at the end of the epistle, that one would only want to need God's good actions in one piece, but not in the other. And in the thirty-second sentence he concludes thus against me: If a good work is partly in your ability, then it is something after this part. 4) Therefore I have said in refutation of this: that this is contrary to all philosophy and true concept, since one imagines that a partial cause produces only one piece. And that this is so, I prove from all the order of causes. The fire also warms; 5) St. John says: All things were created by God. Therefore, this can be understood by a person not ignorant of philosophy quite easily and without difficulty in this matter of ours. St. Bernard 6) asserts this about free will, as far as I remember.

1) It is to be read piurlum instead of piurirnurn.

2) In Latin, by mistake, propoui stands for propositiorü.

Carlstadt's response.

The fact that the doctor arms himself with pagan weapons in a theological dispute, he does according to his nature, but does not yet satisfy me. I therefore ask in one word: Is the good work entirely of God (effective) or not? If he admits the first, we are one; if he denies it, I reject his proposition.

Corner.

When the respectable doctor accuses me of arming myself with pagan weapons in theological matters, I answer that since I do it with weapons that have not been thrown down, I should think that it should not be held against me, because the greatest people in all times have done the same, even, along with the church fathers, St. Paul. Paul; however, I wonder how he could blame me for such a thing at this time, since with all diligence I do not cite the theologians, whom he calls school teachers, nor the great wonder of nature, Aristotle, and in the answer to two questions I have attracted nothing but Jerome, Bernard and St. John. But that the venerable Doctor asks: whether the meritorious work is entirely of God in an active way? this is already answered; for he could quite well see that God performs the whole (totum) meritorious work in an active way, but not completely (totaliter), which is clear from Chrysostom's "of the contrition of the heart," lib. I.: For we can also give these heretics an occasion in the cause of faith, because the apostles and all the saints did not become admirable from their excellency and work, but from the grace of God alone; for they will say: What hinders that all do not become such people? 2c., and consequently. And St. Bernard agrees above that they do not work piecemeal, but together and blended.

Carlstadt.

The contradiction that the doctor brings up anew, not to mention the "completely" and "not completely", may, as far as Aristotle is concerned in theological dispute, tell us Jerome's opinion lib. I., Col. 9 against the Pelagians: I do not ask, he says, what Aristotle teaches, but what Paul teaches.

For the rest, since the excellent doctor admits that the good work is entirely from God, I will rather approve than disapprove. But I prove it from the little prayer that the Roman Church prays every year.

O God, from whom all good things come, grant to us who humbly ask you that we may think what is right by your inspiration 2c. The text is clear that all good comes from God, and the Lord Himself bestows and gives right thoughts.

Corner.

Since the esteemed Doctor holds up St. Jerome to me, who says in the place mentioned: I do not ask what Aristotle says, but what Paul says, so I do not intend, as I might well do, to defend Aristotle, nor have I yet used Aristotle in this business; but only this I have said, that I could use the unthrown weapons of the Gentiles, and receive gold and silver from the Egyptians, as unlawful owners, just as Origen draws this fact to it; therefore, of course, one must be more concerned with Jerome about Paul than about Aristotle.

After that, the respectable Doctor assumes that I have admitted that the good meritorious work is entirely from God, working way, and he seeks to confirm that. But I ask the Doctor to consider what role he has on himself, and that it is not his place to prove or confirm my things, but to reject them. The church prayer is therefore not repugnant to me, but confirms my opinion, for it certainly says that God bestows good, and that help comes from God, but does not therefore exclude free will.

He added: all school teachers would be of the opinion. But also after the end of this proof v. Carlstadt added that the teachers of theology, whom he calls school teachers, held the same.

Carlstadt.

Capreolus has the opinion: that the free will causat the essence of the work, and the Holy Spirit the manner. Scotus, however, holds the distinction that according to the principalitatem entitatis in a good work, the will is the principal cause, but according to the meritorious essence, grace is then the principal cause.

Corner.

Because I have said: that the best theologians, whom the highly venerable 1) Doctor calls schoolteachers, did not depart from this Christian opinion, namely that all the good work of

The respectable doctor has held up two of them to me, Capreolus, who is not very well known to me, and the sensible Scotus, whom I have read only too diligently. Although the main point of the dispute is not what this or that teacher holds, but what we should hold and believe according to Christian truth, I will nevertheless excuse these good people, lest one have unjust thoughts of them.

The passage from Capreolus has not attracted the Doctor according to the place; but I believe certainly that he was of the opinion, what also his guide has asserted quite clearly in various places, I mean, St. Thomas Aquinas, the great church light, in 12. y. 109. 109, especially art. 6. in qu. 24. of the truth, in the beautiful book against the pagans lib. 3. and other places, where the holy father everywhere slackens and admits: the free will is not capable of a good meritorious work, if it is not supernaturally moved by God and grace; thereby he cites Jerome and Augustine with the passages of the Bible, which the holy fathers thought of.

But as for Scotus, nay, the whole host of the best theologians who have written theological Summaries, the respectable Doctor should have looked at the right seat of this doctrine, where by them the Summa of the present trade is dealt with, which is not done Dist. 17. of the first book, in the 27. and 8. of the second, where he will find Thomas, Aegidius, Albertus, Durandus, Gabriel, and others, all of whom, according to Peter Lombard, unanimously maintain that free will by itself, without special and supernatural help from God, is capable of evil, but of no good works, so much so that the inner inspiration of God precedes all good impulses of the will. In this connection, Bonaventure and others cite the very strange saying of St. Augustine, which I remember in my "defense," that it alone is enough to remove all difficulty in the matter. For in the 25th sentence I said: 2) Therefore, for all the sayings that must be cited for 3) each of the two parties, Augustine's excellent solution is sufficient; whoever does not have it, easily gets into danger between door and hinge, for that is the art of putting each in its proper place.

1) col. will have to be resolved by eolenaues.

2) Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 701.

3) Instead of per, read pro.

bring. This saying of Augustine is found in c. 21. de dogmatibus ecclesiast. and is also repeated in the book de Spir.: The beginning of our salvation we have from God's mercy; that we give room to the salutary giving is in our power; that we attain what we desire by such willing and giving room is a divine gift; that we do not fall in the attained gift of salvation is both in our ability and at the same time in the divine help.

St. Bonaventure and others want Augustine to have made four scales in order to assign to each its own, although Bernard Col. 15 only thinks of three: First, the beginning is God's; second, the consenting or the giving in is of the will; third, the grace is God's alone. According to this scale one must understand Bernard when he speaks Col. 1: God is the author of salvation, the free will is only capable of it. For Bernhard does not refer the ability to the good work, as the Doctor said, but to grace. To the third stage Augustine adds that neither anyone gives it as God, nor anyone receives it as free will, namely by considering the salvation of which Bernard speaks. Thus the free will is merely receiving.

Therefore, in his "defense," the doctor blasphemes me without cause for having praised the praiseworthy saying of Augustine: that I tear up the holy Scriptures, bite the holy church teachers, and wonders at my insolence that I put on Augustine so wrongly; while he nowhere remembers this passage of Augustine.

From this it is evident that the best and most heavenly theologians, whom he calls school teachers, have rightly asserted grace against Pelagius, and have not taken away the effectiveness of free will. I ask, however, that the doctor prove to the schoolteachers and to me that free will behaves only in a suffering way against a good meritorious work.

Carlstadt.

As for the school teachers, whom the excellent doctor cites and wants to understand alone, he may rather distort them. For the opinion of Scotus and Capreolus is clear, that they ascribe what is causally effective in a good work to free will, so much so that they also say that free will in some works affects the essence of the deed, which can continue until God pours in his grace.

But this I will prove, 1) that free will without grace and faith can do no good work, neither according to the nature of the work, nor according to the wisdom or the meritorious quality. And that the Doctor does not slip out of my hands by his circumlocutions, before I explain Augustine and Bernard, whose words he quotes and falsifies the sayings; I ask him again and request of the Doctor that he tell me: what then is that which in a good work works causally with grace? for that is what the scholastics teach, so may their advocate also teach it.

Corner.

I am very surprised that the respectable doctor calls the holy teachers Thomas, Bonaventure and others immodestly mercatores. And yet he reproaches me as if I alone understand and falsify the school teachers.

Let this be far from Eck's modesty, to boast so honorably; for I not only do not understand all, but also not as if others did not know just as much, from whom I would also like to be instructed, if they can do more.

But as for the explanation and interpretation which the respectable Doctor attaches to the sayings of Scotus and the school teachers, when they say that free will is the main cause of the essence of action, so that the will can continue the same by production until God pours in His grace: I do not remember to have read such a thing in any scholastic theologian; but they admit that grace is given and created by God instantaneously, and hold this to be truth: The Holy Spirit's grace does not come slowly.

It is true that if the respectable doctor is so well versed in the school teachers that they argue among themselves: whether grace, just like God Himself, has the principalitatem activitatis in the good work or not? not all agree on this. However, Wilhelm Occam in his Bedenken, addit. 4, also attributes efficacy to grace; and that I also had this opinion seven years ago, the Doctor could clearly see from the Crysopasso praedestinationis, if he had read it as diligently as he immodestly despises it. But be that as it may, the schoolteachers are themselves one with regard to the efficacy of grace, that the free will for good works has nothing to do with it.

1) improkare should mean prokars. (Walch.)

2) niotnm should mean moium. (Walch.)

The first is that the people are not able to be neither in essence nor in quality, but by the extraordinary help of God.

Finally, when the doctor asks me: what is it that the good work causally works in the essence of the action? then the doctor has promised himself, and wanted to say: what is it in the essence of an action that the free will actually causally works? I answer that this question was answered long before it arose; for in the essence of an action there are not pieces in such a way as in the mines, but, as St. Bernard says, God and free will act in an undifferentiated way. Therefore, I ask once again that the respectable Doctor prove that the free will is only suffering in good works, and that it receives only in this way. For I am ready to drive off his projectile in this in a manly way.

Carlstadt then said that he called them (the fathers) shopkeepers because they preached with profit of souls.

Carlstadt at four o'clock, the holy evening before the Visitation of the Virgin Mary [July 1].

The excellent Doctor has entrenched his cause today with many fortifications that I lay down his, many strength.

First of all, I want to say what is to be thought of Jerome's letter to the virgin Demetrias, as the most distinguished prince of theologians, our Erasmus, after Augustine, uses the following words about it: "It is a very learned and eloquent letter, but the way it is written almost alone obviously betrays that it is not by Jerome. St. Augustine seems to assume to some extent that it was written by a Pelagian heretic, because one thing and another in it smacks of Pelagian teachings. Beda thinks that it is from the heretic Julianus. From this it is easy to conclude how much the answer of the excellent doctor is worth, which he confirms from such a letter.

Secondly. Furthermore, when the excellent Doctor cites Augustine in the book de dogmatibus ecclesiast. 6. 21.: There is the beginning of our salvation 2c., the Doctor must also consider what follows e. 44. where this saying is written: If anyone thinks that by virtue of nature one can agree with evangelical preaching, he is deceived by a heretic spirit. Therefore, to obey divine inspiration or preaching is a gift from God. I refer him to lib. I. Retract. c. 10, where he says: that all men can keep God's commandments, if they want to; let none of the new

The Lord has prepared this for the heretics and Pelagians, as if it were for them. For it is true that all men can do this if they will, but the will is prepared by the Lord.

Thirdly. To what has been drawn from Bernhardus Col. 15, I say in refutation of the answer of the Herr Doctor, that St. Bernhardus attributes all three scales, as the Herr Doctor calls them, to GOtte, and not to free will. His words are thus: The words are not mine, but the apostle's, who attributes everything that can be good, that is, thinking, willing, and doing according to his good pleasure, to GOtte, not to his free will. Now if God works these three things, that is, thinking, willing, and doing good, in us, the first certainly without us, the other with us, that is, through the attunement which the Holy Spirit imparts, as is evident in the preceding Columnne: it follows that the excellent Lord Doctor endeavors to defend his cause more than to defend well, to follow his mind more than to accept faith. For in matters of faith, one need not use the weapons of heretics.

Fourth. It sounds very strange to my ears that God works the whole good work, but not entirely; and that this sounds inconsistent to right theologians, for this I refer primarily to Augustine's book dono¹ persev. c. 13, where he says: "So we will, but God also works in us the will. We thus work, but God also works in us the working or doing according to His good pleasure, "God works the good work in us". This is also useful for us to believe and to say. It is godly, it is truthful, so that there may be a truly humble and devoted confession that everything is attributed to God: with thinking we believe, with thinking we speak, with thinking we work what we do. But as far as the way of truth and right worship are concerned, we are not even capable of thinking anything of ourselves, but our capability is from God. This may be considered by those who ascribe to free will the efficacy in good works. For our heart and our thoughts are not in our power. The Church confesses this in the prayer: God of hosts, whose all that is good is 2c., therefore good works are entirely from God. Cyprian also teaches this in the Lord's Prayer about the petition: Lead us not into temptation, and in the epistle c. 2 in the book to the martyrs, whose words are these: In his struggle has been (Christ) who has the fighters and defenders of his name are raised up, strengthened, encouraged, and always victorious in us. Behold, he clearly says that Christ conquers in the martyrs, referring to Matt. 10:20: "It is not you who speak, but it is your Father's Spirit who speaks in you," as if he were saying, "It is not you who conquer, but it is Christ who conquers in you. This is beautifully described in 2 Chron. 20:15: "Thus saith the Lord, Fear not this multitude: for the battle is not yours, but God's." Behold, the Jews contend, and yet the Scriptures attribute victory to GOD. Therefore the same Cyprianus, in the same place, in the following Columnne, says: "Who is not of the kind to look only out of His servants; but He Himself contends in us, He wrestles and struggles with, He Himself crowns in the strife of our battle, and is crowned also. Now since David rightly confessed 1 Chron. 29 [30,14.], "All things are thine, and of thy hand have we given thee"; as if he said, "We can give thee nothing that we have not received of thee, and we have nothing that thou hast not given. Hence St. Jerome, in the book against the Pelagians, lib. 1, col. 3, and lib. 2, col. 15. says: "And that we may see that all we do is goodness from God," he says: I will plant them, that they be not cut off; and I will give them such a heart and mind, that they shall know me. If thoughts and mind come from God, where is the proud boasting of free will? From this it can be seen that good works are entirely of God. But that the Doctor says: not entirely, he does so in order to keep it the same as the differently minded, that is, the church teachers and the scholastics; for one never finds with them that the whole work is of God; just as, on the other hand, it is not found with them either that the good works are not entirely of God; where I remember otherwise.

So I wish the excellent Doctor, who strongly contested my 14th conclusion, luck that he now agrees with my opinion, yes, with the opinion of the Holy Spirit, and says: that the whole good work is brought forth by God.

That much I have wanted to say now. From the Bible, I must say other things.

Corner.

As the doctor rejects our answer with many words and read testimonies from the books, and tries to destroy the conclusion or implication of it, I say: First, let it be with the judgment of Erasmus and the venerable Bede as it is (scil. of the Jerome's letter), in that they assume more than they judge, it is not unseemly that one has put on a writer's book, which one otherwise tends to put on as one's own. For the doctor uses such little handles in his "defense" against me with the book de eccles. dogm., where it is right for me; especially since the same opinion agrees with the holy fathers, as also that which I have quoted from Jerome. For so Augustine speaks in the book de sententiis Prosperi, that to have faith, as to have love, is man's nature. But the respectable Doctor forgives me that it has a different nature with disputants who reject or refute the answer. For my answer together with the proof would have had to be completely overturned if he wanted to get the victory as he meant. Secondly, that the respectable Doctor does as he is wont to do, namely, he does not destroy the objections, but only tries to invalidate them with other passages that, as he thinks, contradict them. To the 20th chapter of Augustine's de eccles. dogm., where he clearly says: it is in our power to accede to the input 2c., he answers nothing, but sends me far down to chap. 44 and 10 of the Retr., since what is said there immediately leads to the answer, also to the way in which the Doctor reads; Augustine scolds those who think that they merely want to follow the preaching by force of nature, without divine impulse, which is a hundred miles away from our opinion.

The doctor also added that I take these secondary things with me: Augustine does not need an interpreter, but only a reader; so I wonder why he interpreted Augustine, as they say.

Thirdly, he presents St. Bernard as if he does not serve our cause at all. I am highly surprised about this, since no living person will read St. Bernard who does not see that he completely agrees with us in all parts. For St. Bernard says: in the first part we do nothing, and there we behave only in a suffering way; not even in the last, but in the middle, that is, in the consent that God works with us at the same time, as he says.

However, something has also been attributed to us, according to Augustine's opinion. And I do not accept the venerable Doctor's interpretation, of which he says that it is, that also the meaning is given. Otherwise, the first, the middle and the last would all be the same, and God would have to do everything completely and totally according to the Doctor, that St. Bernard would be completely overthrown in this passage. Regarding the other main piece, where I am not mistaken, the honorable Doctor, before he endeavored to prove his intention, unconfidently insulted me that I was arguing more for my cause than for the cause of faith; and since I thought he was a party, he set himself up as a judge. However, I will continue to destroy his cause 1).

The respectable Doctor promises that he now wants to prove that the meritorious work is both 'wholly and completely from God; and I have long since asked him to read from the Fathers of the Church that free will is merely incidental to the good work. I do not want to say that he seeks deviations, but only that he does not want to let that which is the main thing come to light.

But let us look at what has been said. By referring to Augustine Libr. de dono 2) persev. c. 13, where he says: We will, but in what we will, the will is prepared by the Lord, who works in us; so the Doctor has especially laid great stress on the little word: "in us". I do not know, however, if this has much to do with anything, especially since such a testimony cannot prove more than that the good work is entirely of God; as also the following passages: that it is entirely of God, however, is not indicated by any letter.

But let the Doctor know above all that the meritorious effect is an inherent, and not a temporary, action (immanentem, non transeuntem), for which reason he must not be surprised that God works the will in us; for what is worked apart from man confers nothing on him. So also in the church prayer: GOD of hosts, whose is all that is good 2c., I confess that all good gifts are from above. So also I say of Cyprianus and of that which he put on; for I confess that all good is from GOD, and also say that it is wholly from GOD; but not wholly, because it is also by our cooperation. "For we are GOD's fellow-workers," 1 Cor. 3:8. and the apostles preached the Gospel of GOD, by the co-operation of GOD, Marc. 16:20. Therefore all our efficiency is of GOD. And as the apostle says: What do you have that you have not received? This, however, as we have already said, praises God's special and supernatural impulse, but does not cancel the free will. Therefore, I do not know to whom the respectable doctor sang the little song when he admonishes those who do not want free will to be effective.

1) Instead of praspositum, propositum will have to be read. 2) Again, our original has douo instead of äouo.

The testimonies quoted from Cyprian make it clear that they should think better of it. From 2 Chron. 20, the Lord Doctor says, "Fear not this multitude," 2c., and David's words, "All things, O Lord, are thine," 2c., as if a man were so stupid and unintelligent as not to know that all good must be ascribed to the Creator of all things. For the Herr Doctor should know that the best theologians, whom he calls school teachers, are unanimous in their opinion that no creature can do anything except through God's general or special impulse, so that God does more through the effect of creatures than He does through Himself. The doctor also conceded that free will also has its effectiveness. I did not go over to his opinion, but rather he took the side of the schoolteacher, where he still does not explain to me that free will behaves in a merely suffering way.

And it does no good that he says: he does not remember having read in the Scholastics that a good work is entirely from God. He still chooses to read in it, and not to deprive these holy fathers of their due honor, as Thomas in the places mentioned today; Peter Lombard, the excellent leader, in the distinction mentioned today, with the Strasbourg (argentoratensi) Thomas and others. If the learned doctor will not bring stronger things about this matter, the opinion of the school teachers will remain unconquered: that although the free will in itself is not capable of good works, nevertheless something is given to it by God's cooperation and sleeve, that it purifies itself, as St. John says, and finally deserves to receive what it has done in life and limb; as Augustine in the third book points the retribution of reward or punishment to such understanding.

Carlstadt.

The excellent doctor often accuses me of making a long speech and does not know that he is doing the same.

Here the disputation was stopped from four o'clock until six o'clock, because the short time and the royal highnesses prevented it. However, the herald announced the continuation of the disputation on Sunday at one o'clock.

After the feast of the Visitation of the Virgin Mary, which was on Saturday.

Carlstadt.

I do not respect the fact that the excellent doctor often pushes book reading ahead of me. Yes, the-

It is my wish that only my studies will be known to posterity. By the way, I do not respect that he wants to present me with rules of disputation: for the laws of the disputators and the name of a concluding artist (argutatoris) is abhorrent to me; to dispute in theology means nothing other than to bring out the understanding of Scripture. This serves the first and the second purpose.

Third, the excellent Doctor answers the proof taken from Eccles. docum. c. 43, but he says nothing about Augustine's text from the first book of the Retract. But so that all may see that when Scripture says that we are able to do a good work, it is to be understood that the will to do it has been given to us by God, read Augustine's First Retract. c. 22, where he says: "It is up to a man to change his will for the better, but such ability is nothing if God does not exist.

Fourthly, in his answer, the Doctor drew on St. Bernard, who says that good consent is not without us, or that the middle is counted to our advantage; and from this the Doctor wants to conclude that the will behaves only passively with respect to the first, but actively with respect to the second, therefore the second part of God is whole, but not complete. But it is the other way around. For Bernard says clearly: Although not of us, yet not without us. And further on: We must be careful, then, that when we see this happening invisibly in and with us, we do not attribute some of it to our will, which is weak, but to grace alone. Here I ask the Doctor what Bernard means when he says: grace works with us, and the good work is not of us, but of grace?

To this Eck replied.

Be it as it may with the excuses of the respectable doctor, which it is not my task to refute now, I cannot accept the new proposition that his dignity (excellencia) has brought forward: that disputing in theology is nothing more than interpreting the truth of the holy scripture, since even Augustine does not take disputing so lib. 22. against Faustus, if my memory does not deceive me: heretics (he says) would rather win than dispute, since he thus reproaches them: that they abstain from fighting, not from the study of the holy scriptures.

But that the doctor reproaches me: First-

If you think that I have said nothing about Augustine's passage from the first retract. 6. 10. which I have nevertheless dealt with the 44. cap. de eccl. dogm.: so I have not heard that something important is in it (ponderare). I dare to say that no passage from Augustine is brought forward in which the participation of free will is not taught at the same time.

But that he refers to the 22nd chapter of the same book: it is within man's power to change the will for the better, but not otherwise than when it is given by the Lord, I confess, as I have often testified, that the free will receives its efficacy for good works from God; but when it is given, it has what is given to it, and uses the same; only one must not boast of it, lest Paul's word be held against us, 1 Cor. 4, 7: "What have you that you have not received?" but rather we must recognize with Jeremiah: I know, O LORD, that a man's way is not with him, nor in a man's power, that he should walk and direct his courses. For all this gives both God his due honor, as it leaves to the will its ministerial cooperation; and Augustine unites the foregoing with free will in the second book de pecc. rsmis. 6. 16.

On the second, since the learned doctor thinks that I have not understood St. Bernard correctly, because of what follows, since Bernard says that consent also does not come from us; the doctor would probably not have made the objection if he had followed the tradition of the scholastics. For the little word "from" is, as it were, the root and the reason from which the deed or the work springs. But since the will does no good if it is not pulled, St. Bernard therefore denies that the good work arises from us, and in this he agrees completely with the apostle: that we do not do anything from ourselves, but from the obliging grace of God. This was clearly shown by St. Augustine 1) de vocatione gentium according to the apostolic sense: namely, that the righteous are driven by the Spirit of God, which does no harm to free will. And by this, I think, the respectable Lord's concern is lifted: What a difference there is between the three: In us, which is not enough; out of us, which we do not touch; with us, which is within our ability.

1) In Löscher ^Λ.mdrosius instead of Carlstadt responds to the previous.

The first thing the Doctor says is an evasion.

Let's skip the second one.

But the third, that free will is involved, we must discuss how it is to be taken. For no one is so ignorant as not to know that the willing will and the active will work. But to grasp the understanding of the same, that comes to the theological science.

Furthermore, that the doctor answers: that good works are given to us, and we can use the given ones, I accept as much as is true.

For the sake of brevity, we will not say anything about Bernhardus and the doctor's interpretation of it. But I am confident in the Lord that when it has been proven that the whole good work belongs to both, namely to God in an active way, but to free will in a receiving way, it will be clear that the work is entirely and completely God's, active way. And that this is so, I cite Augustine's testimony from Enchirid. 6. 32. where he says: "If then no Christian may say, 'It is not of the merciful God, but of the willing man, lest he manifestly contradict the apostle,' it must follow that this must be called well spoken: It is not up to anyone to will or to run, but up to God's mercy; so that everything is given to God, who both prepares man's good will so that he can be helped, and helps him when he is prepared; for man's good will precedes many of God's gifts, but not all; but before those it does not precede, among them it is itself. He precedes him that will not, that he may will; but if he will, he follows after him, that he may not will in vain. For why are we exhorted to pray for our enemies, who undoubtedly do not want to live godly, but that God may also work in them the will? Likewise: Why are we exhorted to ask that we may receive, but that what we want may be done by Him who made us want? From these passages one concludes that as God works the willing in us, so also the doing itself; just as Paul also says without distinction that he works in us both the willing and the doing. On the other hand, he concludes that free will also has the good work in its entirety, but in a receiving way, as one receives a gift from another. This is also said by Augustine in the first book Retr. o. 23: Both are because He prepares the will, and both are ours because it does not happen unless we will. And therefore, since we cannot will unless we are called; and if, after we are called, we will, our willing and running is still not enough, unless God gives powers to the running and leads where He calls: it is clear from this how the good work is ours, and how it is God's, and that grace gives foreign powers to free will, through which it works. Therefore Cyrillus writes about John, lib. 2. c. 56, thus: For they cannot do what is pleasing to God unless they are endowed with superior power. Therefore it was said to one of the ancients, "The Spirit of the Lord will come upon you, and you will become a completely different man," 1 Sam. 10, 6. 1) Thus speaks Cyril, who cites other testimonies on this matter. Gregorius also speaks about Ezekiel in the 9th homily in this way: But it must be known that only our evil is ours, but the good of Almighty God and ours, because he precedes us by blowing on us, that we may will, and afterwards helpfully follows, that we may not will in vain. Finally, he concludes that through the prefiguring of God's almighty grace, the gift becomes our merit. From this we see how the good work is both God's and ours. For this he cites Ezekiel's testimony, who says: "The Spirit of God has entered into me and has set me on my feet. This text clearly says that the works of God are to be attributed to the Holy Spirit.

Corner.

When the excellent Doctor says: I have admitted to him that good works are given by God, I deny this; not that I deny that good works are given, but that he assumes that something has been admitted by me, of which nothing has been said; since he very finely cites Augustine from the 22nd chapter of the first book of the Retr. I have admitted that the ability to change the will for the better is given by God. But it is something different that the faculty for good works is given, than that the good work is given; which the Lord Doctor considers to be one and the same. Secondly, the eminent Doctor, in presenting his opinion, seeks to prove that the good work is from God working and receiving from free will. To this I reply: that the Herr Doctor, if he wants this, that the free

1) In Löscher and Walch: "1st Legum 9."

The fact that the free will behaves in a merely receptive way contradicts what he already admits, namely, that the free will also has its efficacy. Now if he does not exclude the efficacy of free will, no one is so nonsensical as to deny that free will behaves in a receiving way toward good works, especially when one speaks of the inward good effect; and it is a well-known saying that, as the active cause and the final purpose often agree, so also the active cause and the matter in which it acts. But let us consider what he states.

First, Augustine in the 32. c. Enchir. in nothing against us. For we have already said so often that the holy fathers, when they say that all good work is done by God, do not thereby deny the participation of free will, but assert God and grace as the main cause. The words of Augustine clearly prove this, for he says: He prepares to be helped and helps when he is prepared. For under the name of help is the efficacy of free will, as he explains in the fourth treatise on the epistle of John the words already mentioned above: If you say, he says, be my helper, then you must do something; if you do nothing, then how does he help you?

That he also attracted the apostle: that God works in us the willing and the doing; so the apostle says, if my memory does not deceive me: who works in us both the willing and the doing according to his good pleasure. Be it as it may, I gladly admit that God works in us the will; but with us, as Bernard says.

That he, on the other hand, refers to St. Augustine from the first book of the Retr. cap. 23. that the good work is, as it were, a gift from God; so I say: one must look at what kind of object (materia subjecta) the writers are talking about. For there Augustine speaks of faith and of love, to which the will is indisputably only incidental. But it is another thing to speak of good works. Nor do we deny what follows: that the will is incapable of good works unless it is called; for every good action of the will is preceded by God's impulse. We also do not deny that God gives powers; but if He gives them, the will will have them in any case. Therefore, we pray to God to precede our good works by giving them, and to succeed us by helping us. On Gregorius we say just the same, who in the books of morals so often rejects the freedom of the will. For we can certainly do nothing that pleases God, if God does not help, who gives grace freely; otherwise grace would not be grace, as the apostle says; and consequently also the good work that comes from it is rightly called God's gift and our merit, according to the word of Augustine to the presbyter Sixtus: If God crowns our merits, he crowns nothing else than his gifts.

Of Cyril and all the others whom one would like to attract, we have no reason at all to deny what is stated. For men, of course, can do nothing that pleases God unless they are clothed with higher power; as the Lord Jesus admonished the apostles: they were to remain in the city until they were clothed with power from on high. For the power, I say, is an implanted goodness and grace, since the will is only a recipient; but when the power is there, it can also work. And the scripture also speaks of the powers in Ezekiel.

Carlstadt.

I thank the doctor that he admits that good works are God's gifts and that God crowns his gifts. But since he accuses me of contradicting myself, I refer him to the preceding and following, and ask: What effect does a stick or a rod have, so that a schoolmaster chastises the boy? When I have the answer, let us go further.

Corner.

The highly learned doctor asks what effect a rod or stick has in order that the schoolmaster beats the pupil? I answer: Since all secondary causes (causa secunda) can also be called tool causes, the tools must necessarily be of different kinds. For sometimes a tool cause has and uses its innate and actual power and virtue, and sometimes the faculty that is imparted. But the least kind of a tool is when the instrument only does what it is guided and governed to do, be it either by the imparting of some force or merely by the power of guidance.

Therefore, I answer the pointed question like this: The stick has an effect, as far as it is led by the hand of the teacher.

I am ready to hear how such things are rejected.

Carlstadt.

Be it as it may with the discernment of the excellent Lord Doctor, Isaiah says this: that as the moving instruments can say nothing to their moving persons, so also the man driven by the Holy Spirit can presume nothing of such movement or effect. Isaiah Cap. 10, 15. speaks thus: "Will the axe also boast against him that heweth therewith, and the saw against him that draweth it? and the rod against him by whom it is moved?" So also the free will, which is compared to such tools, cannot say, The good work is not wholly of God; because, if he says so, he boasts against the Lord.

Corner.

The erudite Doctor counters my answer with the saying of Isaiah 10: "Even the axe may boast against him who cuts with it"; likewise of the drawn saw and the beating stick, from which it is to be assumed that free will cannot say that it does something; for if the will denied that the good work was entirely from God, it would boast against the Lord. I answer: that the words of the prophet are allegorical, which according to the teaching of St. Dionysii de mystic. Theol. 6. 4. they do not express the same thing, but only according to one or the other. Thus Isaiah teaches us that one must not boast of good works: which no one will deny, for he would be senseless, since the apostle admonishes us: "He who boasts, let him boast of the Lord! Therefore, for this purpose, the use of the three images, the axe, the saw, and the stick, is quite suitable. But in the manner of a tool, a stick and free will are not the same in comparison; for the former is an inanimate tool, but the latter is an animate one, indeed, the soul itself. This difference I could, if I dare, 1) cite from S. Thoma qu. 24. de veritate.

Carlstadt.

What to think of this comparison of the tools, I refer to Jerome, and that quite confidently. On the other hand, I say interjectionally: that what the grace-driven free will does is a gift and work of God, which Augustine evidently says Aes 8xir. et lät. s. 2. In addition, Ezekiel Cap. 36, 27: "I will make you walk in my commandments, and keep my statutes, and do them." From this it clearly follows that God makes us do and work. Then I would like to know from the most respectable gentleman: which church teacher has ever written that the good work is all of God, but not entirely. And if I am right, then this is only a spiky miracle animal, which the Doctor invented, so that he would be fearless and not to be collected (inconclusibilis).

Corner.

First of all, as far as Augustine c. 2. de 8pir. st lät. is concerned, it is quite correct, and likewise with the words of Ezekiel: that God makes us do what we only do. How much more does he make us do good, as I have long said, that God does more with the instrumental causes than when he works alone. This the respectable Doctor, if he had wanted to read our things according to love, could easily have seen from the 29th conclusion of the "defense": For I know that my prayer is nothing unless God makes it something.

But that the highly learned doctor reproaches me with regard to the spiky miraculous animal, where church teachers have spoken that the good work is entirely from God, but not completely? so he does, as Arius did to St. Athanasius, when he asked the holy father before the judge Probus: where in holy scripture the word homousia [equality] stands? Because of this newly made word the heretics called the Christians homousians. And Hunnerich, the Wendish king in Africa, gave a law that all Homousians should be killed in different ways. I wanted, it once told me the respectable doctor, since there is no believer who does not know that God is in essence one and threefold in persons, where then the word person is found in the Scriptures? So could be said of the name Theotokos, in the time of St. John Damascene. And in theology we suffer from this poverty of words, because there are more things than words. Therefore, when the matter is established, it is vain to quarrel about a word; and the disputation about words must be left to the obstinate. Therefore, since the Herr Doctor has clearly understood my cause and intention, he strives in vain to hunt for words. I wanted to say this: The whole good work is from God, but because it is

1) namely, because the opponent does not respect school teachers. (Walch.)

2) Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XVIII, 703.

I have said, in order not to deny such participation, that it is not entirely of God; that is, to state the matter briefly and completely. Therefore, the Doctor does not deny the opinion, but only the words. 1)

The university famulus then publicly announced that the disputation between Herr Il. Eck and Martin Luther 2c. should begin the following day early at 7 o'clock.

The disputation of the excellent theologians Joh. Eck and Martin Luther begins, Augustinian, which was started on July 4, 1519 at 7 o'clock.

Protestation of the Father M. Luther. In the name of the Lord, Amen.

I accept the protestation of both respectable gentlemen, Andreas Carlstadt and Johann Eck, and follow it. The one thing I add is that out of deference to the pope and the Roman church I would have let this subject, which is not necessary and extraordinarily hateful, pass if I had not been drawn to it by the thesis of the excellent Doctor Johann Eck. I am also sorry that those are not present who should be there above all, who, although they have blasphemed me privately and publicly so often with the accusation of heresy, have now, when the judgment of the matter is imminent, made off: I mean the heretics, who have put fraternal remembrance and doctrine behind their accusations.

Subject of the hearing (Scopus):

From the violence, rather from the primacy of the Roman pope.

In your name, sweet Jesus.

Before entering the battlefield, I testify before you, most noble, noble, noble, noble, noble, noble, noble, noble, noble.

1) In the margin is written: Mr. D. Carlstadt has thanked Mr. D. Eck for admitting that a good work is a gift of God; and Mr. D. Eck has said: he has always been of this opinion.

2) The first protestation is printed above Col. 861 f.

bare gentlemen, that everything that I shall say and that has been said by me shall first of all be subject to the judgment of the highest chair and of the Lord who sits on it, and then also to that of all others to whom it is incumbent to rebuke the erring and to lead them to the knowledge of the truth. And since the venerable father testifies in his preface, as it were, to his excuse, that he would have gladly, out of deference to the pope, left this subject pending, if he had not been drawn to it by my thesis, let the venerable father, on the other hand, be mindful: if he had not previously denied in his "Explanations" 3) that before the times of Silvester the Roman pope was higher than others, it would not have been necessary for me to put forward the thirteenth thesis; and that in the actions before the legate of the apostolic see 4) he pretends that the holy pope Pelagius has distorted the evangelical writings, who of all has taken the words of Christ most according to the sense of the holy fathers. In vain, therefore, does the venerable father seek to blame me for the matter to which he has more than once given rise. But now, without further ado, let us proceed to the main matter under God's guidance.

Venerable Father! Your thirteenth thesis, which is contrary to mine, states that the Roman Church is higher than others according to the very cold decrees of the Roman popes, which have arisen for four hundred years, and which, as you say, are opposed by the text of sacred Scripture and the proven histories of eleven hundred years. Against the same I argue thus:

A single rule (monarchia) and a supreme rule is established in the Church of God by divine right and by Christ. Therefore, the text of the Holy Scripture or the proven histories do not contradict it. For the contending Church, which according to St. Paul [Eph. 4:16] is as it were One Body, is ordered and made in the image of the triumphant Church [Eph. 5:23 ff], in which there is a single dominion (monarchia), in that everything is joined together in order to the One Head, namely God. Therefore, such an order was also established by Christ on earth, since He confesses, John 5:19, that the Son does nothing except what He sees the Father doing. Therefore who is not from heaven, who refuses to be under the head, just as he who is not from heaven but from Lucifer, who does not want to be subject to GÖtte.

All this can be confirmed in great detail, especially by the holy soul, the blessed Dionysius Areopagita, in the book of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, where he says: "For our kingdom order (hierarchia), which is sacredly established by God through traditional orders, is conformed to the holy and heavenly kingdom orders. Thus Gregory of Nazianzus says in the treatise on the defense (apologetico) that the holy mysteries are celebrated according to the likeness of the heavenly image, by which we on earth are badly assimilated to the heavenly orders. For what an absurdity it would be that the Church should be without a head! This has been the aim of almost all heretics, as St. Cyprian tells Rogatianus and Puppianus, so that after the head is weakened, they can drive their errors and their poison into the minds of men with impunity. And this was the main cause, along with others connected with it, why the noble University of Paris condemned John of Tournay for denying the primacy of the Roman Church. Thus it was also an error of the Wiclef that the Roman Church was not higher than others according to the law of the Gospel.

Martin Luther.

Since the doctor proves that there is only one head of the general church, he does very well. And if there is someone who, by a private agreement with the venerated gentleman, has understood to defend the opposite, let him come forward; it is none of my business.

Corner.

Since the venerable father says that it is none of his business to prove the opposite of what I asserted, that by divine right there is an autarchy (monarchiam) in the contending church as in the triumphant one: so I praise him in that he agrees in this also with St. John in the Revelation [Cap. 21, 2: I saw the new holy city coming down from heaven 2c. But to come closer to the matter: if the contending church has not been without an autocrat, I would like to hear who the other autocrat would be or ever would have been than the Roman one.

Pabst, or what other supreme (prima) see than the see of Peter and his successors, according to the words of St. Cyprianus, who says in the third letter to the Roman pope Cornelius, when he writes against the Novatians, who deceitfully turn to Rome: After these things, having, moreover, a false bishop 1) appointed to them by heretics, they nevertheless presume to ship to Rome, and to bring to the See of Peter 2) and to the chief church, from which Priestly Unity has sprung, letters from riffraff and unholy people, not considering that the Romans are such people whose faith has been pledged by the Apostle, to whom faithlessness can have no admission. And Jerome testifies the same against the Luciferians: the salvation of the church, he says, depends on the dignity of the supreme priest; if he is not given an extraordinary and supreme power, there will be as many sects in the churches as there are priests. And that this supreme priest is the Roman one is evident from the same Saint Jerome in two letters to Pope Damasus, whose words serve the cause almost without exception, but for the sake of brevity we will show only these: I am talking to the successor of the fisherman and the disciple of Christ; I seek no other reward than Christ; to your holiness, that is, to the chair of Peter, I join myself. I know that on this rock the Church is founded. And further on: He that gathereth not with thee scattereth. From this, every good Christian easily deduces that priestly unity comes from the Roman Pontiff, and that that See has always been supreme and superior to all others, and that it [the See] is the rock of which Jerome says he knows that upon it the Church is founded, or the venerable Father would indicate another supreme lord (monarcham) of the Church in ancient times.

Martin Luther.

I fully admit a supreme rule in the contending church, and that its head is not a man, but Christ himself, and that according to divine testimony. In the first Epistle to the Corinthians, Cap. 15, 25, it is said: "He must reign until he puts all his enemies under his feet." And shortly before [v. 24]: "After that the end, when he shall have the kingdom of God.

and your Father will hand over, when he will abolish is not from heaven, who refuses to be under the head, all dominion." Augustine interprets this in the first book and is from Lucifer, who does not want to be subject of the Trinity, in the last chapter, of the kingdom of to God. For as the foregoing has been ill-dressed, so Christ in the present time, namely, in such a way that also is this ill-dressed.

Christ, the head of the church, through faith will bring The third testimony, which is that of Dionysius, is us, who are his kingdom, into 1) seeing. Thus it is said not valid against us. For we do not deny the in Matthew at the last, "Behold, I am with you unto the ecclesiastical order (hierarchium), but we dispute the end of the world." Likewise in Acts Cap. 9, 4. Paul head of the sole supremacy (monarchiae), not the heard from heaven, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou order of the empire.

me?" Augustine again says that the head speaks for The fourth testimony, which is quoted from its members. Therefore we must by all means not hear Gregory of Nazianzus, that through the sacred those who push Christ out of the contending church mysteries we are associated with the sacred heavenly into the triumphant one, since it is the kingdom of faith, orders,-from which everyone who understands the that is, we do not see our head, and yet we have, as grammar recognizes that nothing is said therein either Ps. 122:5 says, "There sit the chairs of judgment, the of the sole supremacy or of the head.

chairs of the house of David." Namely, there are many What he now added, that it would be an absurdity chairs on which the One Christ sits; the chairs we see, if the church were without a head, I concede; but as not the One who sits on them, or the King. this head even the Lord Doctor could set no other head than Christ. And this I prove clearly. For if his To come to the testimonies of the honorable Doctor: since he claims that in the contending church there is one supremacy by divine right and appointed by Christ, he says his own, but proves nothing. For his head, which he calls the Roman pope, dies, as he is a man, then the church is already without a head; but first testimony, namely that of Paul to the Ephesians another is chosen, it is no less an absurdity that Christ Cap. 4, 15, in which he says that Christ is the head of should depart from the living pope and follow the dead one.

the church, serves against him for me, since he The fifth testimony is of St. Cyprian, who argued certainly speaks of the church in conflict and calls against the heretics because, after the head had been Christ its head. It is also the same opinion in the weakened, they strove to imprint their errors on the passage opposite to this, 1 Cor. 3, 5 [1, 12. f.]: Who is people with impunity: this does not serve the point at all. For he does not speak of the Roman head, but of Apollo? Who is Cephas? Who is Paul? Is Christ then divided? 2c., where he obviously forbids another head of any head of any diocese. And if the respectable doctor than Christ. wants to stand by Cyprian's testimony, we will end the Cornelius other than as a very dear brother. Then,

I pass over the fact that he said that the

1) Weimarsche: per; Löscher: ad. We have assumed the latter.

2) As an aside, Eck said that won't happen.

The first martyr, as St. Augustine states in the second book, Cap. 2, "Of Baptism," says thus: For none of ours raises himself to be a bishop over the bishops, or by tyrannical terror compels his brother bishops to the necessity of obeying, since every bishop has his own authority according to the freedom and power due to him, so that he cannot be judged by another, just as he cannot judge another, but we must all await the judgment of our Lord JESu Christ.

But that he says that the priestly unity came from the Roman and Peter's chair, I gladly admit, as far as the occidental church is concerned. For in fact, the Roman Church also came from that of Jerusalem; this is actually the mother of all churches. But the conclusion is not valid: the priestly unity came from the Roman church, therefore it is the head and the supreme mistress of all. Otherwise, he would insurmountably conclude that the Church of Jerusalem is the head and mistress of all.

The last testimony of St. Jerome is not properly cited by the honorable Doctor, even if Jerome's testimony were true in all respects, for the Doctor intends to prove that the monarchic power of the Roman Church was instituted by Christ by divine right. This is not contained in the words of Jerome, for he says: unless a special power, higher than all, is given to her, there will arise in the churches as many sects as there are priests. He says: "is given", that is, according to human right it could happen if all other believers give their consent. For even I do not deny that if all the faithful of the whole world unite on the one at Rome or at Paris or at Magdeburg or any other, that he should be the first and supreme bishop, that this one, because of the deference to the whole church of the faithful, which thus agrees, should be considered the supreme overlord (monarcham). But this has never happened, does not happen and will not happen, since until our times the Greek Church did not enter and yet was not considered heretical. And that this is the opinion of St. Jerome, I prove from the letter to Evagrius, where he says: "Wherever a bishop may be, whether at Rome or Eugubium or Constantinople or Rhegium or Alexandria or Thanis, he has just as much authority and has the same priesthood. The power of wealth and the lowliness of poverty makes him either higher or lower. By the way, all are the successors of the apostles. 1) This epistle is cited in decrees that are not cold, dist. 93. cap. legimus. The same says about the epistle to Titus: "A presbyter is the same as a bishop, and before special efforts in religion arose at the instigation of the devil, and it was said among the people: "I am Pauline, I am Cephian" [1 Cor. 1, 12], the churches were governed according to the common counsel of the presbyters. But when any one thought that those whom he had lusted were his, it was decided in the whole world that one should be chosen from among the presbyters and be set over them, and quoting passages of Scripture he says at the end, "As therefore the presbyters know that according to the custom of the church they are subject to him who is set over them, so let the bishops know that they are higher than the presbyters more by custom than by the truth of the divine decree 2). Therefore, what the Doctor added, that Jerome understood it from the Roman Pontiff, proves nothing, since he says: I talk with the successor of the fisherman and the disciple of Christ; and join myself to your holiness, that is, to the chair of Peter; I know that on this rock the Church is founded. It does not follow: I join myself to this church, therefore this alone is the supreme one. Nor does it follow: It is founded on the rock, therefore it alone is founded.

In addition, there is the decree of the African Council, dist. 99. cap. primae. It states:

1) In the margin: DIartimis "That they did not burn Jerome long."

2) "Probably Luther said äispensationis [not sispotionis], perhaps also the notaries wrote dispesationis." (If. edition.) Compare Walch, St. Louis ed. vol. XVIII, 802 s.

The bishop of the highest (primae) see shall not be called a prince of priests or the highest priest or in any such way, but only: the bishop of the highest see; but even the one at Rome shall not be called a general bishop. Therefore, if the sole rule of the Roman Pontiff existed according to divine right, all this would be heretical; but it is sacrilegious to assert it.

And finally we want to listen to the Lord Himself, who says Luc. 22, 24. ff.: "But there arose a dispute among the disciples, which of them should be considered the greatest". But he said to them: "The worldly kings reign, and the mighty are called gracious lords; but ye are not so, but the greatest among you shall be as the least."

Corner.

The venerable father has come to the battlefield quite well equipped, in that he has his subject matter, put together in good order, in a printed booklet 1) written by him. Therefore, you, most illustrious lords, dignities and gentlemen, will give credit to the corner, who has now been burdened with other business for a long time, if he is not able to heap together so many things so roundly and exactly off the cuff as the venerable father has already brought together; for he comes to dispute, not to publish a book; but what the venerable father has said, we want to look at carefully in turn.

First of all, he intends to prove that the head of the Church is Christ, which was quite superfluous, since no one can deny it but he who is an antichrist. But I am very surprised that he did not consider that (as he promises in the acts before the legate of the apostolic see 2) that he could prove himself to be a juridical theologian), that several subordinate heads can be, wherein the manner of the spiritual or figurative head differs from the manner of a natural head. Therefore, it will soon be proven that besides the headship of Christ, there is another head in the church.

must be sought. And it does not suit him that he quotes the apostle in the first letter to the Corinthians Cap. 3, 5 [1, 13]: "Is Christ then divided?" For although Paul there remembers Peter, yet St. Jerome in the first book against Jovinian, in my edition Col. 18, did not say falsely: One is chosen (he speaks of Peter), so that by the institution of the main the occasion for rottenness may be removed. He clearly calls Peter the head who is appointed in the church. But we want to leave this aside and refute the objections against our citations.

First of all, when he answers to the saying Joh. 5, 12: "For even the Son can do nothing but what he sees the Father do," he said that according to the holy Fathers the equality of the Father and the Son is expressed here. But, I ask the venerable father to read more carefully the holy and not high enough to be exalted (inadulabile) father Bernardus in the third book de consideratione to Eugenius, where he, speaking of the figure of the church, and proving that it is of divine right, used our way [of interpretation], in my edition Col. 7: And you may not disregard this figure because it is on earth, for it has its model in heaven. For the Son can do nothing but what he sees the Father doing, especially since it was said to him under Moses' name [Ex. 25:40], "See that you make everything in the image that is shown to you on the mountain. This is what he saw who said [Revelation 21:2], I saw the holy city 2c. For I believe that this is said for the sake of similarity, that as there the seraphim and cherubim and all the others, except the angels and archangels, are ordered under one head, God, so also here under one pope the primates or patriarchs, the archbishops, bishops, presbyters or abbots and the others in such a way. Then Bernhardus adds: "It is not to be disregarded that it both has God as its author and derives its origin from heaven. Who should not now recognize that this ecclesiastical kingdom order, as Bernard says, was instituted by Christ, and that, just as God is the head in heaven, so the pope is the head in the contending church? by no means to the exclusion of Christ, whose governor he professes to be. But as for the scurrilous reason he gave: that the Church, when the pope is dead, remains without a head, unless we were to say, in a ridiculous way, that Christ gives way to the living pope, and follows the pope when he dies.

1) Eck means Luther's "Erläuterung über seine dreizehnte Thesis von der Gewalt des Pabstes," Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 720 sf.

2) In Doc. No. 226, § 2, Col. 618 in this volume.

This is a quite ridiculous bad reason, which is hardly worthy of being mentioned in such a serious matter among such eminent men, since I said in the beginning that this figurative head deviates from the manner of a true natural head in several respects. Nor does Christ, whose kingdom remains forever and whose priesthood is eternal, yield to the pope, nor does he succeed him, since all authority in heaven and on earth has been given to him, Matthew the last [Cap. 28, 18.], and when the pope has died, immediately the assembly of cardinals, as after the departure of a bishop the chapter, holds these rights until a new pope is elected.

But what the venerable father says in the second place, that Cyprian speaks of any bishop, not of the Roman pope, I am very surprised about, since the understanding of what is said must be taken from the causes that caused such things to be said, and Cyprian, in the passages I have quoted, chides those who had fallen away from Cornelius, who was certainly a Roman pope. Therefore let the venerable father know that I do not wish to be fobbed off with mere words, as we are wont to feed the sophists. That which he brings for himself from Cyprian, I think he will make more in refuting. For that Cyprianus calls Cornelius a brother, there is no one who does not know that the apostles also were brothers. But Peter, as well as his successor Cornelius, was the head of the apostles, the apex and the chief according to the opinion of St. Dionysius in the third or in the seventh chapter "of the divine names". That which was gathered from the election and conciliar of Nicaea, and that which was gathered from Cyprian, neither furthers our cause, nor hinders the same, much less would Augustine lib. 2., cap. 2. "of the baptism of little children" should have been drawn to Cyprian. For Augustine rebukes the presumptuousness and sacrilege of those who by ambition and presumption force their way into the ecclesiastical high offices, that they should not appoint themselves, nor compel others to appoint them, since every prelate should wait to be appointed, like Aaron [Heb. 5:4].

Thirdly, wishing to nullify another saying of Cyprian in the third Epistle to Cornelius, he replies that while priestly unity in the Occidental Church came from the Roman, it did not in the Oriental; here the venerable Father has concealed the fact that Cyprian, in the foregoing, has made the Roman Church the See of Peter and the most distinguished Church. But what his refutation is able to do, becomes obvious to the one who looks closely at the core of the words. For the venerable father, according to the grammatical way, understands the emergence of the priestly unity only from the beginning and the beginning, while Cyprian truly wants to explain the origin of the conferral of the office (commissionis), the subordination or the influence, that from the One Peter as from the head came the jurisdiction over all others; otherwise he will not be able to provide One priest, not even at Jerusalem. I am silent that the added miserable gloss about the occidental church does not help him, since St. Jerome, at the beginning of his letter, writing from the East, for this reason calls the occidental church a rotterian one, which tears the undivided skirt of the Lord, woven from above, piece by piece into shreds. These foxes, he says, spoil Christ's vineyard, in that Jerome alludes to what the bride lamented about in the Song of Songs [Cap. 2, 15.]: Fahet uns die kleinen Füchse, die den Weinberg zerstören. Therefore, may, I pray, the venerable Father be silent, and not mock us with the Greeks and those in the East, who, having fallen away from the Roman Church, have also become such people as have forsaken the Christian faith. From this it follows how the conclusion is to be taken: She is the root, therefore the mistress. For we do not speak of the root of the beginning or of the time, but of the root of influence and supremacy.

In the fourth place, the venerable father tries to wriggle out of Jerome's words and avoid them. For he admits that the highest priest is also given the highest dignity, but this is done by human right. But why then does St. Jerome call Damasus the successor of the fisherman and wants to join the chair of Peter? By citing the saying of God, Matth. 16, 18: "I know that on this rock the church is founded. This cannot be attributed to the other churches in such a way, as Bernard concludes, and we have learned, alas! to the greatest harm of Christians, that the gates of hell have overwhelmed the church at Jerusalem, at Antioch, at Alexandria, I also add, the one in Bohemia, which, after all, the church, which is founded on the rock, is the only church in the world.

1) Instead of frustra in the editions, the Weimar edition reads frustra.

the unadulterated truth of Christ. But what Jerome says in the same letter [Matth. 24, 28.] is quite true for those who are of faith: Where there is carrion, there the eagles gather. After the paternal inheritance is wasted by the wicked offspring, with you alone the reputation of the fathers is preserved quite unharmed. But this we shall prove quite clearly in the main, 1) that the Roman church holds supremacy not by human but by divine right.

However, it is still necessary to resolve what the venerable father has drawn for himself from Jerome. First, to Evagrius, where he says that the bishop of Rome and of Eugubium, of Constantinople and of Rhegium have the same prestige and the same priesthood; we have known this since time immemorial. Nor is the papacy a rank above the bishopric. For he says in another place that the apostles were equal, when he did not take the first place from St. Peter. But the fact that the venerable father asks me so much that I should not seek any deviations (which I never do), by referring to the Canon legimus, 93. dist., brings me to the pointed question which the gentlemen canonists and theologians discuss: whether the episcopal dignity is a state which, distinguished by a special characteristic, is added to the priesthood: about this I decide nothing for now, since it does not belong to the matter. But I say this, always with the reservation of better consideration, that it seems clear to me that in the first church there was not such a confusion that a bishop should not have been separated from a priest, since the twelve apostles were higher than the two and seventy disciples. In testimony to this, I cite St. Dionysius, who is older than Jerome and a regent of the first church, who in the book "Of the Kingdom Order of the Church" places among the holy orders the episcopal dignity and the supreme church regent, and how he must be ordained. Since I agree with him, I believe that the bishops have been higher than the common priesthood from the beginning of the church.

Fifthly, he has attracted a Canon of the African Concilium, 99. dist.can. primae, where the Concilium forbids that even the Roman Pontiff should not be called a general bishop, and that Christ had forbidden it

Luc. 22, 25.: The secular kings rule 2c. I answer that it is true that the proud name of a general bishop has been forbidden, not as if the Roman pope had ever not been considered by a true Christian to be the first and highest bishop, but because a bishop, especially of the Roman church, is not the proper bishop of any church, but the first, because otherwise the lower bishops would not be given due honor. But there is no injustice in anyone calling the Roman bishop the general one instead of giving him the name of the first. More correctly, however, he will not be called a general bishop, but bishop of the general church, as he is Christ's governor. The fact that the Lord punishes the ambitious quarreling of the apostles, as it is deplored among the worldly, does not abolish the supremacy of the Roman Church, but [the Lord means that] what St. Gregory first did and recognized, that for this reason he was placed before the Roman Church, so that he might recognize himself as a servant of servants, in which we should not attack the following popes with invective, but strive to obtain from God by prayer that they be subdued.

At two o'clock in the afternoon of the fourth of July, 1519.

Martin Luther.

My first answer, in which I showed from Paul's saying 1 Cor. 3, 4. ff. that the apostle forbade that the faithful should not choose Cephas or Paul or Apollo [as their head], was refuted by the respectable Doctor in this way: that although Paul thought of Peter there, Jerome against Jovinianus does not wrongly say: One is chosen, because when a head is appointed, the opportunity for rotting is taken away. He clearly calls Peter the head appointed in the Church. He added: But this let us drive. I answer: I do not suffer that I should depart from a greater testimony for the sake of a lesser one, nor is Jerome so great that I should leave Paulum for his sake. For Paul not only remembers Peter, as that refutation endeavors to weaken, but with full power he teaches and forbids that no one should say that he is

1) Weimarsche: probabimus, all other editions: xmbaviinus. We have assumed the former.

Peter. Therefore also this very chapter [1 Cor. 3, 22. f.] closes: "All is yours, whether Paul or Cephas, whether death or life. But you are Christ's, but Christ is God's." Therefore, my answer still stands unconquered, and if it is not more strongly refuted, I oppose it to all past and future proofs of the Lord Doctor. For the word of God is above all the words of men.

To Jerome, however, I say that I, too, let this go, since it is a very ambiguous passage, as the Herr Doctor has well noticed.

In my second answer concerning the saying John 5:19, where I said that Christ speaks of the equality of power with the Father, the Doctor asked me to read more carefully St. Bernard, who introduces this saying from the contending church, as has been heard. I answer: I hold St. Bernard in honor and do not despise his opinion, but in the struggle one must take the right and proper sense of Scripture, which can stand in the dispute, from which the holy fathers sometimes depart in order to make their speech richer, and that without blame. But now it is clear from the preceding and the following text that Christ speaks of His same omnipotence with the Father [John 5:16, 18, 19]: "Therefore the Jews persecuted Jesus, because He had done these things on the Sabbath. Therefore the Jews sought after him much more to kill him, because he not only broke the Sabbath, but also said that God was his Father, and made himself equal with God. Then JESus answered and said unto them: Verily, verily, I say unto you: The Son can do nothing of Himself, but what He sees the Father doing." And so it is clear that Bernard treats this word of Christ in a different sense.

To the third answer, namely the scurrilous (as he put it) and ridiculous bad reason that I said that even without the pope the church has its head, he said on the other hand that the reason was not worthy to be given before such great men and in such a serious matter. I answer: It is after all plebeian and ridiculous, if it is only insurmountable, because I still see not that he is refuted. For I do not see that if the church is not without a head for three or four months, if the pope has died, if there are only other bishops, just as it should not be without a head if there were no pope. For what he said about the cardinals, who have the right of election, 2c., strengthens my answer, because it would follow that at the time when there were no cardinals, as at the time of Jerome, there could not have been a pope.

To the fourth answer, the testimony of Cyprian, where I said that he speaks of any bishop, he replied that it is clear from the text that he spoke of Cornelius the Roman Pontiff, against the Novatians. I answer: I have no interest in this, nor do I have this letter in my memory. But I do know that St. Cyprian, in many of his letters, is entirely concerned with the assertion that the head and bishop of each church are ordained by popular vote and the judgment of the neighboring bishops. And therefore, if it is so, as the Doctor states against the Novatians of Cornelius, I say: It is certain that he spoke of the head of the church at Rome, but not of the general church. He also refuted that Cyprian always calls Cornelius brother, but never lord, as the bishops do now, putting a relational without a correlative [that is, a lord without a servant]. He replied that Peter also considered the apostles to be brothers, and yet was the head and highest of the apostles, as Dionysius says. 2) I answer: If the excellent Doctor can prove that Peter ever ordained one of the apostles, even one of the seventy disciples, or ever sent out any of them, then I admit everything and will be overcome. But if I shall prove that not even all the apostles could have sent or ordained one apostle, I pray that he will grant me that Peter did not give any authority to the apostles.

1) This non, which is necessary according to the context, is missing in all editions.

over the other apostles. From this it follows that much less the bishop, the successor of Peter, has authority over the bishops, the successors of the other apostles. But now the very clear text in the Acts of the Apostles Cap. 1, 23. ff. is that the apostle Matthias could not be ordained by the whole assembly of apostles and disciples, but from heaven, like all the others, he was chosen and ordained by Christ. So also, Cap. 13, 2, Saul and Barnabas were accepted for the work when the Holy Spirit set them apart. It is therefore a very obvious error that Peter had authority over the apostles. I freely admit that the apostle Peter was the first in the number of apostles, and that he deserves the privilege of honor, but not of authority. They were chosen in the same way and received the same image. So I also think of the Roman Pontiff that he must be preferred to the others according to the preference of honor, without prejudice to the equal authority of each, and not as Pelagius concludes in his very cold decree 1): Where there is the greater prestige, there is also the greater authority, and the others are left with the necessity to obey.

As for the fifth answer, where I mentioned the election of a bishop from Cyprian and the Concilium of Nicaea, the excellent doctor disregarded it with very pompous words and said that this neither promoted nor hindered the matter. But this does not refute my answer. Therefore, the Nicene decree still stands, or if it does not stand and they have decided this against divine right, then it will not be called a Catholic concilium, but a diabolical, wretched concilium (conciliabulum). Thus, since he thought I should not have put on Augustine, and with his very beautiful gloss put on Cyprian, whom Augustine cited, that Cyprian rebuked the ambition and pride of those who pushed themselves into office before they were called, like Aaron: he said this out of sheer audacity. By the way the text is quite clear that no bishop who is already a bishop should raise himself to be a bishop over other bishops. Therefore, my answer is still fixed.

In the sixth answer, the same excellent doctor severely rebukes me for having omitted from the other testimony of Cyprian this word: "the most noble church"; then he mocks me as a grammarian for having said that the priestly unity came from the chair of Peter. Therefore, the new dialectician or philosopher explains this origin rather as the conferral of the office, the emergence of subordination or influence; "otherwise", he says, "he will not be able to provide One Priest, not even in Jerusalem". I answer: Whether I have concealed or spoken this word "most noble" is of no consequence. For it cannot be called the noblest with reference to the Oriental Church, as has been sufficiently said. Then, I despise his little word about the "origin of influence" just as easily as he invented it, and it is not difficult for me to procure a priest from Jerusalem, namely Christ Himself, from whom the church began and from whom it sprouted and came forth according to the words of Isa. 2:3: "From Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." If, according to the testimony of Jerome, he added that the Oriental church was a red church and tore the undivided skirt of the Lord into small pieces, I really do not know what he means by this. For he cannot say that the entire Oriental church has also always been red-blooded. Therefore, he cannot deny that the Latin church has also had its rottenness at times, and yet it has remained a church. Therefore, it is nothing that he tells me to be silent, and not to scoff at the Greek church, because since they fell away from the Roman church, they have at the same time become such people who have left the faith of Christ. Rather, I ask Doctor Eck, according to the Eckian modesty he boasts, to spare so many thousands of saints, since the Greek Church has lasted until our times, and no doubt continues and will continue to this day. For Christ did not

The Father has not given us the center of the Roman land, but all the ends of the earth as a possession and inheritance, Ps. 2:8.

To the seventh, which he opposed from Jerome about the highest priest, he said that my answer would be an evasion, therefore, to confirm his statement, he added why then St. Jerome called Damasus the successor of the fisherman and wanted to join the chair of Peter, citing the divine statement, Matth. 16, 18. I know that the church is founded on this rock, which cannot be attributed in such a way to the other churches, and then he deplored the fall of the church at Jerusalem, at Antioch, at Alexandria, and finally also of the Bohemian church, and said that, according to the testimony of Jerome, only among the Romans would the reputation of the fathers be preserved unharmed. I answer and ask the excellent Doctor to cite the sayings of the Fathers according to conscience, so that we do not seem to be sophists instead of theologians. For in that passage Jerome also calls any bishop the highest priest, since he is elevated from the number of the other priests, therefore the passage does not actually refer to the Roman pope. Then the saying Matth. 16, 18, is not only assigned to the Roman church, which is explicitly indicated by the words of Christ when he says: "my church". Therefore, whatever church it may be, it is built on the rock, and not the Roman church alone; or if this word does not refer to the other churches, then the Roman church will be alone, therefore not the first. Therefore the unity of the church is not based on the unity of the Roman supremacy, but much better, as the apostle says Eph. 4,5, on the unity of faith, of baptism, of the Lord, as Cyprian also often says in his letters. And not only among the Romans the reputation of the fathers remained unharmed, except perhaps at the time when Jerome wrote; indeed, the Histories report that the Roman pope Liberius made concessions to the Arians; and Jerome writes this in the "famous men", that Achatius, an Arian bishop at Caesarea, a disciple of the Arian Eusebius, by order of the emperor Constantius, decreed Felix to be the Roman pope.

Eighth. Refuting Jerome's testimony to Evagrius, which I have quoted, he says that he knew that all bishops had and have the same prestige and the same priesthood, but that the papacy is a rank above the bishopric. 1) But he did not refute my answer, because Jerome ascribes the majesty and lowliness of the bishops not to divine right, but to custom and the power of wealth. Therefore, I still remain with Jerome.

To the ninth answer about the Canon Iegimus, 93. dist. he says that it does not seem to him to have been such a confusion in the first Church that a bishop full of a priest would not have been divorced. I answer: What is that to me? He argues with Jerome and the Canons. But since he states that Dionysius counts the bishopric among the holy estates, I am surprised that he does not also bring from the same author the sole supremacy (monarchiam) of the Roman church, since it has such a great influence on the order of the empire that without this the similarity with the triumphant church cannot exist. It would be proper, however, for someone who claims to write a hierarchy, especially in its most noble part, to do enough with the subject matter; but Dionysius brings it only up to the bishop.

With regard to the tenth answer, to the Canon Prima, 99. dist., where I answered that it was forbidden that the Roman pope be called the general bishop of the church, he refuted thus: Not that the Roman Pontiff should not be the first and highest, but that a bishop, especially of the Roman Church, should not be the proper bishop of any church. I answer: As if such a foolish thought could occur to any man that one person should preside over all the churches and over every one of them, that it would have been necessary to make such a great nonsense of it.

1) Here Luther, as Eck says in his answer, did not understand Eck correctly (he understood sed instead of nec), because the latter had said that the papacy was not a higher state than that of the bishops. Compare Col. 916.

to forbid it! He then abandoned this refutation and gave a more correct one, namely that it should be said that the Roman pope is not a general bishop, but the bishop of the general church. If I did not spare him, I would also overturn this answer. But let the judges and the listeners judge.

Finally, on the saying of Christ, when he said [Luc. 22, 26.]: "But you not so", he said that the ambition was punished, but not the being in the first place (primatum). I answer, This is a petitio principii, 1) as if he had already obtained this, namely, that there was a supremacy. Then the text is clear that he has forbidden not merely ambition, but being higher than others.

Corner.

Regarding the defense of the answers given by the venerable father, I say in regard to the first that Paul did not scold those who said they were Peter because they had their sights set on the supreme place of the apostles, but because they had the particularity of the persons in mind. This is clearly indicated by the words separation and division [1 Cor. 1, 13. 10.] themselves. And although he [Luther] rightly prefers Paul to Jerome, one must still believe, in a godly way, that Jerome understood Paul's opinion well in this passage. For the passage is not doubtful that for this reason a head was appointed in the church, so that the opportunity for divisions would be taken away. This is enough for a reader who knows grammar. In a disputation, the venerable father said of this science that it was the most excellent above the other branches of philosophy and that it was useful for theology.

Secondly. No one except the Arians has denied that Christ Jn 5:19 asserted his equality with the Father, and even Bernard does not cite the passage in a different sense. But the fact that the venerable father thinks that the holy fathers have put on the holy scripture in order to make their speech richer, we reject this, because one must not suspect such a boast from them.

Regarding the third, when the pope has died, that then the Church is without a head, I say that it has never been denied that Christ is the head of the church, also according to the gloss on the Song of Songs, Cap. 5,11: His head is the finest gold. The gloss says: The head, that is Christ. But the pope is his governor. In the consistory, however, bishop and governor are considered to be one person. Therefore it is not allowed to appeal from the governor to the bishop. As for the cardinals, I have said that now, that is, after the church is already organized, the election came to the cardinals by decree of a pope Nicolaus. But I believe that at the time of Jerome there were Cardinals, unless Jerome was not a Cardinal priest. 2)

Fourth, from Cyprian. Certainly it cannot happen that he constricts the words of the holy martyr to the narrow space of the Roman district, because the Novatian bishops came to Rome from Numidia, a country of Africa beyond the Atlas, 3) as Ptolemy and Strabo testify. But that Cyprianus called Cornelius "brother", I think that this was the opinion of the collector [of the writings], not Cyprian. For if we read the letters of the holy bishops, we will clearly find that the praiseworthy and glorious titles were much more common at that time, as it happens now against the Roman pope, as it is known from Ambrose, Augustine, Hilarius and other fathers. For they call themselves among themselves: Most Blessed, Most Holy, Beloved of GOD 2c. With regard to the added, he objects that I am looking for deviations and things that do not serve the cause. With permission I would like to say: It is shameful for a teacher [to instruct others, but not himself]. 4) He asks me to prove that Peter has appointed some apostle; but this does not serve our cause. For we do not ask who has ordained one or the other, but who has obtained from the Lord JESU the supremacy over the others. The following I reject entirely, because he makes such a conclusion: Peter could not have ordained an apostle, therefore also the successor of Peter could not ordain the successor of another [apostle] or have authority over him. For the antecedent (assumptum) is true, the consequent is obviously false, since the pope now has authority and ordains other bishops. But the way to untie this knot will be this, that the

2) As an aside, Martin replied that Jerome had not been a Cardinal.

3) As an aside: D. Martinus said: This side of the Atlas.

4) The bracketed is put by us instead of "etc.".

1) What petere principium is, Luther explains to Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. VIII, 1130 s., p 85.

Office of an apostle, the foundation of the Church, means more than being a bishop. Therefore Leo the Tenth is the successor of the apostle Peter, not an apostle. But that he admits that Peter is the first of the apostles in number and honor, but not in authority, does not do the matter enough: first, because the evangelists do not begin the number of apostles in the same way, as Chrysostom notes about Matthew and can be seen from the gloss to Matth. 10. Next, that he makes a distinction between the preference of force and honor, that is expressly against the holy martyr Cyprian, who in the treatise de simplicitate prelaturum 1) against Novatianus, speaking of the wiles of the devil, chides those who, as if they were ministers of justice, pass off night for day, ruin for salvation, despair under the pretense 2) of hope, faithlessness under the pretense of faith. And further on: And although after his resurrection he gives equal authority to all the apostles, saying, "Just as the Father sent me," 2c. nevertheless, in order to make the unity manifest, he so ordered the origin of this unity by his power that it began from one. The other disciples, too, were just what Peter was, gifted with the same fellowship both in honor and power (this is well to be considered!), 3) but the beginning proceeds from the unity, so that it may be shown that the church is One. And further on: Whoever does not keep this unity does not keep the law of God, does not keep the faith in the Father and the Son, does not keep life and blessedness. These are very remarkable words of Cyprian, who does not distinguish among the apostles 4) the preference of honor and power.

With regard to the fifth, of election, I say, as before, that we are not disputing about the manner of election, but about the nature or rather the greatness (quantitate) of the elect itself. Therefore the Nicene Concilium was not a contemptible Concilium. But as for the action and the use, it can be done according to the nature of the time, of the persons and the place are changed, as we see in many canons.

As to the sixth, that the reverend Doctor opposes me, that I, as a dialectician, have invented a difference of a twofold origin, we have already heard Cyprian say that he speaks for Eck, who has not such great gifts that he could invent new things, but he interprets the old sayings of the saints according to his ability. But since he gives Christ as the priest of all, he first of all does not obtain Cyprian's opinion, nor Jerome's, because they want Peter to be appointed as the first of the apostles, from whom the power of the other priests flows, not, of course, by inwardly conferring what is Christ's as the head, but by communicating the ecclesiastical power.

Seventh, that he misses Eckian modesty, since he [Eck] declares the Greeks and inhabitants of the Orient to be people worthy of condemnation, I answer that the Greeks have long been not only red-blooded, but extremely heretical, as the great heap of so many errors and their obstinate obstinacy testifies in the Clementine de summa trinitatis, as, of the Holy Spirit, of confession, of the falsity of the three evangelists, and innumerable other things, though they have often rendered a fictitious obedience to the Roman Church, as happened at the Florentine Concilium in the days of Eugenius the Fourth. Therefore, if according to the opinion of many in our country only a few will be blessed, how much more will very few or none be blessed in Turkey, except for some monks and their followers who adhere to obedience to Rome.

Regarding the eighth, the venerable father asks that I cite the writers according to conscience; he may not have any misgivings about that. I would like to be able to cite them also according to knowledge. But that Jerome recognizes Damasus as pope, no one can doubt. In the same way, no one doubts that the universal church is founded on the rock. But that this rock is Peter and his successors, I will prove at another time.

But he insults Jerome a little bit, because he had said: with you alone the first reputation will be completely unharmed, as if also the Roman popes had not been without blemish. If he refers it to the time of Jerome, Liberius and Anastasius were before him. I say this because it is rightly stated in the

1) Now usually titled de unitate ecclesiarum (Weim. ed.).

2) In the text: odtutu. "Older as well as newer editions of Cyprian's works have odtsntu." (Weim. Ausg.)

3) An Intermediate Sentence by Eck (Weim. Ausg.).

4) Here Löscher has the reading upo8tolorura instead of apostolos in the editions. According to Löscher, the last part of the sentence would therefore read like this: which makes no difference between the voitzug of honor and violence of the apostles.

In the minds of the faithful it is something worthy of admiration that no Roman pope, however evil or erroneous he may have been, has judicially established and decreed anything, as far as I can remember, that is contrary to the commandments of the Christian faith, although they themselves have indeed often erred; rather, if they tried to make such erroneous judgments, they are also punished from God's judgment, as happened with the Arian Leo, against whom Hilariion sat, and with Anastasius, can. Anastasius, 19. dist.

To the ninth. With regard to the Canon legimus, 93. äi8t. the venerable father has perhaps not understood me. It never occurred to me that the papacy was a status above the bishopric, but a dignity. But that he says that I am at war with Jerome and the Canons, I have said what my opinion is. At this point I prefer the testimony of Dionysius as the older one. But since the venerable father makes oratorical remarks about Dionysius, why he did not describe the sole supreme ruler 1) of the church, indeed, does not go beyond the bishopric, I can easily answer. For Dionysius goes through the mysteries of the church. But since I have denied that the papacy is a state, the bishopric will receive the highest place after the agreement of all.

Tenth, that he thinks that no one is so nonsensical as to believe that anyone is the own bishop for all the individual churches, - what do I have to complain but that of the fools and those who seek something special, there is an infinite multitude? The venerable father read Alvarus "On the Lamentation of the Church", John de Turre Cremata in the summa ecclesiae, William of Occam (Ocken) in the dialogus, and he will find people who sometimes had this nonsense. But that he wants to overturn our answer, that I said that the pope is better called the bishop of the general church than the general bishop, I did this according to the testimony of St. Bernard and according to the custom of the popes, because Bernard says lib. 2. de consideratione ad Eugenium, Col. 7: For it is a sign of the special bishopric of Peter 2c., and afterwards: since each one of the others has his church, one is commanded to you, the largest ship, which out of all just the general church has become, spread throughout the world.

Regarding the tithe, he says that the word of Christ, Luc. 22, 24. ff. is not satisfied, as if it were my little bundle. But I do not speak without a warrant. I refer him to Richard Armacanus, lib. 7. c. 3. de quaestionibus Armeniorum, who understands this passage according to the testimony of St. Leo. And that this is true is indicated by the words [v. 26]: and who is the greatest among you 2c. Therefore Christ presupposed that any one was the greatest. But who would be the greatest, he did not indicate then, but later [v. 31 f.], when he spoke to Peter of the devil desiring them, and how he would plead for him, that when he was converted, he should strengthen his brethren, where he declared his being greater.

which was July 5.

To refute the answer in the matter concerning the word 1 Cor. 3:5: What is Paul? What is Cephas?, the excellent Doctor said that the intention was not the supreme place, but the particularity of the person, and this is indicated by the words that express division. I answer: I am more moved by Paul's text than by such a violent and forced distinction, which is not based on any solid ground at all, while he wants to conclude from divine right. But it is clear that their quarrel was because of the preference or supremacy of the persons, which Paul's refutation itself indicates by penetrating through the diminishing speeches and comparisons and saying, "What is Cephas? what is Paul? Servants they are, by whom ye believed. Therefore, he who plants and he who waters are one and the same. Neither he who plants nor he who waters is anything, but he who gives the flourishing, GOD." In this he evidently belittles the person, that is, the cause of division. So also in the Epistle to the Galatians Cap. 2, 6, when the Galatians were seduced by the pretense of the outstanding position of Peter and other apostles - he boldly says: "Those who had the reputation of what they were then," that is, how great, "I do not care; for God does not care about the reputation of men." As if he wanted to

1) Löscher perhaps more correctly (according to the word used by Luther): mormrokiarQ; in the other editions monurotma.

I would like the excellent doctor to read the Scriptures more correctly before he performs them. Therefore, I would like the excellent Doctor to read the Scriptures more correctly before he reads them all. Therefore, it is certain that this supreme authority (primatus) or person does not concern the Church, at least according to divine right.

I pass over the fact that he says Jerome understood Paul's opinion; likewise also that which he admitted John 5:19; likewise also that of the scurrilous bad reason, because it has not been refuted. What he quoted from the bishop and the governor in the consistory does not serve the cause. My reason has wanted this: If the Church is not without a head when the pope has died, neither is it without a head when there is no pope. I pass over that of the Cardinals, because it is known to all when they began. I also pass over that of Cyprian, because the Doctor has said from his own head, I know not what, of a Numidia beyond Atlas, which does not exist in the whole world. Also that Cornelius is called brother by Damasus I pass over, because it is not refuted, although it has been said that they did honor to each other with the most honorable titles, calling each other the most blessed, the most holy; for this I also say. But not only to the Roman pope, as nowadays, was so written; for this should have been proved. I also pass over that he said it did not serve the cause whether Peter had ordained any apostle, for this is the main thing (nervus) and insurmountable against Doctor Eck, therefore he does not pass over it without forethought, lest he should start so that he cannot arise again. Likewise, I admit what he has quoted from the martyr Cyprian about the equal honor and authority of the apostles, and accept it as a favor shown to me by the Lord Doctor. That he has passed over with equal care the election 1) of bishops described by the Concilium at Nicaea and by Cyprian, pleases me; for it cannot be refuted.

1) Instead of ecclesiam in all editions we have assumed electionsm, which seems necessary to us according to what has been said in Col. 909. 920 and 926.

But what he repeated concerning the distinction in the origin of the priesthood, from which it appears that Cyprian had his intention on the origin of the priestly power, proves nothing to me, since he spoke nothing but his own words. It is even more noteworthy that he, quite modestly, dared to call the Greeks extremely heretical people, while no part of the entire church has produced more excellent writers than the Greek. For the fact that he has so often, secretly biting, advanced Bohemia to me and let other invectives flow in, I refer this to the sophists, for it is too unseemly to be mentioned, let alone reproached, in a serious and theological disputation.

Therefore, let us look at this word, Matth. 16, 18: "On this rock" 2c. There I say: "Rock" means in this place either power or faith (because I have the confidence that the Lord Doctor will never do his promise enough, that the rock means the pope or the successor of Christ). If violence, it is said superfluously afterwards [v. 19.], "I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven," that is, violence; if thou wilt not say, it is given to violence. Then, if it certainly means violence, all churches will have the same, because he says, "upon this rock I will build my church," not the Roman alone. Or if it means faith (which is true), then again all churches will have the same faith. Thus it is evident that this pronoun "my" alone makes the rock a common one, whatever may be signified by the "rock." That is why the decrees of the popes cite this saying without any probative force for the singleness of the supreme rule, while they constantly defend the community of Peter. And so this agrees with the apostle in the Epistle to the Ephesians [Cap. 4,5.]: "One faith, One baptism, One Lord." For, as St. Jerome writes to Evagrius, there is not another faith of the Roman Church, another of Britain, and of the whole world, so neither another Christ nor another Rock. If then the same faith and the same Lord and the same baptism of all churches, it follows that all the rest also follows in the same way, concerning faith and baptism and Christ.

Finally, he has interpreted Christ's word from Richard Armacanus of ambition, not of being greater, for, he says, Christ presupposed that one among them was the greatest, though he did not indicate who it was. I answer: Whatever Armacanus is about, the very clear text is more valid than the unknown writer, for it is written that a dispute arose among them as to who among them should be considered the greatest. And Christ sda he says Luc. 22, 26.]: Whoever wishes to be the greatest among you indicates sufficiently that he has presupposed that no one is the greatest?and from the context of the text it is clear that he did not intend that anyone should be the greatest?c. But the fact that he cited the saying of Luca [Cap. 22, 32] to confirm his own: "I have asked for you, Peter, and you strengthen," serves for me because he commands Peter to strengthen Peter's brothers, not to be the greatest.

Corner.

What the venerable father has taught about the apostles, that I say it once and for all, we have heard from Cyprian and Jerome, what also the holy martyr and pope Anacletus testifies in the Canon in novo, dist. 21: that they were equal in apostleship, which no one denies. But the equality in the apostleship does not enter the supreme authority and the supremacy, unless one wants to impudently say that the holy martyr Anacletus contradicted himself in the same decree. But that he [Luther] puts so much weight on the decree of the apostles and seeks protection behind it, I know that Paul freely wrote [Gal. 2, 6.] that after he went out to Jerusalem, he received nothing from those who had the standing. But if this main thing (nervus) is to bind the corner so insurmountably, he will make use of it when the turn comes for him to oppose. But that he says that a favor was shown him by the word, which I have quoted from Cyprian, that the apostles were endowed with equal fellowship in honor and authority: if he calls this a favor, that I nullify his answers, I am ready to show him often such a favor.

point out. For the venerable father had made the distinction that Peter was first according to the preference of honor, not of power; Cyprian puts them equal in both things.

As for Numidia, of which he says that it belongs to Mauritania, and what he has brought, does not concern our trade, and since I have not dealt with geographical matters for a long time, I also do not remember all things. I know that the Turgan 1) and Caesarean Mauritania extend from the Atlas to the sea, and that the Atlas is not set as the extreme end of Africa, but that it divides Africa after a large part into several stages. It is enough that those who came to Cornelius from Numidia did not belong to the Roman district, but turned to the first church. Therefore, that saying of Cyprian still stands unconquered and has not yet been answered. I am surprised that he says, with regard to the flowing forth [of power], that it was my words, since I cited Cyprian against Novatianus, to which the venerable father answered nothing.

Of the Greeks I admit that they were formerly very Christian and learned, since they called the Roman church the supreme see; but since they, puffed up by pride and filled with envy, withdrew from the obedience of the Roman see, they fell into the worst errors and at the same time lost the faith with the rule. But since he suspects that I will not fulfill my promise and has made a reason for proof out of the 16th chapter of Matthew, I am surprised that the venerable father is so hostile to the Sophists, and yet uses the precautions of the Sophists quite nicely, and while he is a responder, takes the side of an opponent. 2) Therefore, I do not answer anything now, but I will prove what he demands to be proved by me, so that the time for deliberation does not always fall on his side.

Finally, he rejects the unknown teacher Richard Armacanus, forgetting that I said that Richard does this according to the testimony of St. Leo. Furthermore, he does not prove from the letter of the text what he desires. Christ rightly rebukes the quarrel that had arisen among the disciples. Therefore, the words of Christ must also be taken in such a way as to suppress the quarrel, but not the supreme

1) Eck said: DurMnioam instead of: linZitanam.

2) That is, while he is supposed to answer interjections, he makes interjections.

Take away place. And the venerable father believes that the text later on serves him, that Christ called the apostles brothers [of Peter], and thus did not make him the greatest. But if he were to consider the words of the text correctly, as he usually does, he would immediately see that Peter is higher than the other apostles, since he who strengthens is greater than he who is strengthened. This is what is said about the answers.

Now I come to the main thing he desires, and will prove that the supremacy (primatum) of the Roman church comes from divine right and from the institution of the Christ, so that Peter was appointed as the sole ruler of the church by Christ, with his successors, for which I repeat the reason of Bernardus, which has not yet been refuted. I repeat likewise the saying of Cyprian, and thirdly I prove it by the words of Christ Matt. 16:18.: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church." The glossa ordinaria says: "He granted this authority to Peter in particular, so that he might unite us. For this reason he appointed him prince of the apostles, so that the Church would have a supreme governor of Christ, to whom the various members could take refuge if they were at odds among themselves, because if there were different heads, the bond of unity would be broken. Thus St. Augustine, in his letter against the Donatists, declared: "You are Peter, and on this rock, that is Peter, I will build my church. And although the same Augustine interpreted elsewhere: on this rock, that is Christ, according to the sense of the apostle: the rock was Christ, he did not retract his first interpretation in the book retractationum. So also St. Jerome says in the first book against the Pelagians, in my edition Columne 5: What about Plato and Peter? For as the former was the prince of the philosophers, so also the latter was the prince of the apostles, on whom the Church of the Lord is founded by a firm structure, which is not shaken by the impetuosity of the waters nor by any storm. Thus St. Ambrose says in the 47th Sermon that Peter was the rock. Chrysostom also agrees with this opinion, at the beginning of the same chapter. What then does Peter say, he says, the mouth of all the apostles, the summit of the whole company? and further on: Christ gave him higher understanding and made him the shepherd of the future Church, and afterwards he set him over the whole world. This is what the holy martyr Cyprianus admits, saying.

he says to Pope Cornelius: Peter, on whom the church was built by this same Lord, speaks alone for all, answers with the voice of the church and says: Lord, to whom shall we go? 2c. [Therefore St. Leo 34, qu. 1. cum beatissimus freely confesses that the Apostle Peter received the supremacy over the Church from the Lord. Thus all the saints agree that Peter received the supremacy over the Church from Christ. I pass over the younger ones, Beda, Bernard and the like. The holy pope and martyr Anacletus, who did not write cold decrees only four hundred years ago, but a thousand and four hundred years ago thundered: The holy Roman and apostolic church has not received the supremacy from the apostles, but from our Lord and Savior himself, as he said to the holy apostle Peter: Thou art Peter, and upon this rock 2c., and further on: But this apostolic chair, the head and center, as was said before, was instituted by the Lord and not by others. These words are carried over into the Canon sacrosancta, 22. dist. Thus writes St. Marcellus, the fourth [pope] before Silvester, in the Canon Rogamus, 24. q. 1. to the bishops of Antioch: although the supreme see was at Antioch, it was later transferred to Rome by command of the Lord. Thus says St. Julius 3. q. 6. can. Dudum: "From Christ it is confined that the Roman Church has the supremacy and is the head of the other churches. Thus the pope Pelagius, not for four hundred years, but nine hundred years ago, and following the opinion of twenty-eight holy fathers, took the words of Christ: "and on this rock" 2c., in the same way.

Therefore, among the damned and pernicious errors of John Wicklef, this one is also damned: It is not necessary for salvation to believe that the Roman church is the highest among the others. Thus, among the harmful errors of John Hus, this one is also mentioned: Peter is not and was not the head of the holy Roman Catholic Church. And another: "There is not a shred of evidence that there must be a head who governs the church in spiritual matters, who always has his being in the contending church. And: This papal dignity has come from the emperor. And: The pope's sovereignty and investiture came from the emperor. Thus, since Boniface VIII condemns the heresy of the Lyons, he gives the decision against their error: it is necessary for salvation that all human creatures be brought under Roman rule.

The same is true for the Decretale unam sanctam, which states that Peter was the head of the Church. Also John XXII, when he condemned the heresy of Marsilius at Padua, also rejected this: that Peter was no more the head of the church than the other apostles. Thus, in a long line from the first church on, there has always been the confession among good Christians that the Roman church received the supremacy from Christ, not from human right and consent of the people. I confess that the Bohemians, in the obstinate defense of their errors, mention these things and defend themselves with these poisonous weapons, as can be seen from their petition to the Concil at Basle and in another disputation that took place before the king and the great ones of the empire between Ragusius and the servant of wickedness John Rockenzcena. Therefore I ask the venerable father for forgiveness if I am hostile to the Bohemians (I do not speak of the Christians, but of the Rottians) as enemies of the church, and that I remember them in the present disputation, because also the thesis itself and what was presented yesterday, that the supremacy in the church is ordered by human right, is according to my low and bad judgment very much in favor of their errors, and as one hears, they sincerely wish themselves luck in this. This I have now wanted to state for the present, and now I want to hear the opinion of the venerable father and the refutation of what has been put forward.

Martin Luther.

First of all, I want to refute the blasphemy that the respectable Doctor accuses me of being a follower of the Bohemian mob and clearly makes me their protector (the Lord forgive him), especially in such a large assembly of such great men. Never has any division pleased me, nor will it please me in eternity. The Bohemians do wrong to separate themselves from our unity by their own power, even if the divine right were on their side, since the highest divine right is love and unity of the spirit. I have sought this alone, and I ask every good Christian to be willing to consider, in Christian love, whether it is not by far the most impudent impiety to have so many thousands of martyrs and saints, who are called fourteen hundred

1) It will be read with eraser hanc, instead of ūne in all other editions.

The Roman Pontiff is not able to deny that the Church of Christ has been established for twenty years and has been crowned for a great part of the Greek Church. For even if all the flatterers of the Roman Pontiff should become furious, they cannot deny that the church of Christ had been established for twenty years, crowned in a large part of the whole world, before the Roman church came into being through Peter, as is quite clear from the Epistle to the Galatians [Cap. I, 18. 2, 1.], where Paul writes that after three years he came to Peter, then that after fourteen years he went out again to Petro. If we add these years together, we find almost eighteen years after the ascension of Christ, when Peter was still in Jerusalem, to say nothing of the years when he had his seat in Antioch, so that it cannot be said that the Roman church was the first and the head by divine right. Now this proves even more strongly that the Greek Church never received its bishops from Rome until our times, that they were confirmed from there. Therefore, if it had been a divine right for so long a time, all the bishops of Alexandria, Constantinople, some of the most holy people, as Gregory of Nazianzus and many others, would have been condemned, heretical and Bohemian. No more detestable blasphemy can be said.

On the evidentiary grounds of rebuttals:

Since the honorable Doctor says: "The equality of the apostleship does not affect the supremacy," and cites the holy martyr Anacletus dist. 21. can. in Novo testamento, I say briefly: This is one of the coldest decrees, which I contest, and no one will persuade me that this decree is from this holy pope and martyr.

To the second: I did not put weight on the ordinance of the apostles, which we will see in the Opponiren.

Thirdly. That he has cited Cyprian, who equates the apostles both in honor and power, whereas I would have said that St. Peter was first in honor, I very gladly admit, and if necessary, I will gladly

If the doctor can only maintain this as the truth, and then say where the supremacy remains. But I say that the honor of the apostles is equal in relation to others, but among themselves they have rightly given the first place to Peter. For every one of the apostles has equal honor in his part, and as every bishop in his district.

That he reproaches me that I have answered nothing to Cyprian, I have searched for the letter, but have not found it. But it is sufficiently answered in the foregoing that Cyprian in many letters ascribes to each church its own head. Those which were from Numidia do not prove that it was a divine right, but indicate the fact, as in the same way Achatius in fact appointed Felix as Roman pope, which is said yesterday. Yes, Epiphanius, the bishop of Cyprus, deposed the greater bishop of Constantinople, namely John Chrysostom, as stated in the historia tripartita. But this fact did not become a law. And so there are many other examples. I am very surprised that the respectable doctor has undertaken to prove the divine right, and to this day does not even cite a syllable of Scripture, but only sayings and deeds of the fathers, and those that contradict himself.

The fact that he admits that the Greeks were once very Christian, but that afterwards, since they abandoned their obedience to the Roman church, they lost the faith along with the dominion, is the same as what he said yesterday with the same Eckian dictum that the gates of hell had overwhelmed them, by treating the Scriptures in such a way that he understands by the obedience of hell the loss of earthly life or goods. Surely a very beautiful explanation! As if faith could not remain after the dominion is lost, and thus one might suppose that there were no Christians in Greece because there was no dominion. For the same reason, he will also say that the martyrs were overcome by hell.

He also reproaches me, since he says that I made an opponent out of a responder

(I gratefully accept the reminder), but I would have done this for the sake of having time to think about it. The angular flashes are not so great (so that I also boast something) that I need to think about it. Also that Richard Armacanus did not act from his head, but according to the testimony of Leo the word of Christ, moves me little. He shows from the text itself what he has undertaken: "This is from divine right," and I will be satisfied.

To the last, where he concludes thus: He who strengthens is greater than he who is strengthened, so Peter is the greatest apostle, perhaps because, according to Aristotle, he thinks that the doer is more excellent than the one who suffers from his actions. So I will also conclude in an Aristotelian way: The strengthening one is probably greater in itself (per se), but after the accidental (per accidens) probably smaller, if he does not understand by confirmatio here the sacrament of confirmation, which I do not believe. Otherwise, it is not uncommon that a higher person is admonished, comforted and strengthened by a lower one.

Let this be said about his refutations.

To the main thing.

With regard to the main matter, as he approached it, he proved that Peter was the sole ruler by divine right, and that from the above-mentioned testimony of Bernard, Cyprian, Jerome, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Augustine, then from the consensus of all the saints, and likewise from many decrees and decretal documents of various popes. I answer: Doctor Eck wanted to prove from divine right, and soon he forgot himself and got into the testimonies of the fathers, which we have already treated for the most part and seen that they have sometimes expressed different opinions in different places, and much more and more often for me than for Doctor Eck.

Secondly, we want to look at them one after the other. The first testimony, that of Bernardus, has been sufficiently eliminated above, because he does not prove, but only persuades, because he is based on a meaning that is far removed from Scripture, as the Lord says.

Doctor himself. Similarly, the testimony of Cyprian about the supremacy and the origin of priestly unity has been sufficiently considered. Thirdly, he gave proof with the words [Matth. 16, 18]: "You are Peter, and on this rock" 2c., which Augustine interpreted in this way: Upon this rock, that is Peter, and this interpretation he had not revoked. I answer: What is that to me? If he wants to fight against me, let him himself first bring the repugnant sayings into agreement. For it is certain that Augustine has often interpreted the rock as Christ, and perhaps hardly once as Peter. Therefore he serves more for me than against me. If Augustine and all the fathers have understood Peter as the rock, I, who am one, will resist them with the saying of the apostle, that is, with divine right, since he writes 1 Cor. 3:11: "No one can lay a foundation other than the one laid, which is Jesus Christ," and with the saying 1 Pet. 2:4 ff, where Peter calls Christ the living stone and the cornerstone, teaching that we are built on it into a spiritual house. Otherwise, if Peter were the foundation of the church, the church would have fallen by the voice of a servant, the gatekeeper, while the gates of hell should not be able to overpower it. Therefore it follows that the holy fathers, when they call Peter the rock, have suffered something human at this point, or have some other opinion, about which I do not speak now. Therefore I gladly admit the word of Ambrose, since he says that Peter is the rock, since also every Christian is a rock for Christ's sake, on whose firmness he is founded and becomes one with Him. But if Chrysostom calls Peter the shepherd of the future church, and the superior of the whole world, I am satisfied if this shepherding is not understood of the whole church, so that we do not cast a spell on the apostle Paul, who shepherded many more churches than Peter. And I confess that Peter is the first in glory in the whole world, and this also touches Chrysostom, since he says that he is the summit of the whole apostolic society. Summit is not the head of the

1) but a part of the head. Yes, even more clearly he calls him the mouth of the apostles, which Jerome and Cyprian also teach, because he heard not only in his person, but in that of all apostles and the whole church [Matth. 16, 19.]: "I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven" 2c.

Of the decrees I say nothing, which I have called quite cold, and especially of that of Anacletus, which has been highly praised in this hour, because a good Christian cannot believe that it is from the martyr Anacletus, who interprets Cephas as the head, and calls the Roman church the center (cardinem).

Finally, since the excellent Doctor dislikes the Bohemians so much, let him show his memory and his good head: he writes against them. I am very surprised that one finds so many accusers and enemies of the Bohemians, and yet there is no one who, in brotherly love, stoops to refute their error in honor of the Roman Church.

Doctor Martinus begged the corner not to do him such great dishonor as to make him a Bohemian, who had always been hateful to him because they separated from Unity.

At two o'clock the disputation was continued on the same day, July 5.

Martin Luther.

In the end, the excellent doctor has opposed me to the articles of Wiclef and John Hus, and Boniface, who condemned them. I answer as before that I neither want to nor can defend the Bohemian schism, but the Greek church in one thousand and four hundred years; if the Bohemians have kept it, it is none of my business. This I know for certain, that neither a Roman pope nor all his flatterers can push down from heaven such a large number of saints who have never been under the power of the Roman pope.

Secondly, it is also certain that among the articles of John Hus or the Bohemians

1) Already Walch remarks here: "should probably mean: summit of the main or head of the main".

many are completely Christian and evangelical, which the general church cannot condemn, as this is and similar: that there is only One general church. For this 1) has been unreasonably condemned at the operation of the exceedingly ungodly flatterers, since the whole of the Church prays: I believe in the Holy Spirit, one holy Catholic Church, the communion of saints. This most noble article of faith they count among the articles of John Hus. Then the article: It is not necessary for salvation to believe that the Roman Church is higher than the others. I know that Gregory of Nazianzus, Basil the Great, Epiphanius of Cyprus, and countless other bishops of Greece were blessed, and yet they did not keep this article; nor is it in the power of the Roman pope or the heretics to set new articles of faith, but to judge according to those already given. Nor can a believing Christian be forced to go beyond the sacred Scriptures, which are actually the divine law, unless a new and proven revelation is added. Yes, according to divine law, we are forbidden to believe anything unless it is proved either by divine Scripture or by a clear revelation, as also Gerson, though belonging to the newer ones, teaches in many places, and St. Augustine, who is older, observes as a special rule when he writes to St. Jerome: I have learned to pay this honor only to those books which are called canonical; but the others I read in such a way that, however rich they may be in doctrine and holiness, I do not consider it truth for the sake of it, because they have held so, but if they have been able to convince me either by the canonical books or by some acceptable reason. Yes, even the jurists, of whom one would least think it, have established in the Canon significasti, de electione, that the opinion of a private citizen is more valid than the Roman Pontiff, Concilium, and Church, if he relies on a better testimony or a better reason. Therefore, it is nothing that the excellent doctor, while he wants to prove against me from divine right, abandons divine right and concludes against me from the collections of heretical judges. Therefore, if this sentence of John Hus: The papal dignity came from the emperor, is false, then erase the word of Platina in the biography of Benedict the Second, where he writes that Constantinus the Fourth, Greek emperor, decreed that the Roman pope was the general governor of Christ, even though he was not so respected by the bishops of Greece. Therefore, as much as the excellent Doctor urges me with the Bohemians, who are not yet a hundred years old, so much I urge him with the Oriental Church, the better part of the universal Church, and one thousand four hundred years old. If those are heretics because they did not recognize the Roman pope, I will accuse my adversary as a heretic who dares to declare as damned so many saints who are praised full of the universal church. I say the same to Boniface VIII. What kind of a pope he was, and with what faith his deeds are to be accepted, the histories prove sufficiently.

Accordingly, I conclude, and ask the Doctor to admit that the Roman popes were men, and not to make them gods, especially as they often judged in their own cause, then not by themselves, but by quite unlearned flatterers, since St. Gregory, Although he was a Roman pope, St. Gregory, in many letters, denied himself the supremacy over the whole world, citing his predecessor Pelagius, and saying, among other things, that the venerable Synod of Chalcedon conferred this honor of supremacy on the Roman pope, and yet no one dared to accept it. Therefore, if I am mistaken, Gregory I is mistaken with me with his predecessors, and they have sinned damnably in not accepting the supremacy offered. Hereby I want to have proved that from the more recent decrees, condemnations and approvals of the Roman Church nothing is to be found.

against me, since they are all very suspicious and completely contrary to the old truth and custom. Nevertheless, out of reverence and to avoid division, I quite gladly tolerate them, and advise that they be tolerated; only let us not, as a matter of divine right, condemn so many previous saints.

This is what I have had to say about the articles.

Corner.

Since the venerable father, in order to save his honor, denies that he is a patron of the Bohemians, I would praise him highly if the deeds corresponded to the words. But the latter does not agree with the former, since he does not say Christianly that the most harmful errors of the Hussites are exceedingly Christian. But of that hereafter.

But that conclusion I hate, that the Rottirian Bohemians and Picards could receive as one god, 2) if the divine right stood for them. I have always praised the highly praiseworthy Greeks and the holy martyrs, but the venerable father, who is not well instructed in the art of cooking, mixes the holy Greeks together with the Rottians and heretics, so that by the pretense of the holiness of the fathers he may protect the faithlessness of the heretics, since at the same time he also inculcates the one thousand and four hundred years.

(D. Martin Luther protested and said: I protest before all of you and publicly that the respectable doctor speaks this lying and insolent about me. 3) And Eck protested that he wanted to prove with writings and words, in which in a long time the greatest

1) Instead of tantum, which we could not make sense of, we adopted tanquar.

2) The Latin of the editions reads: Oone1u8ioU6M tarnen illain oäio, guoä setnsrnatmi Lotienri et kiaräl tan^narn äenrn aeeptare p088ent, etc. About this the Weimar edition says: "The text is corrupted here." But the correction made by the Weimar edition: Conäitionern instead of: Conolu8ion6n>, does not satisfy us. The old translator assumed 6tzU8 a666ptari. We have retained the given reading. The "conclusion" (wnelumo) will be the last paragraph of Luther's preceding speech, and the word in Eck's rejoinder: "receive a god," is to be regarded as a rejoinder to Luther's word, "that Eck does not want to make the popes gods." - This passage will probably remain an erux intrsprsturu, but not much is attached to the more or less correct solution of it, because Luther does not take it into consideration in his answer.

3) In the manuscript: said this falsely and mendaciously.

The light is not in harmony with Belial, nor with the holy martyrs and confessors. But the light does not coincide with Belial, nor the rotterians with the holy martyrs and confessors).

I will speak of the Church that existed twenty years before the Roman one, which the venerable Father tells me: I am not moved that the Greek bishops were not confirmed by the pope, because even the village priests or parish priests are not confirmed by the pope now, but it would be something extremely nonsensical to say because of this that the pope does not have sovereignty over the common priests.

I will talk about the very cold decree of Anacletus later, and I will also defend the other decrees. Regarding Numidia, the venerable father said that it is a fact, not a right, which is contrary to the opinion of Cyprian, who accuses them of being robbers, who dared to appeal to the See of Peter and the supreme Church, from which unity came. That Epiphanius of Cyprus expelled the higher bishop, John Chrysostom, from the diocese, let him see for himself. This, I say, has happened; I judge that it was not right.

Moreover, when he hurls sophistical speeches against me, as if I did not handle the Holy Scriptures correctly, since I am supposed to have said that because of the loss of temporal things and wealth the gates of hell had gained the upper hand against the Greeks, he imposes something on me that I never thought of, for I said that heresies and divisions and errors had gained power against the church of the Greeks. It is true that the loss of dominion has also followed to great disgrace of Christendom.

Then, since the venerable father boasts that he speaks Luc. 22, 24. ff. from divine right, but I cite the unknown man Richard Armacanus, who even relies on the testimony of Leo, he may say that I also believe the same scripture of the Gospel and the divine right. But the venerable father, who relies on his intellect, rejects me, who follow the understanding of the ancients. It is beyond doubt that both Arius (in the words: "The Father is greater than I") as a heretic, and Athanasius had the Gospel; but Arius understood the Scriptures erroneously, Athanasius as the Holy Spirit required. There is nothing in what is added in regard to strengthening, since every sensible person recognizes that he who strengthens others out of the power given him by a superior is greater in this than he who is strengthened. I do not know what the "in itself" refers to.

(per se) and "according to the accidental" (per accidenz).
1) This for the first.

Since the venerable father wants to take my reasons for proof against the main thing, he imposes on me in a quite intemperate way that my intention was to prove by divine right that the Roman church is higher than the others, and yet I alone got into the sayings of the fathers and the saints, as if, since I wanted to make a container, I started a little jar. The venerable father forgive me if he did not want to or could not understand my intention. For this is done by divine right enough, since so many holy fathers have said that it is by divine right, even though we have not concealed the divine right, Matth. 16, 18: "On this rock," to which I have cited the testimonies of the holy fathers.

I do not know how the venerable father, forgetting himself, could have said in regard to St. Bernard, whose testimony and at the same time whose reason is insurmountable, that I had allowed St. Bernard to speak in a different sense, which he could not dispute with any weapons. For if the true and proper sense of the Scripture of the equality of the Son with the Father is maintained, then the reason of St. Bernard emerges from it in the best possible way.

Of Augustine and others, who said that Peter is the rock, he says that he does not accept him because he says contradictory things. Against him I say how he can presume to believe that such a holy, such a learned father taught contradictory things in the same book, in the same chapter, in the comparison of both opinions, in the first book retract. cap. 21 But how modestly and humbly the venerable father, an Augustinian! answered, others may judge, since he promised that he alone would oppose so many holy fathers. This is bohemian poison, wanting to understand the Holy Scriptures better than the popes, the conciliar, the doctors and the universities, which are in great bloom, while the Holy Spirit has not left His Church, and it would be surprising if God had hidden this truth from so many saints and martyrs until the venerable father came. The passage quoted from St. Paul does not prove anything either, since his sayings are not at all contrary to the holy fathers and teachers. It is Christ the rock, he is the foundation, he is the cornerstone, he is the undoubted head of the church. Furthermore, that this should not be attached to his governor, which goes against the testimony of the holy fathers and martyrs, is not to be assumed.

He has also recently added a bad reason which he has spread in a German sermon 2)): If on a rock, how then could the Church be built on Peter, who at the voice of a lowly maid denied Christ and the Christian faith? The venerable father forgives me, since he despises the Aristotelian philosophy and holds grammar so high: Why did he not see here with his lynx eyes that the verb "I will build" is in the tense of the future? because at the time when the bridegroom was present, when the children were happy, there was no need for a governor. Christ did not give him the power of the keys at that time, but rather he promised it to him. Therefore, before the keys and the power were given to him, St. Peter was addressed by the doorkeeper, which is also testified by Ambrose and then Gregory.

To Chrysostom he answered that Peter was higher in honor, because Paul also shepherded several churches. As if the venerable father had not preached more than now the pope, and for that reason should be called a greater shepherd than the pope! Thus, he plagues himself all too pointedly with the expression "summit", as if Chrysostom had not wanted to understand the supremacy. But who will tolerate this, since it is a figurative expression, and "summit" is used in such figurative speech for the highest place? Thus he is also called the mouth of the apostles, because he often spoke for all the apostles, which St. Chrysostom also considers.

He says of the decrees that they are quite cold decrees, about which I am very surprised, since he stated in his disputation: "That the Roman church is higher than all others is proved from the quite cold decrees of the Roman popes, which have arisen in the last four hundred years," and I have cited to him many older ones, before the love of many began to grow cold. I do not accept his evasion, in which he denies that those ver-

It was not printed until after the disputation had ended, and Luther made several changes in the publication, so that the sentence quoted here by Eck does not occur in the present text.

1) In passing: If not on Carlstadt's wagons. Compare the documents No. 355-358.

order belongs to Anacletus. For in such a way the decrees of all conciliarities and popes would be destroyed piece by piece, and thus the whole faculty of law would be accused of forgery, as if it were based on false foundations in its lectures, decisions, judgments, and the like, and thus its papal rights would be of no value if they had not been approved by the consensus of all Christendom. Therefore, the opinion of the venerable father is not to be accepted under any condition, since the decrees of all popes and conciliarities are found in very many places, and, as the human race is bold, people would have long since been found who would have torn apart that monkey walking in the lion's skin of Anacletus. Therefore, if he does not prove that those things are not contained in the original writings, I do not believe him.

Finally, he said about the Bohemians, certainly not without maligning Christian teachers, that there were many accusers of the Bohemians: where were those who, out of love and pious zeal, wrote against them and admonished them, proving their good head and memory. Why should I tell a story to a deaf person? But a Christian must not deny that very many, moved by the best zeal, wrote against the Bohemians. Such people were the fathers who were appointed to do so at the Costnitz Concilium: as the doctor who answered the Bohemians at the Würzburg Concilium; so Ragusius; so the man of excellent rectitude and learning, John Capistranus, priest of St. Francis, well known to all the faithful; Nicolaus of Cusa, the most learned of the Germans, with several other, as the venerable father reproaches me, heretical judges, whom I pass over. Therefore, the Bohemians did not lack those who wrote good things, but they lacked them because, obstinate in their heresy, they did not follow the good 1).

We have often spoken of the holy Greeks; but I believe that it is frightening to all Christ's faithful that the venerable Father does not hesitate to say, against the so holy and praiseworthy Costnitz Concilium, which was assembled with such great unanimity of all Christendom, that some of the Hussite and Vicleite articles were eminently Christian and evangelical (Martin protests: "It is not a Christian article, it is an evangelical article").

1) In the Weimar version, non is missing here (intentionally). Our reading is noted in the margin.

It is not true that I have spoken against the Costnitz Concilium. Eck, on the other hand, asks to prove it with words and writings that the general church cannot condemn, just as it is said very badly that the Hussite article was condemned unreasonably with regard to the necessity for blessedness, that the Roman church is higher than the others. Of course, the Bohemians are not unjustly jubilant about this statement, and they have sought it with their prayers to God, 2) but to the great detriment of the Church. Now, if (as St. Augustine elsewhere concludes) any lie has been admitted in the Holy Scriptures, it will be wholly suspect as to the truth, so no doubt the damned Hussites, relying on the protection of the venerable Father (Martin Luther protests: This is a very impudent lie!), will say: If the Concilium has erred in these two articles, which are eminently Christian, its reputation among us will waver in other articles also. Therefore, in a matter that has been condemned before, I will not waste more words on what a Christian must be forced or allowed to do. I say this, that it is brought about by the prestige of a Concilium or the Roman Pontiff that an opinion cannot be defended without the suspicion of heresy, which otherwise could be defended with impunity without violation of the faith. I have an example at hand: whether the being in the Godhead testifies? Richardus has accepted this opinion in the book of the Trinity and thereby does not burden himself with any guilt. But after a decision has been made by a concilium, no one could now say without suspicion of heresy that the being witnesses; I believe in the chapter damnamus of the highest Trinity.

I am not moved by what is introduced from Augustine about the reading of the canonical writings, because he does not exclude the decrees of the conciliar and popes. What my lords jurists put forward in the Canon Significasti, de electione, I do not remember now. But, mindful of their profession as guardians of justice, they will not allow, as I believe, the destruction of the papal laws.

But that he cites Platina, as if he were more than Pabst or Augustine or Cyprian, who, in the biography of Benedict the

2) Compare Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 39.

If the second is said to have told that Constantinus IV decreed that the Roman Church was entitled to supremacy in the Church, read, I beg to ask, the venerable father, what the gentlemen jurists note in the chapter ecclesiae S. Mariae, de constitutionibus, what, how much, and in what way the decrees of secular people apply in ecclesiastical matters, and he will see in what sense the words of Platina (not to say the Roman Emperor, with respect to churches and heretics) must be taken.

In the last place he asserts: I urge on the Bohemians, the Greeks (I admit it of the Rotterian, because the holy Greek fathers who are canonized, I do not condemn) [I want to push out of heaven], 1) like the giants in the fable wanted to drive Jupiter out of heaven. But then the venerable Father rightly opposes us, if he can procure a Greek disobedient and rebellious against the Roman Church, who would have been canonized. And who is this, and we should not praise him? In vain, therefore, does he suppose that he tolerates a sole suzerainty, as if it were not by divine right, but by a kind of toleration of the people and instituted by the consent of the faithful. This is most evident from what has been quoted from Gregory, who rejected the suzerainty among the faithful that had been offered to him. But the venerable father follows the sense, not the outer shell of the words, and he will find in the letters the highest humility of the very pious father, that he tried more by kindness and humility to break the court of the patriarch at Constantinople, than that one could have the suspicion about him of arrogance or court. That is why he first wrote himself "servant of servants". And that this was true, if the venerable father was such a diligent reader of Gregory, he could read in his letters (as he is cited in the decrees in the second Canon, hu. 6. decreto), where the exceedingly humble father, mindful of his authority, although he despised wealth and honor, writes that other bishops, besides the Roman, were called to share in the care, but not to the fullness of authority. There is no one who could doubt here that in the proper sense he wants to give the other bishops a part, but the Roman Pontiff, according to the grammatical sense, the fullness. Therefore, I ask the venerable father to accept what has been said either by others or by me.

I don't always throw it away, as if it were said out of an effort to flatter, because I haven't learned to flatter, nor do I know how to flatter.

On the sixth day of July, early at seven o'clock, Martin started.

Since yesterday the excellent doctor did not prove himself to be a party, but presumed the office of a judge, against the contract of the agreement made and against the will of the most illustrious Prince George, our patron, has so often declared and proclaimed me to be a heretic, while it would have been his office to act solely on the grounds and testimonies given, and to leave it to the judges to decide whether I am a heretic or not, let those to whom it is incumbent see whether safe conduct is not violated in this.

First of all, he has objected to the matter that I have called the most harmful errors of Hus exceedingly Christian; with regard to this I testify to my innocence. He will never be able to prove this, and I challenge him to denounce these very articles, which I am supposed to have called exceedingly Christian, although they are exceedingly harmful, or he recants his word.

Secondly, he accuses me of mixing the holy Greeks with the Rottians. What else could he do, since he had nothing to say, since it is quite certain that at the time of the last destruction of Constantinople the most righteous Christians were in Greece, who were afterwards received in Italy. And even if this should not be an urgent proof, it is still certain that until the Nicene Council there were at least righteous Christians in the whole Orient who were not subject to the Roman Pontiff, as the decree of this very Council at Nicaea clearly testifies, which states in the tenth chapter of the history of the Church: "And that at Alexandria or in the city of Rome the old custom be preserved, that the former should take care of Egypt, the latter of the churches situated around Rome. The same Concilium gave the first place (primatum) of honor not to that of Rome, but to that of Jerusalem, in that it says there: "And that to the bishop of Jerusalem the pre-eminence conferred from time immemorial is given.

right of honor be preserved. Even if this is not enough, it is still a conclusive proof (which the excellent doctor has cleverly concealed) that the Church of Christ existed for at least twenty years before the Roman Church came into being; therefore his refutation is ridiculous that he claims that I mix the saints with the Rottians, while he cannot denounce his Rottians.

Third, refuting my reason that the bishops of Greece were not confirmed by the Roman Pontiff, he said that this was nothing, since the village priests everywhere were also not confirmed by the Roman Pontiff. Who does not see that this is said to spoil the time, since the village priests are ordained by the bishops? At the same time I refer all this to what was said before by Jerome to Evagrius. For the same reason he also repeated that of Numidia so often, since it is written of those that they came to Rome without being appointed, and are accused because they came, - and yet from this history the Lord Doctor ascribes a divine right to the Roman Pontiff. But also that Epiphanius of Cyprus deposed John Chrysostom, he did not take as a right, but as a fact, and thus wants to have refuted, although the latter acted according to the decision of the Council of Nicaea and the testimony of Cyprian "by the decree of the bishops", without the authority of the Roman Pontiff.

It still stands unconquered that the Roman supremacy either did not arise from divine right. It is still unconquered that the Roman supremacy either did not arise from divine right or that the saints of the whole Oriental Church are damned for eternity.

I pass over the fact that he explains the overcoming of hell by the prevalence of heresies, which I do not care about. Nevertheless, he has not shown that the Greeks were heretics, since it is generally known, even by the right, that the Greeks are not considered heretics. I also pass over that of Leo and Armacanus, where he says that he follows the mind of the ancients in taking One Number for a Number, namely that of One Leo, in the singular. Likewise

I say nothing of the strength of the brethren commanded to Peter [Luc. 22, 32.]; enough has been said, since he proves nothing and it has not yet been refuted.

In the main, he says that he held the divine right, because he followed the opinion of the fathers, especially of Ambrose and Augustine, who said that Peter was the rock, with the words Matth. 16, 18: "You are Peter", and he also had the audacity to add that Augustine had not recanted this. Later, when I consult the book retractationum, I find the opposite: for in fact he recants it and says that Peter is not the rock, but that what he confessed is the rock. He says the same thing in the homily which all priests pray on St. Peter's and St. Paul's Day, where he says: "on the rock (not: on you, but on the rock) which you have confessed". I find the same in Ambrose, although he also sometimes speaks differently. Here is at the same time that golden gloss, as they boast, on the chapter ita dominus, which says: "And on this rock" 2c. I do not believe that the Lord indicated anything else by this saying than these words which Peter answered the Lord when he said: "You are Christ, the Son of the living God", because on this article of faith the Church is founded. So Christ founded the Church on Himself. It is therefore nothing that the excellent Doctor boasts that the sayings of the Fathers are on his side, since it turns out that they are much more on my side. He could therefore have spared his tongue and our ears, since he exclaimed with an oratorical roar: I alone want to be more learned than all, I want to understand the Scriptures better than the doctors, the universities, the Concilia and the Roman pope, and it would be strange if the truth, which had been hidden for so long, had been revealed to me alone. For that would not mean disputing, but arousing hatred.

But that he ridiculed my bad reason, since I said that the church fell, when Peter denied if it was built on him, putting on grammatically the verbum in the future time: "I will build", as if after the death of Christ the church was built on Peter,

I will pass over this, because everyone can easily see what it is worth. Nevertheless, after the Holy Spirit had been sent, Peter also fell with great distress of faith, Gal. 2,11. ff., since he was punished by Paul, in whom faith and confession remained unharmed; in Peter, faith remained, but he pretended against the truth of the gospel. But I allow that the excellent doctor, who mainly relied on this saying [Matth. 16, 18.], now excludes himself from the same, so that nothing of divine right is left for him in such a way. For if only a promise has been made, one must go to the place where the promise is fulfilled, and one will find this John 20:22 f. 1) where he does not say, Peter, receive the Holy Ghost, but says to all alike, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost; whom ye remit sins." 2c.

I also pass over that of Chrysostom, where I said that Peter was higher for the sake of honor. Since the doctor wanted to refute this, he replied: Since Paul preached more than Peter, he will also have more honor, as if I had spoken of the amount of work and not rather of the highest position. I also pass over that of the "summit" and its figurative head, for they are empty words.

With regard to the decrees, he is surprised that I say that they are quite cold decrees and have arisen in the time of four hundred years. I will pass over the four hundred years now, but I will talk about them later. For it was not necessary to instruct me that twelve hundred years ago, rather four hundred years ago, there were decrees; yes, that there were also disputes about the supreme authority. In the meantime, the doctor is surprised that he understands the saying of Matthew [Cap. 16, 18.] to be a word of promise, not of fulfillment, while the decrees themselves are based on the same word as a word of fulfillment. Therefore, it follows with necessity either that the decrees act inauthentically, as the doctor himself assumes, or that he himself is mistaken.

But that he does not admit that I deny that it is a decree of Anacletus, and what he jokes there about the artificially prepared 2) decrees, I pass over. For he has not yet refuted that the same decree interprets "Cephas" as head. Such ignorance should not be imposed on such a great pope, especially at the time when the languages were flourishing and there was a large number of Jews. But it is known that the Book of Decrees has not yet been approved.

He also persecutes that I said that there are more people who accuse the Bohemians than those who instruct them. Would God that I had spoken a lie! I see that many things are said and written against them, but in an unfortunate way, because they are not called by the name of brothers, which Paul does not deny to the Galatians who fell into Jewish faithlessness. I believe that the Bohemians are human beings and can be won over with friendly speeches and concessions, while they are hardened even more by accusations and vituperations with the heretic name. Therefore, it is nothing that we excuse ourselves with: it is not necessary to tell a story to a deaf person, since according to Paul's commandment [2 Tim. 4, 2.] we are to stop, whether in season or out of season.

We have often spoken of the holy Greeks. But it must be said that, in order to arouse hatred, he shouted a lot: it is frightening to all the faithful of Christ that he [Luther] is not afraid to say against the so holy and praiseworthy Costnitz Concilium that some articles of Hus were exceedingly Christian and evangelical, which the general church could not condemn. I answer: Among the articles of Hus is this one: There is one holy general church, which is the entirety of the elect. Likewise another: The universal holy church is only One, just as there is only One number of all the elect. These two are not of Hus, but of Augustine "on John" almost from word to word.

2) Instead of siÄÜlatim (piece by piece), which Eck had used, Luther mockingly puts: siFiUatis, that is, provided with small images.

But since against this the Concilium itself says: Roman pope and the Conciliar are not excluded. This is some are heretical, some erroneous, some blasphemous, said, but not proved. Yea, I confirm my answer by the some presumptuous, some seditious, some offensive to saying of Paul to the Thessalonians [1 Ep. 5:21.], godly ears: so the excellent Doctor, according to his "Examine all things, and keep that which is good." For even the When he says that he does not remember the chapter truest truth may be accused of being presumptuous, vexatious, inflammatory, offensive to the ears, as significasti that I mentioned, and exhorts the jurists happened to Christ. But for this reason an article is not not to let the papal laws be destroyed, which also serves false, much less heretical, because it is presumptuous or to arouse spite against me, I reply: "This does not destroy the papal laws if the divine laws are preferred to them. offensive, and so it is in the day,

Since the lords

If lawyers do this, the theologians do it very badly, who even resist the best lawyers in this matter.

Of Platina, whom I have attracted, he says that he is no more than a Roman pope, Augustine, Cyprian, as if he had already proved supremacy through Augustine and Cyprian or the pope, since he has so often promised us that he would prove it by divine right, and has brought forward nothing but quite cold decrees and some misunderstood testimonies of the Fathers. I do not attach anything to Platina, but to the history, which is the mother of truth, which Platina writes.

What he says of the regulations I pass over.

Finally, he admits that the holy Greeks are not condemned, but only the Rotterian ones. This is none of our business; for I have never spoken of the Red-Irish Greeks, but of the holy ones, especially of the Nicene Council, just as I do not believe that he means the Latin Red-Irish when he speaks of the Roman Church.

Of Gregorius, whom I have quoted, he says that one must follow him according to the sense, not according to the outer shell of the words, and thus my answer is sufficiently refuted, for the Eckian words alone suffice!

But since he cited 2 qu 6. ca: decreto

When the same Gregory writes that other bishops, besides the Roman one, are called to participate in the care, not in the fullness of power, the Doctor should have shown that he understood all the bishops in the whole world, and not only the bishops of the occidental church. Even if he did this as much as he could, it would not be proven for that reason to be of divine right. Gregorius is a man, and it is proved the less, the more he expresses different opinions in many places, so that I have more of a right to tell the Doctor that he himself should follow the sense and not the outer shell of the words in his citations, or first make him agree with himself.

Finally, since I have quoted Paul 1 Cor. 3:11 against the excellent Doctor, "that no one can lay any other foundation except the one that has been laid, which is Jesus Christ," he has said that this is also true of the place of

The foundation has to be laid by Christ's holder. Therefore he must say thus: No one can lay a foundation outside of yours, except the one that has been laid, which is the Roman pope. And in this way, the very clear testimony of Paul will have to be resisted, or it will have to be revoked and it will have to be said that this is not to be attached to the governor of Christ. In the same way the word of Paul Gal. 2.6. where Paul said: "But of those who had the reputation (he speaks of Peter, James and John), of which they were then, I care nothing, for God does not respect the reputation of men." There Paul says in the clearest possible way that nothing was important about Peter's greatness and reputation, and that God did not pay attention to it either. But if this is out of divine right, then it is quite certain that Paul is lying here. For what is divine right is considered badly by God, and much is attached to it. And therefore this saying of Paul's forces that the supremacy of a man, of a bishop, is not of divine right, and therefore what the doctor has said about divine right must be revoked, since he obviously contradicts the apostle here. Since the matter now stands like this, I say that if the excellent Doctor does not change his opinion, since it is clearly contrary to Paul, I will not consider him a Catholic Christian.

This may be enough with my answer to the objections of Doctor Johann Eck about the thirteenth thesis of the power and the primate of the pope. I leave this to the judgment of the judges and all readers.

Corner.

Since the venerable father accuses me of having taken the office of a judge, this is not the case. I am a disputator, nor did I call him a heretic, but I said that his statements are favorable to the heretics and especially to the Bohemians, and that I protect them, mainly because he took the liberty of making that atrocious statement that some of the articles of John Hus, which were rejected by the holy Costnitz Concilium, are exceedingly Christian and evangelical. Let us rather go to the point. Yesterday he brought forward two such articles, today he has added some more; but of that later.

But as far as the Greeks are concerned, it is astonishing with what zeal the venerable father defends those of whom he claims that they were good even at the destruction of Constantinople, who came to Italy afterwards; I must indicate and name which ones were the red-blooded and heretical Greeks. I am surprised that the venerable father in his letter 1) accuses me of ignorance in the histories, and even on this occasion does not want to know what the whole church knows. Was not Nestorius a Rottirer, not Macedonius, Eutyches, Achacius, John of Constantinople, and after persisting in their Rottirerism for a long time, obeyed the Church under Eugenius IV at the Concilium of Florence, although after their obstinate disloyalty they immediately returned to their Gespeieten? Otherwise, if the Greeks had not been heretics, we would not have the decision about the supreme Catholic faith against the Greeks; or perhaps the venerable father does not know that Thomas published a book about the errors of the Greeks. I add that he has often said that the Oriental Church was not subject to the Roman Pontiff, and that Epiphanius of Cyprus expelled St. Chrysostom from the episcopate, of which the venerable father says that it was well done, according to the testimony of the Nicene Council and Cyprian. But he fell into the pit he made, since St. Chrysostom was cast out by the hatred of the empress and an Arian heretic was put in his place. To this the pope commanded Julius to depart, and reinstated John Chrysostom. Since this was not done, Pope Julius commanded that John Chrysostom be reinstated and put the emperor under ban. He proceeded in the same way against other heretical bishops, so that the histories report that the Greeks departed not once but ten times from obedience to the Roman Church. And now the venerable father may go and say that the Roman pope did not dispose of the Oriental churches, or justify the expulsion of such a holy father, Chrysostom.

Thirdly, of the Nicene Synod, which he cited from the tenth book of the History of the Church, if that is the ordinance he meant in his conclusion, it is good, I say, but it has no force (est frigidum) in relation to the matter at hand. Yes, no synod, even at the time, was considered legitimate, which had not been assembled by order of the Roman Pontiff. So Leo, so Marcellus, so Julius, holy, not cold popes, have decreed, who lived around the same time. Their decrees one reads dist. 17. can. Synodum, and in the following. Therefore, the Lord Father should have proved that they gave the patriarch of Jerusalem the privilege of honor, but not the supremacy over the whole church. But the sixth synod expressly gives the supreme see to the Roman church, which is cited in the 22nd dist. This was also obtained by Pope Leo against the Emperor Michael and St. Gregory against John of Constantinople and the Emperor Mauritius.

Therefore, I will also eliminate here that of St. Gregory, whom he cites as having rejected the supremacy, of which it is known that it is quite false, since he attributes so much to Platina, who writes thus of St. Gregory. Moreover, since the bishop John of Constantinople, when a synod of the Greeks was held, had made himself an ecumenical, that is, a general, patriarch, and Mauritius had admonished Gregory to obey John, the man of good character and faith replied that the power to bind and loose was given to Peter and his successors, not to the bishops of Constantinople, therefore let him desist from provoking God's wrath against himself. From this it is clear that Gregory, without doubt a holy and humble father, not only did not reject the supremacy, but even asserted it against the emperor and the bishop of Constantinople. Therefore, I do not want to impose on the holy father what the venerable father does, who by all means does not remain the same as himself, that Gregorius said repugnant and conflicting things, but denied that he was a general bishop, in the sense in which he was stated in an earlier disputation, and yet received the supremacy. That this custom always existed and was observed even at the time of the Nicene Council is evident from the 92nd letter of Augustine and his fellow bishops to Innocentius the First, where they say: "Since the Lord has placed you on the apostolic chair by a special grant of grace, and has given you to us in our time as such, we ask that you will deign to use your pastoral diligence in the great dangers of the weak members of Christ. The pope answers in the following letter: "Therefore, you draw carefully and in a measured way from the dangers of the

I say of the honor of him to whom, besides what are external things, there is also the care of all the churches in regard to difficult things, which opinion must be held, in that you have followed the way of the old rule. What can be said more explicitly than that in the time of Augustine the pope had the care for all churches, and that this did not begin then, but was the way of an ancient rule?

Then the venerable father comes with his Hercules, that is, with the reason of the twenty years when the church is said to have existed before the Roman one. I answer that it is true that in the Gospel Christ did not specifically mention the Roman Church, but Peter, who was appointed prince of the apostles. This is because Peter, who had the supremacy, moved the See from Antioch to Rome by command of the Lord. Therefore, it did not become first at that time by human right, but by God's command, since St. Peter had held the right before, as witnessed by St. Marcellus, martyr and pope, eun. Rogamus, 24. qu. 1: Although the first see was in Antioch, it was later transferred to Rome by the command of the Lord. For who is so foolish as to tie the supremacy to a place? but this is the opinion of the holy fathers: because Peter is appointed governor of Christ by divine right, so are all his successors, just as the Roman popes are, in whatever place they may be, governors of Christ. The Roman king or emperor is therefore not at Rome. Thus, we see, St. Augustine held it against the Manichaeans. He says: "It is evident that in doubtful matters the certainty of faith is served by the prestige of the Catholic Church, which is fortified by the firmly established sees of the apostles, who follow one another to this day, and by the uninterrupted succession of bishops and the consensus of the people. That is why St. Augustine, in his letters, lists the Roman popes.

So much of the foregoing.

Now to the main thing.

Since the venerable father wants to reply to what I have said (for I have said that Peter was set before the other apostles by divine right, Matth. 16. I have referred to Jerome, Bernard, Leo and Cyprian, to which he has answered nothing, although he confesses with his hand in his book that St. Cyprian had the opinion

He said that the Church was founded on the rock, but he took the trouble to add that St. Cyprian was mistaken), he took the trouble to answer Augustine. For it is undoubtedly Cyprian who, in another letter, the eighth to Cornelius, calls the Roman Church the mother and root of the others. He accuses me of quoting a saying that Augustine recanted. The venerable father cannot cloud the reader's judgment; for he is not at all pleased with his former opinion that he also cites St. Ambrose to support it. But what I mentioned at the beginning, Augustine testifies; he also interpreted the rock as Christ. Neither of the two opinions he refutes, neither of them he gives preference, but adds: Which of these opinions is the more probable, let the reader decide. Augustine does not dare to give a decision, and the venerable father wants to reject the one opinion that has been accepted by so many holy fathers, and accept the one that is according to his will. Therefore, I do not allow that Augustine in the same 1) chapter said something contrary or repugnant, but different, because he accepts both opinions: because the rock is Christ, and Peter was the rock. Therefore, I remain with Ambrose, Jerome, Cyprian, Bernard and others, the holy concilia and decrees.

Secondly. Since the venerable father had taken a reason of proof from the doorkeeper to dispute my opinion, I told him that he would better consider the words of Christ in a grammatical way. For according to the unanimous opinion of all, Christ Matth. 16, 18. f.: "On this rock I will build" and: "I will give you" 2c., made the promise to Peter, and did not give it to him at that time; but leaving aside his grammar, of which he nevertheless said that it serves theology more than the other parts of philosophy, he replies: Why then do the decrees base themselves on that passage Matth. 16, and I would have based myself on it, from which I now depart? I answer: Because Christ is the way and the truth and the life, therefore it must be believed without doubt that he kept to Peter what he had promised him. Therefore, the decrees conclude quite rightly from that passage where Christ promised, but only after the resurrection he fulfilled it.

1) Here we have adopted the conjecture of the Weimar edition: in eodem capite instead of: in 9. eaxits.

But he implicitly interjects that Christ did not fulfill this to Peter alone, but to all apostles, saying [Joh. 20, 22. f.]: "Receive the Holy Spirit, by whom ye remit sins" 2c. The venerable Father did not mean to express where he had given Peter the promised supremacy. For all teachers agree that Christ made the disciples priests at the Lord's Supper, giving them power over the true body of Christ, saying, "This do in remembrance of me" [Luc. 22:19], and that afterwards, on the day of the resurrection, he gave them power over his spiritual (mysticum) body [John 20:22]: "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." But the supremacy and preeminence over the whole church he promised to Peter John at the last [Cap. 21, 17.]: "Feed my sheep." This is attested by Gregory, Chrysostom, and other holy fathers. For Chrysostom says, The noblest of the apostles was Peter, and the mouth of the disciples, the summit of the collegium; hence also, after the denial was blotted out, he promises him supremacy over his brethren; and in the eighth homily on repentance, But the same night Peter fell, and rose again. After this so grievous fall, repentance brought him back to the former level, and gave him the chief place in the church out of all the earth. Thus the gloss to 1 Peter 5, 2. says: "Feed the flock that is under your care": Just as the Lord entrusted to Peter alone to take care of the whole flock 2c. Therefore, Christ fulfilled what was promised earlier at that time. St. Gregory also agrees with this: The care of the whole Church and the supremacy is commanded to Peter, namely, "Feed my sheep." Even if I had not shown it before my eyes, where Christ had given it, the truth could not have lied, and many things have happened that are not written, as even his Alexander III 1) teaches in chapter 6um Nurtlms 6te.

But again the venerable father objects, because Peter still sinned after the sending of the Holy Spirit (and he made Peter's sin even great), as is written in the Epistle to the Galatians Cap. 2, 11. ff. is written. Although there was a disagreement, first between the apostles Peter and Paul, then between the church scholars Jerome and Augustine, I cannot be brought to the opinion that any of the apostles sinned after the sending of the Holy Spirit.

1) Rather Innocentius III. (Weim. ed.)

The Holy Spirit's fertilizer has not fallen into any mortal sin, just as those who are sanctified in the womb are not allowed to do so. But this does not belong to our matter. However, assuming, but by no means admitting, that St. Peter had sinned to death in his hypocrisy, he would still have remained the rock and head of the church, unless the venerable father also wants to defend this Hussite article, which I do not believe: there is no one a civil lord, no one a prelate, no one a bishop who is in a mortal sin; which would cause the highest uncertainty in the Christian religion.

Fourth. 2) Of the decrees that are quite cold with him, I say this, that so often in the Church the decrees of the popes have been accepted in matters of faith, and, what is more, the Roman Pontiff formerly did not confirm a bishop if he did not send a note of assurance of faith, in which he publicly affirmed that he believed the Evangelia, the four Concilia, the legitimate synods and the decrees of the popes. Therefore, the pope did not want to confirm John Gilibrecht, bishop of Cologne, because he had not delivered this note of faith completely, as we read in the Canon optatum, 100. dist.

But since he rejects the decree of Anacletus, we said yesterday by what power or with what proof he does this. For since the original writings are at hand, no one has ever said that this decree is not from the holy martyr Anacletus. But Nicolaus of Cusa, the most learned of the Germans, who testifies that he wrote his "Unity of Faith" from the original writings, refers to this decree of Anacletus. The venerable father has given a color to his cause: that in so holy a martyr there should not be so great an ignorance that he should interpret Cephas in this way: that is, chiefly, as if so great a science were necessary to holiness of life. But we want to say one thing, that Kephe or Cephas should be Syrian and well known to the Hebrews, and should mean as much as Peter or firmness, as Erasmus states after Jerome. We also want to add this peculiar circumstance that Cusa, who is learned in Chaldean and Hebrew, testifies in the books Excitationum that "Peter" also means as much as "head of the house". Therefore, Anacletus did not suffer from such great ignorance when he interprets Cephas as head. But as this also

2) No formal third party precedes it.

I do not see with what appearance he can deny other decrees of the holy martyrs and confessors than that of Clement 20 dist., 1) Marcellus, Julius, Pelagius, Nicolaus, Agatho, Simon, Vigilius, Benedictus 2c. Therefore, I prefer to join such great fathers and the holy Concilium.

To the offensive things (Ad Scrupos).

Most seriously, I have heard that the venerable father, against the order of the most noble prince, according to which the most noble prince wanted that what was decided by the holy concilium should remain untouched, the venerable father 2) nevertheless hardened himself in yesterday's opinion, and established four articles which have been condemned among the Hussites, which he himself considers to be Catholic and Protestant: he certainly takes the Bohemians quite nicely in defense. But out of deference to the Concilium he wanted them to be added by an impostor. First of all, the excellent doctor and nobleman Jerome of Croaria, 3) who had the Acts of the Concilium printed, had a copy made in a certified form, and since the matter at Constance was obviously handled in this way, the Hussites would not have concealed for so long that some articles had been suppressed. Nor can the venerable father suspect what he assumed yesterday, that this was done by the pernicious action of a flatterer against the Roman pope, since John Hus was burned in 15 [in July], his comrade Jerome in 16 [in May], 4) while Martin V was not elected until 17 on Martinmas. Therefore, holy fathers and men who did not give themselves to flattery, from all the noblest nations, have been ordained to do so, have examined these articles, and the holy church assembly (Synodus) has condemned them, rejected them, and burned the author, and therefore they must be considered condemned and rejected by every good Christian, and let not the venerable Father impose upon me to judge these articles, because they are already judged. There is nothing wrong in the Synod's thinking of them, saying that 5) some are heretical, others are presumptuous, seditious, and offensive to godly ears; for in what order are they to be condemned?

Although he may bring these articles, they cannot be called exceedingly Christian and evangelical, and although I do not want to take upon myself the work of defending the whole church assembly in condemnation of the articles, let us teach something, and that in brief words.

The first article he declares to be Catholic, and it is that of Augustine Cap. 6 on John. I say: Perhaps the venerable father interprets the article in a kindly way; but because the matter is not subject to the speech, but the speech to the matter, the deciders of the Concilium were not obtuse. It is true that there is one holy and universal church; but that it is only one, just as there is only one number of elect in the Hussite sense, is arch-heretical. By this he [Hus] meant that those who are in mortal sin, since faith is lost, are not in the church, while the kingdom of heaven of Christ [Matth. 25, 1. ff.] is compared to ten virgins, of whom five were wise, but five were foolish, along with other similitudes that serve the same purpose. And also Augustine in the 26th Tractate on John does not serve a shake to the Hussite sentence, since he praises the communion of the Lord's Supper, about which, as I wish, the reader may judge for himself. Thus he says of the other article: - "Two natures, the divine and the human, is One Christ." For this, he has not taught anything, except that it is according to faith. In the Athanasian Creed we read differently: God and man is One Christ, not: the Godhead and mankind. In another article, "An obvious distinction of human works," 2c., which he quaintly attributes to me, and as if he had been challenged by me to judge, he exclaimed that his college had triumphed. All of you who were present can bear witness to how extremely true the venerable father spoke. And before the victory he sang a victory song at Wittenberg, now he sings another one after the victory is lost, as it were.

To the point.

That article I will never consider Christian, and for that reason I rejected Gregorius of Arimini 28. dist. 2. 6). Nor has it been discussed between us whether there can be a work that is neither good nor evil (indifferens), or whether the whole life of unbelievers is sin, or the like, as far as this article is concerned. Therefore, in order to avoid the Hussite

1) "In any case, not properly cited, perhaps 80. ckist. van. In illi8 meant." (If. ed.)

2) Eck has lost the "Constructiv".

3) Thus the Weimar one; in the other editions: Oroutia.

4) The indication of the months is found in the margin.

5) Added by us to make the interrupted Constructiv".

6) According to Luther it is "in the 2nd book, question 28". Compare St. Louis edition, Vol. XVIII, 829.

In this way he compares John Hus with Christ, but has not suffered me to compare the holy Concilia with the holy Scriptures in regard to a mockery of truth committed in a play. In this he compares John Hus with Christ, but has not suffered me to compare the sacred Concilia with the sacred Scriptures, in both of which is the undoubted and infallible truth, in regard to the mockery of truth committed in one piece. For no Christian need be moved, both by the fact that he says the Conciliar are men, and so creatures, and also that they can consequently err. For if they err, as the Concilium of Ephesus was condemned by Pope Leo, I believe, as that of Arimini, of Aachen, then they are not concilia, but wretched so-called conciliabula. Therefore, we should rather hold on to this with quite constant faith: everything that the lawfully assembled Concilia have established and decided in regard to faith, be quite certain. For thus "Christ abideth with us unto the end of the world," and, "If two be gathered together in my name" [Matt. 28:20, 18, 20]. It is very repugnant to say that because men are in a concilium, they can err. For though they are frail as men, yet it must be believed that a true concilium, lawfully assembled, is not governed by human sense, but by the Spirit of God, so that what a concilium has approved is sufficiently proved, and need not be further discussed according to any particularity or obstinacy, but we must take our minds captive under the obedience of faith. Therefore I am surprised that, since he wants to deny the text, he admits the Sicilian interpreter, the Panormitanus.

Thus, it is evident what he last quoted from the words of the apostle. Of the "reason" I have always said that this is according to the opinion of all Catholics, that Christ is the head of the Church. For he is the principal Lord. But because he has appointed Peter governor, he has also given him authority over the whole Church, as St. Leo testifies in the Canon ita dominus, 19. dist. (and I am very surprised that the venerable father has abandoned the text of St. Leo, and there seizes a gloss that is contrary to the text); indeed, so much does the heaven-bound Christ bestow, that he has appointed in his stead here a governor head, to whom one could have recourse in doubtful matters and other urgent cases, so that the whole Church of Christ should not be a "church of the Lord".

confused Anaxagorean 1) chaos. This opinion is held by the whole Church, as it is said in the responsory which the Church uses of St. Peter: You are the shepherd of the sheep, prince of the apostles. To you God has given all the kingdoms of the world. This is how we pray in the Church. Yes, St. Franciscus, who was confirmed [as a man of God] by the marks of the wounds, taught his brothers and the whole world to obey the pope, and commanded this in his Rule. Therefore, the Church sings of him: Franciscus, the Catholic and wholly apostolic man, taught to hold fast fidelity against the Roman Church. So very many popes, so the holy Concilia have decided, which I do not mention for the sake of brevity. Also many sayings of the holy fathers say the same and approve of it. I will not refrain from mentioning all this in its time, when I have seen the treatise of the venerable father on this trade 2). If, nevertheless, the supremacy of the Roman Pontiff is based only on human right, and he is exalted by the consent of the people, whence comes the privilege of the venerable father that he may beg (mendicitatis), whence this monastic habit (religionis habitus), whence the power to hear confessions, to preach, with other innumerable privileges with which they are showered by the apostolic see, although bishops, archbishops and parish priests often speak against it? Who nevertheless, as obedient children, hear the Roman Pontiff and in him Christ, so that through the good of patience they may attain eternal life.

I wanted to add this little in the present matter of the disputation, as much as time has allowed, otherwise I would add even more, if I were not prevented by weariness and the order of the most noble prince.

Martin Luther.

Two things are incumbent upon me: First, to answer the refutations of the excellent doctor; second, to oppose him according to the contract of the agreement. And since I have now already answered for three days, and the time has been spent that I have not been able to accomplish one thing either, I will briefly say that everything that has been stated by the excellent doctor, although with very many arguments, is not true.

1) Compare Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 1823.

2) Luther's "Explanation of his Thirteenth Thesis". Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 720 ff.

He has now promised for three days that he will act against me with divine right, and one has not yet heard a testimony of divine right, except Matth. 16,18. f., of which we have all heard in how many different ways it has been treated by the holy fathers, and that the greater part and their more correct opinion is on my side. He himself has attracted One passage of Augustine for himself, and another of Ambrose; all the rest were words of Pelagius, of Anacletus, of those who have compiled human opinions. Cyprian, however, keeps it almost entirely with me, which I leave to the judgment of an understanding reader. Similarly, the extremely clear text of Jerome to Evagrius and about Titus; then Gregory in the register through almost six letters; then the Histories and the use of the Oriental Church; for it serves no purpose that the Doctor has cited the Rottian Greeks, Nestorius and others; those did not belong to the Oriental Church. I, too, can describe the Latin church by people like Pelagius, Manichaeus, Jovinianus, Vigilantius, Helvidius, and similar monsters; but far be it from me that I should call any whole church a Rottian one for the sake of a few wicked and Rottians. The other I will not be able to pursue, and reserve for myself especially the articles of John Hus, which have been reproached to me, and among these the last of the human actions to pen and paper, and everything else, which I would have wanted to object to, so that I may do in writing what I cannot do here, since I am not given room, and in this I will yield and obey the orders of the most noble prince, the most gracious patron of the university. About this I require you, gentlemen notaries, and call the audience as witnesses.

On the seventh day of July in the year 1519, early at seven o'clock.

Corner.

Because the venerable father would have had an hour yesterday to answer ours, so that we could thus fulfill the orders of the most noble prince.

he called to the pen, since a great deal passes through the word when answering; but after consultation he offered to answer even more completely. I did not refuse out of love for the truth and for its explanation. I wonder how the venerable father dares to roar before so many learned men that I would have said that I would prove the sole supremacy and the supreme authority in the church from divine right, while I would have brought forward only sayings of the holy fathers and decrees of the popes, although I have quoted to him the divine right Matth. 16, 18, about the promise of building on the rock, that Christ especially prayed for Peter's faith, that he especially promised him to strengthen the brethren [Luc. 22, 32], that he especially commanded him in the presence of John and Jacob to feed the sheep three times [Joh. 21,15-17], and that this divine right is to be understood in this way. Then I mentioned the holy fathers, the popes and the martyrs, the agreement of the conciliarities and all the universities. Therefore, it is proved by divine right that there is a supreme authority in the Church; only that the venerable father holds his opinion higher than that of so many holy fathers, popes and the holy Concilium, although the praiseworthy Costnitz Concilium condemned such an article among the pernicious ones of John Hus. The venerable father is silent on this. If he can bring something better to explain the truth, which he could have done yesterday according to the order of the most noble prince, then I am ready to listen, under the condition that he, while he has the office of a responder, does not cunningly put himself in the position of an opponent at the end of the action. But everything he will always object against this irrefutable truth, I am ready to answer with this, what I have mentioned, and to nullify it. This I testify herewith.

Since it had been determined yesterday in the name of the most illustrious prince, our patron, that this matter should be concluded that day, and the excellent doctor had taken up the greater part of the time without need and in a more spiteful manner than befitted this brilliant audience, there remained for me a single little hour left for a three-day answer, in which I should answer [respondiren] to his so great mixture and at the same time also make objections [opponiren]. It pleased our most noble prince of his own accord that I should be given the opportunity to respond as well as to oppose, for which I thank his most noble grace. And therefore, in order to get to the point, before I continue the response I began yesterday, I will first dispel this morning fog of Doctor Eck, since in his way he accuses me of Hussite heresies quite spitefully and again and again, despite the fact that I have purified myself so often, and for this reason I will make a short preface in German, because I hear that I have a very bad reputation among the common man.

He declared, however, that he did not dispute the supremacy and obedience to the Roman Church, and that this could not be disputed by anyone in a Christian way, but he was drawn to declare that this supremacy was not of divine right, just as the imperial power could not be rejected among the Germans, although it was not founded in the Holy Scriptures. Although Doctor Eck said that it was true that this was the point of controversy, whether the sovereignty of the Roman Church was from divine right [, he nevertheless stated], 1) that it is known that this disapproval is Hussite and an article that was rejected by the Costnitz Council, and it was to be deplored if the hearts of Christians were so cold that no one defended it. After that, Doctor Martinus began to continue in Latin.

That he now introduces this scriptural word Matth. 16, 18. and claims that sovereignty was promised there, it has been sufficiently answered in the foregoing that the excellent Doctor has hardly two warrantors, and even these are ambiguous with regard to his opinion, while the greater part holds that Peter was the representative (personam) of all apostles and believers there.

which even the text itself demands in its context, since Christ asks all, and not only Peter, since he says Matth. 16, 15. ff.]: "Who do you say that I am?" and Peter answers for all as the mouth of the apostles, as Chrysostom says, and the representative of the apostles, as Jerome and Origen say, and Beda and Augustine and Ambrose. That is why I have said that from this passage of Scripture nothing is proved for the supremacy. Likewise, that the text itself does not say: You are Peter and on you, but: "on this rock", obviously naming another rock (petram), of which Peter is named. Therefore, since there are common laws and the Roman popes themselves testify that the interpretation of Scripture is more valid with the teachers than with them, it should indeed be different in the decision 2) about things.

Yesterday I said enough about that article of Hus that it is not yet proven that it is heretical. This as an answer for this morning.

To return to yesterday's question, since the excellent Doctor objected in the second place that the deposition of Chrysostom was unlawful because it was done out of hatred of the Empress, I deny the implication. For the power to ordain and depose, which was decreed by the holy Concilium, was not unlawful because it might have been used badly by chance. For it is also written in the same history that the Roman pope Victor, a martyr, wanted to banish the bishops of Asia; but they, as superiors, imposed silence on him and ordered him not to disturb the church, in the fifth book of church history. But Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons in France, also put the same Roman bishop in check, and in Greece at that time there were Epiphanius, who was most gloriously praised by Jerome, Gregory, and Gregory the Apostle.

of Nazianzus, Basil, exceedingly Christian men, who nevertheless were never under the Roman pope, but were ordained by the bishops of the provinces according to the decrees of the Nicene Council. However, the fact that the excellent Doctor states that Julius I had excommunicated the Emperor Arcadius does not serve the purpose. For Boniface VIII was also subject to it, and wanted to push the king of France from his throne; it is not proven that this is a right, which the Roman popes have always undertaken from time to time out of human frailty. And it is not to be wondered at that these holy men were plagued by the challenge of ambition, since more than once the exceedingly holy apostles, even when Christ was still present, suffered from it.

That he says that the bishop of Jerusalem was given the prerogative of honor, he says right, but does not prove that the supremacy, at least of the Roman pope, is by divine right.

Also, the excellent Doctor says very well that the sixth synod gave the supremacy to the Roman Church, but not the previous synods. For this is what I intended, that this supremacy was given by synodal decrees and by human law with the consent of Christ's faithful, which must not be opposed. St. Gregory also says this in the register in these words: You know that the venerable Synod of Chalcedon has entrusted the supremacy to this apostolic see, and yet none of my predecessors has ever presumed to assume it. Therefore, it proves nothing that the excellent Doctor says that Gregory did not reject the supremacy, but asserted it. Let the godly reader read the letters of Gregory, and he will find that Gregory rejected the supremacy and did not claim the general episcopate, as we have sufficiently proved from the above, dist. 99.

Regarding the testimony of Augustine to the Roman pope Innocens and his answer to the latter, I answer: Let the reader read the words of both, and judge whether or not the apt

The doctor has added new meanings to the words.

Of the twenty years of the church before the Roman one, he said that with Peter the supremacy was transferred to Rome, perhaps wanting this saying: Where the pope is, there is Rome. I answer: It should have been the supremacy that was to be transferred, not the transfer, which I gladly concede.

He has also attracted a testimony of Augustine against the Manichaeans, which, as I assume, is in the second book of the "Christian Doctrine" Cap. 8¹), that in a doubtful matter to the certainty of faith serves the reputation of the Catholic Church, which is fortified by the chairs of the apostles, which follow one another, and by the uninterrupted series of bishops and the consensus of the people. He [Augustine] does not speak of the Roman Church, but of the general one, and this serves for me against the Doctor, because Augustine describes the succession in different apostolic chairs one after another and with the agreement of the people, but not the confirmation of other chairs by one chair.

Now to the matter itself.

About the saying Matth. 16,18.: "You are Peter", and to the attracted warrant men, he said, I would not have answered. I give this home to you, my listeners and readers, whether this is true. He opposed Augustine, who in the retractationes gives the reader the choice between the two views of one and the same saying, saying: he accepts both opinions; which pleases me, and so he proves nothing against me.

The second saying of the divine right, which was quoted by the worthy Lord, is this [Joh. 21, 17.]: "Feed my sheep", Johannis at the last, and I am glad that one finally gets to hear a testimony of the divine right after three days, on which one's opinion shall be firmly based. But we also want to look at it.

First of all, this saying seems to be understood in two ways. According to the one

1) Luther is mistaken: the passage is rather found in Hd. XI, 6. 2. contra I'uustuii Mauiedaeuru. (Weim. Ausg.)

Under the word "love", know that it is the same as trusting in yourself, and that each one is free; and under the word "feed", the same as being first and ruling, and so the meaning will be: "Peter, if you love me", that is, if you seek your own, and do everything that pleases your flatterers, then "feed my sheep", that is, be first and lord over all. I do not have this sense in my Bible. In the other way, "If you love me," that is, deny yourself, if you lay down your life for me, even if you spurn all dignities and love nothing but me, as Augustine gloriously puts it in the same passage, "feed my sheep," that is, teach, preach the word, exhort, pray, set a good example. For the Greek word in this passage does not mean to govern and feed alone, but to care sweetly and gently, and to do all that the sheep may not lack, and this sense, I believe, is the evangelical one. Therefore, I ask Doctor Eck to pray with me to the Lord Jesus Christ, that He will not only give the highest, but also all bishops, that they may believe that these words concern them. There is no doubt that the whole world would welcome such a man with open arms and tearful eyes, who wanted to live by these words. Therefore, if the excellent doctor looks carefully at the text, there is not a right and a privilege granted there, as one thinks, but a command is laid down and a nowadays unpleasant work is imposed, and an office is commanded to him who in fact is already appointed either to the first or to a lesser position, and is not first appointed. Now if he should insist that an office cannot be administered unless there is first a doctrine (loous) of authority, I like that; but then this doctrine must be founded in another way, here this word commands only the office. Therefore the holy fathers were right when they said that this passage concerns everyone. For no one can deny that if Peter is commanded all the sheep here, that he himself did not feed them all, as St. Augustine says, and the book of the Acts of the Apostles clearly states.

and so he would have been disobedient to Christ. And it cannot be said that, though he did not feed them in his own person, yet he did so through other subordinates. First of all, in order to admit that we might take it that Peter was not told in his own person to shepherd, but to shepherd through others, 1) it is clear that neither any of the apostles nor at least Paul was made a subordinate by Peter, since they shepherded many more sheep than Peter. Therefore, the understanding of the word must be taken from the whole Scripture and from the circumstances of the events, that this saying cannot go to Peter alone, or not to all the sheep. Thirdly. If by these words the supremacy will be proved, the supremacy will be uncertain and void, because the supremacy is not set otherwise than under the condition of love. For it is not necessary to tear the Scriptures into different pieces, but rather to bring them into harmony, and therefore, since it is uncertain who loves Christ, it will also be uncertain to us who our shepherd is. And if love is not necessary for him, it will also not be necessary for us to acknowledge him as our shepherd. It is not said, therefore, that this word is a command given to all the rulers of the church, that they should offer themselves for the sheep of Christ, despising riches, dignities, even supremacy, and finally life and death. Who is he, let us praise him!

I pass over what he quoted from Chrysostom about the summit of the college, and how Peter was given sovereignty over the whole earth, because I admit everything that he was the first in honor, but not the only one in administration, at least according to divine right.

From the case of Peter, Gal. 2,11. ff., where the excellent Doctor again spitefully reproached me with a Hussite article:

1) Here Walch has the Conjectur: "It should read: non esse dictum Petro ipsimet in persona propria: Pasce tu, sed: pasce per alium", which the Weimar edition has adopted. The other editions read: ...?etro PU866 P6r LÜUIN, 863 ip8iilN6t in p6r8ONL propria PU866 tu, tarN6N 6t6t.

it was not a spiritual or civil lord who was in mortal sin, if I said that Peter was not a superior for this reason, because he had sinned to death, I answer: it was not dealt with, and this disputation is "about the sea-butt". 1) I know, and know it very well, that an evil overlord must not be rejected. That is why I also condemn this Hussite article. But this is what I intended, that Peter, since he gave trouble in the cause of faith, if he had not been set right by Paul, should rightly be removed from the chief place, for a heretical shepherd, or one who hypocrites to the danger of the faith, sins grievously. For through this hypocrisy of Peter, faith in Christ was completely destroyed, as Paul says. Therefore, if Peter had not been corrected, he should have been considered as nothing, let alone the highest bishop. A mortal sin harms one's own person, but a heresy harms the common person and the community. Therefore, I thank the doctor that I have at least learned from this disputation that "to build on the rock" means: to stand under a sovereign, be he good or evil. For I confess that I did not know this meaning of building and rock before, for he said that even if Peter had fallen into mortal sin, he would still have remained the rock, that is, the first and the overlord.

That he says that in the past the bishops would not have been confirmed if they had not delivered a note about their faith, I am satisfied with that. But this has nothing to do with the divine right, because I take nothing from the pope, whatever is attached to him.

After that he dressed Nicolaus of Cusa and excused Anacletus, the holy man, that such a great science was not necessary for him. I concede that to such a holy man. But still it is disgraceful for a pope, may he be holy or not, not to know the gospels, since he is a shepherd of the sheep and a teacher of the gospel. But since "Cephas" is from the

1) a "I rUomMim, Iuvenal. IV, v. 39 soo. Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 1675 f., note.

Since the thunderskiud, which knows all languages, thunders like this, the vanity of the earthly smoke must rightly be silent, whether it be Nicolaus of Cusa, a Chaldean or a Hebrew. Not as if I wanted to reproach the excellent Doctor, who said that Peter means the same as "head of the house" in Chaldean according to his guide from Cusa, but I want to praise the intrepid disputator, who is so bold to enter the battlefield of the theologians, and yet has not previously studied so much in the Evangelio that he would have read the first chapter in the Evangelio Johannis. Likewise, he did not read in his book: Who is Cephas? I forgive that, but let him read the first chapter [v. 12. Cap. 3,4. f. 22.] of the first letter to the Corinthians and he will find it.

Finally, he does not want to pass judgment on the articles of the Bohemians, although he never refrains from insulting me with them. I, too, pass over it and say nothing more than that I approve of Gregorius of Arimini dist. 28, which the excellent doctor has rejected. For he is nothing other than Augustine and the holy scriptures, who contradicts all scholastic teachers, but most of all Aristotle, but has not yet been refuted by anyone.

I agree with the Doctor that the decisions of the Concilium must be accepted in matters concerning the faith. However, I reserve the right, which must also be reserved, that a concilium has sometimes erred and can sometimes err, especially in matters that do not concern the faith. Nor does a concilium have the power to make new articles in the faith; otherwise we would at last have as many articles as opinions of men.

At the end, when he cites St. Francis: we must obey the pope, I wonder against whom he said that. Likewise, I pass over the attacks on the mendicant monks. Even this wretched clothing torments the excellent Doctor. I express it as my opinion: I would like there to be no mendicant order.

Behold, this is what I had to answer to the objections of the excellent doctor against the thirteenth thesis. Therefore, after the answer is finished, it remains that I also present what moves me against the excellent Doctor.

Here Eck thundered that he wanted to answer the objections as if he had been a responder. Martin answered that in this way the disputation would never come to an end, and accused Eck's courageous will, which also tended to catch every single word. It was certainly through God's guidance that the most gracious Duke George was present, at whose beckoning and godly command Martin was allowed to attack Eck's thesis, which is opposed to the one already discussed.

Against the opinion of the excellent doctor there seems to argue what he has so bravely skipped in his refutation and what is written in 1 Cor. 3, 5, where Paul takes the reputation of the person from all apostles and says: Who is Apollo? who is Paul? who is Cephas? They are servants through whom you have believed. Here Paul wants to completely remove the cause of strife and division; he denies that any church belongs to any of the apostles, but all are common to all, therefore he says at the end of the third chapter, v. 21 ff: "All are yours, whether Cephas or Apollos or Paul. But ye are Christ's." And the excuse is not valid that it is said that they did not dispute about the supremacy, but about the special gifts, of the persons, since the text is clear that they disputed about the dignities of the persons, that some preferred Peter to all, others Paul, some Apollo, but others Christ alone. This is confirmed by what is written in Gal. 2, where the Galatians, seduced by a similar dispute, abandoned Paul and his teaching as unworthy because of Peter's praised supremacy. Against this he proves in a long text that the supremacy of Peter or the other apostles is of no importance, saying that he was neither sent to them by a man nor through a man, that he had not even seen Peter nor learned from him, but that he had had and taught everything without Peter. If, therefore, the reputation of Peter is necessary and was divine right, then Paul will obviously be ungodly and blasphemous in this passage, since he also does not want to be regarded as being sent by God through a man, and completely rejects Peter's reputation. Thirdly, even more clearly, since he says: "Those who had prestige have taught me nothing, and what they were like in their days is of no concern to me, for God does not respect the prestige of men. Behold, here he clearly says that the dignity (qualitas) of Peter and the other apostles is none of his business, which would be exceedingly ungodly to say if Peter's dignity had to be held by divine right. With the same impiety he would say: "God does not respect the reputation of men", since he commands divine right and what is divine right even under the penalty of eternal damnation. Therefore it is evident that this supremacy and sovereignty, or by whatever name one may call Peter's prestige or dignity, is not ordered by divine right.

Corner.

Since the venerable father cites three testimonies of St. Paul against me, which have long since been raised by the opponents of the apostolic see and explained by the defenders of the apostolic see, I answer him easily by denouncing the evil makeup with which he endeavors to cover his doctrine and to glue people's mouths and eyes. I say, first, that I do not, as he interprets to me, skip over the apostle's passage in the first Epistle to the Corinthians Cap. 3, 5. I have skipped over it, although he has wrongly mentioned Cephas with Paul and Apollo, because the text does not have him in the beginning, but at the end he remembers Cephas. But immediately the note (Alossa) placed between the lines confesses that he is greater than all. Therefore, the venerable father should take the holy scripture not according to his head, but according to that of the saints. And I say that the best and irrefutable solution is given, and the make-up of the venerable father, by which he listens to the simple ones, does not make any difference. St. Jerome is witness to this, who in the first book against Jovinianus, Col. 18 in my edition, expressly says that the church was built on Peter. There the venerable father bravely jumped over, and says nothing. And afterwards: so that, after the

The opportunity for division would be taken away if the head is appointed. Therefore, because the apostle Paul wanted to prevent divisions and strife, he did not thereby take away the supremacy, because the divisions cannot be better removed than by a head. Therefore, neither a word nor a tittle serves the cause of denying the supremacy. Therefore he started wrongly today, that I had hardly cited two holy fathers, and ambiguous ones at that, while I have cited certain and undoubted ones, Augustine, Ambrose, Jerome, Chrysostom, Leo, Bernardus 2c. But that he commends that I accept both opinions of Augustine, lid. 1. rstraet. eap. 21, which he confirms, and he himself does the same. 1)

But that he introduces Paul in the second place in the letter to the Galatians [Gal. 2, 11. ff.], as if he had written against Peter, since he wanted to fortify the Galatians in the faith, and there in the whole course indicates that he was equal to Peter and to the others, because he did not receive it from a man nor through a man, so I say that, if the venerable father were such a diligent investigator of the truth as he promises, he would have learned the right foundations and understanding of the Scriptures, and it would not be necessary for him to say so boastfully in such a large assembly that he alone would resist a thousand. This is the truth and the matter of the apostleship and the dignity of the position. The apostles were all equal. This is what the Holy Scriptures and the Holy Fathers intended. Jerome says that Paul would not have punished Peter if he had known that he was not equal to him. Thus Anacletus says can. In novo, that the apostles were gifted with equal authority; so Cyprianus, so also others. Now since Paul had been ordained an apostle by Christ, he freely said that he had not received it from a man nor through a man, and that Jacob and Peter had taught him nothing; for all this is to be referred to the apostleship.

But it is different with the power of government and administration, where the opinion of the holy fathers and the Concilium against John Hus is unanimous, that just Peter was granted such a supremacy. Therefore, he does not use the testimonies of the Holy Scripture correctly, but draws them differently according to his will.

where, contrary to what the Holy Spirit requires. For what he emphasized today, that Paul said he did not care what kind of people they were, does not mean what the venerable father wanted, but this: Peter and Jacob and others would have been unlearned and inexperienced people before they walked with the Lord, and so God does not respect reputation. But he will say, as he is bold, "This is an angular little bundle. Let him read Ambrose on this passage, who does not falsify Paul's opinion and freely testifies that the church is founded on the rock. Therefore, if he cannot bring anything more solid, I beg him to desist from his intention. Therefore, when I said today that it was a Hussite article: ecclesiastical obedience is not expressed by a saying of the Holy Scripture, he answered briefly: the article is not heretical. I would rather deal with the venerable father in an attacking way and say: this is a damned article and he holds it; therefore he holds a damned and rejected article. Likewise I ask: if the article is not heretical, it is either presumptuous, or seditious, or offensive to godly ears. Now whatever the father will accept, he will be either a presumptuous man, or a rebel, suspected of heresy, giving offense to godly ears, against the theological cause [that we intend].

I am surprised with which peacock color he decorates the words of Christ Matth. 16, 15. ff. That Christ asked all disciples, and so Peter answered for all, - who denies that? But he added from his stuff that for this reason he said to Peter for himself and the other apostles: "You are Peter, and on this rock", which I do not accept as a Lutheran confession with the holy fathers.

With regard to Chrysostom, it is astonishing what injustice he does to the Holy Father, as if he had been deposed lawfully and according to the decisions of the Nicene Council, while it is known from the histories that, according to Eusebius of Antioch, I believe a Rottir, Christian bishops were expelled along with others who were rebellious against the Roman pope, who, seeking help from the supreme see, suffered expulsion from the godless Rottians until the time of Theodosius, a very Christian emperor. At that time, when the Rottians had occupied the see for thirty years, St. Gregory of Nazianzus accepted the bishopric of Constantinople, not out of ambition, but so that other Rottians would not succeed him.

1) In passing: D. Martin denied that he had done so, as he testified above.

would like. St. Chrysostom, however, having been unjustly expelled by Epiphanius and replaced by the Rottian Arsacius, has returned through the prestige of the Roman pope. And it is not valid that the venerable father blasphemes the Roman pope of that time and the saints who adhered to him, as if they had proceeded against those Rottians by deed but not by right. This he says with his unproven words, that even so many saints, who were praised even by the Lord Father, did not agree with the Roman Pontiff. Therefore, the venerable father now begins without cause to accuse those holy fathers who lived a thousand years ago of ambition, from which vice they have been considered free by the whole Church for so many centuries.

Thus it is also captious and deceives the simple-minded that St. Gregory did not want to call himself an ecumenical and universal shepherd. For the day before he so highly exalted Platina, who, as he said, had followed the truth of history; now he rejects Platina according to his will, which, as he thinks, he is free to do everywhere.

He cites the decree for himself; when it is cited, he rejects it; and when he has quite clear texts, even the Canon Leo's ita dominus, 19. dist. and the like, against him, he adopts the gloss, just as the suitors of Penelope, to speak jocosely, since they could not seize the mistress, went after the maids. It is certain that also holy popes have called themselves general bishops, as Sixtus, as Victor, and as at the Concilium of Chalcedon was called to Leo: Long live the most holy Leo, the ecumenical patriarch! But the popes who followed the figure of humility and Christ abstained from this name, and better confessed that they were the servants of the servants, so that it would not be believed that they were taking away the prestige of the bishops, as St. Thomas has long since answered to those things in the book of the Controversy of the Faith.

Concerning the letter of Augustine, he makes you, gentlemen listeners, the trouble 1) that you should read the words. The words have been heard. 2) Innocentius said eleven hundred years ago that according to the custom of the ancients, in matters concerning the faith, the pope should be consulted.

1) Col. 974 f.

2) Compare Col. 961 f.

Thus the venerable father wanted to transplant the saying against the Manichaeans into his garden, but he will not do so if he reads the letter of Augustine, in which he does not enumerate the series of the entirety of the bishops, but of the Roman popes, from Peter himself to his times. 3)

The answer I gave about the twenty years, he says, is not proven by me. The venerable father is an astute disputator. I have not yet known that a respondent must prove his answer; I have always thought that the respondent offers his answer to the opponent for refutation. His Hercules has been weak, if he relies on foreign help.

But that he suffers from such a great insolence that he dares to give the most illustrious lords and you, venerable fathers, the hand, as if I had not read the first chapter of John, that is truly a tremendous presumption, since I, as a boy of not yet ten years, have read the whole Bible with the exception of the prophets. But that is not the point, how much each one has read. I have said in the defense of Anacletus that his interpretation: Kephass, that is, head, was not so ignorant, in that I know very well that in Greek means head; but because in John, whom I looked up yesterday, in Augustine and the glossa ordinaria Kephass is translated by Peter, so Peter, according to my guarantor of Cusa, also means head of the house. This all makes the venerable father ridiculous, about which the judges to be decreed may judge.

But this is even better, that he surrounds the saying: "Feed my sheep" with such great circumlocutions, just so that he makes the people who see there to be those who do not see. I pass over this, because he has put forward such a ridiculous interpretation invented by him. But I will come to another sense of this passage, since he has said many things. But I do not make use of the peculiarity, which is the mother of errors. Since I have followed the opinion of the holy fathers and the holy mother, the church, I have taken the word "pasture" in such a way that he has appointed him a shepherd and given him the supremacy over the whole church. This is how Gregory understood it, this is how Chrysostom understood it, this is how Ambrose understood it, Lucã the last, who was not quoted by me yesterday. To these the venerable

3) ^uAU8t. ex. 165. (Weim. Ausg.)

The father passed by very nicely and said nothing about it. However, he used a saying of Augustine about how a shepherd should be. I also accept this [Augustine], and believe that every believer prays that also the pope, every prince, every superior may seek the glory of God and the salvation of his subjects, that this is the right proper pasture, by which they, as they are princes here on earth, are also exalted to rule in heaven. Therefore Augustine does not say things that are against me, that dispute against me, but such things from which a superior should know what he is appointed to do. And it has no validity that the venerable Father said that the sheep were commanded to him under a condition, because there is no condition added, unless the Lord Father has a different gospel than I have. But, indicating how a shepherd must be, Christ demands love, and that is the LiHe of GOD from Peter, and thus has made him the shepherd of the whole Church, as the holy Mother, the Church, sings, and the venerable Father prays or reads: Thou, Head of the Church, Shepherd of the sheep 2c. Therefore, in this place, by divine right, that the Superior must love GOD, we have Peter appointed shepherd of the sheep, as St. Gregory, St. Ambrose and Chrysostom, who is also a Greek, understood. There is nothing in the very small bad reason given by the venerable father for the opposite, that Peter did not shepherd all the sheep; what is done in our name is also said to have been done by us. Clement testifies that Peter appointed elders, bishops and deacons who were to spread the gospel throughout the world, as we read in the Canon In illis 80 or 81. 1) äi8t. Therefore, he who was sent by the head, as St. Paul was, does not need to be sent by his governor; nevertheless, Paul went up with Titus [to Jerusalem, Gal. 2, 1. ff., and discussed the gospel with Peter, and they gave him the brotherly hand.

Furthermore, that he forges a gloss against me, which I never thought of, as if I had said: to build on the rock is to be under the Roman Pontiff, - O dreams, O whimsical words! never did this occur to me. For Christ builds the church, not those who are under him; for those who are under him must belong to the church that is built.

That of Gregory of Arimini, whose opinion displeases me, but pleases him, serves nothing for now. Therefore, I do not want to get involved in these aberrations, but rather, as we began, defend that the article of the Costnitz Concilium is true, and that anyone who contradicts it is wrong and contradicts the truth and honor of the Concilium.

Martin Luther.

Before I come to the testimonies, which are opposed by me, I want to briefly go through what the excellent doctor has put together about my yesterday's and today's answer, since he, among other things, while all his weapons are, as it were, exhausted, desperately seeks the last snip of his confidence in an article of the Costnitz Council, and repeats and defuses it in the most spiteful way, as if not enough had been answered to it above. But I will say it once again.

Since the article of the works of men is enumerated among the damned, and asserted by St. Paul and St. Augustine, then defended by Gregory of Arimini, by all universities to this day, I will not be moved by the exceedingly spiteful inculcations of this article, until the excellent Doctor has proved that a concilium cannot err, has not erred, or does not err, since a concilium cannot make a divine right out of that which by its nature is not divine right. Therefore, only that which is contrary to divine law is heretical. That to this article.

That he takes up that Chrysostom was lawfully deposed, he has not understood me, since I have said clearly today that the power to ordain and depose a bishop was lawful with Epiphanius of Cyprus and Theophilus, although I have not dealt with whether they used this lawful power at that time for good or ill. It is enough for me that without the power of the Roman pope, so many holy and very famous men of Greece, who were completely Catholic and not Rotterian, had the power to ordain and depose bishops.

He also makes a big deal of the fact that I accused the old saints of ambition, and has

Do not forget that I said that the apostles also had this infirmity when Christ was present.

That he now raises Platina so high against St. Gregory, whom I have cited as a witness, it is clear to anyone who has even a mediocre mind what this proves. For I take the histories from Platina, and no more. But that the same Platina cites some reasons, I reject because of the contradictory testimony of Gregorius.

Now I pass over the fact that Sixtus and Victor called themselves general bishops and that this was called Leo in the Concilium of Chalcedon, about which enough has been said today. It should be noted that the excellent Doctor says that the following popes, following the form of humility in Christ, abstained from this name, which cannot understand otherwise than that they violated the divine right of humility, became mendacious and disobedient when it is divine right, that is, when it was commanded that they should be general bishops.

Repeating Innocentius' letter of reply to Augustine, he says that it was an old custom to consult the Roman popes in matters concerning the faith. In this he says very well and I like it, especially in the Latin Church. But what has faith to do with supremacy? That is, how does that serve our cause?

He also claimed that I had demanded from him the proof of the answer about the twenty years. The excellent doctor is missing in two ways: firstly, because he has been an opponent for four and a half days and only started to be a respondent at this time; secondly, I did not demand that he should prove the answer, but that the supremacy had been transferred with Peter.

In wanting also to widen out of what is said by "Cephas," which in John is interpreted by Peter, he still insists that Peter means the head of the house, namely, as if John, since he wants to explain the gospel to the Greeks, were not

He said that he had spoken in Greek, but in Chaldean, so that he would not be understood.

He takes the word "pasture" [Joh. 21, 17.] in such a way that he wants it to mean the appointment of a general shepherd, and for this he has cited Gregory, Ambrose and Chrysostom, who were not attracted yesterday, to whom I would have said nothing. Therefore I will say it now, if I should have forgotten it, and at the same time I oppose to him the rule of St. Augustine, that the sayings of all writers are to be judged by the holy Scriptures, whose prestige is greater than the comprehension of the whole human race. It is not that I want to condemn the opinion of the most illustrious Fathers, but that I follow those who come closest to the Scriptures, and above all, if the Scriptures are clear, I seize them myself. Since it is clear that "to feed" according to the meaning of the word and the use of Scripture means nothing else than to teach, to take care of the sheep (Peter 1 Ep. 5, 2: "Feed the flock of Christ as you are commanded"), it is not necessary to make the word ambiguous and not to leave the simple meaning without necessity.

He also refutes that I said there was a condition in Christ's words, "If thou lovest me," since I hold that there is not only a condition but also a contract between Christ and Peter, since the latter says, "Dost thou love me?" and the latter answers, "I love thee." I leave the dialectic, in which the Doctor is very skilled, also the conditional conjunction "if". I would like to hear what he would have to say about the Decretale de elect. c. significasti, where the pope Paschalis clearly says that here is a condition, namely, if the prestige of the Roman pope has such strong validity, as he has claimed so far; for he speaks according to the sense.

He has refuted my reason that Peter did not teach all of them: For, he says, what is done in our name is also said to have been done by us. But I do not believe that the doctor intended to satisfy my reason here, since he cannot say that Paul preached in Peter's name, which is not true.

In the letter to the Romans in the first chapter [v. 5] he says that he is an apostle under the name of Christ. I assume this from the fact that he says, according to Clement, that Peter had appointed bishops, elders and deacons to spread the gospel throughout the world, among whom he does not list Paul. But this seems to serve the purpose that he who has been sent by your head does not need to be sent by his governor. I allow this; if it was first proved that Peter was governor. But now Paul is no less a governor than Peter, as it has already been said that he is an apostle in the name of Christ, and so there are as many governors as apostles.

Now to the matter at hand.

Regarding the testimony of Paul 1 Cor. 3, 5, he first says that "Cephas" is not in the beginning of the text, but he is mentioned at the end, where the gloss confesses that Peter is greater than all. This is something quite minor; I pass it over, since in any case Cephas is placed in the beginning of the first chapter.

Secondly, he says nothing else than that neither a word nor a title is full of the denial of the supremacy in the text, and so he wants to have eliminated this testimony. But he has cited the "testimony" of Jerome, Augustine, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Bernard, Leo 2c. who say that Peter is the rock. Against this I say and reply: This second statement does not serve the purpose, and it is sufficiently discussed above whether Peter is the rock. Similarly, it is not a correct answer that he says that there is not a word, not a shake of the denial of supremacy. If Jerome also puts a head so that the opportunity for division would be taken away, the clear text argues quite strongly against it, which takes away the head so that the opportunity for division would be taken away. For he says Cor. 3:5, "Who is Paul? Who is Apollo?" in that he wants Christ alone to be the head, through whom in truth all division is taken away. This answer is not enough for me.

Regarding the testimony of Gal.2,1.ff.he says that all apostles are equal, which is also testified by Jerome and the Canon In novo, but that it is

The power of government and administration is something else. That such a great testimony should be disproved with these three words is quite wondrous to me. But I also do not yet understand how he could separate government and administration. But that he said that Paul went out to Peter with Titus to discuss the gospel with them is clear from the preceding and following texts, as Jerome himself interprets that Paul did not do this to consult Peter about the gospel, which he had already preached for more than fourteen years, and boasted that he had not received it from a man, but to shut up the false apostles and to reassure the Galatians that it was the same as what he and the other apostles had preached.

Corner.

That the venerable father mixes the article of John Hus about obedience to the church with the other article about the works of human actions according to the testimony of Gregory of Arimini, which is to be defended by all universities, I have not yet heard that it has been defended in any university, although I have been to very many. But he asks me to prove to him that a concilium cannot err. I do not know what this request is about, whether he secretly also wants to hold the laudable Costnitz Concilium suspicious. I tell you, venerable father, if you believe that a lawfully assembled concilium can err and has erred, you are like a heathen and a tax collector to me. What a heretic is, I will not discuss now.

Regarding Chrysostom, he does not want that he justified his expulsion, but that he praised the ordinance of the bishops instituted by the Nicene Concilium. This pleases me because of the deference to St. Chrysostom, and always the Roman popes in different nations have allowed different ways to elect the bishops. But through Gregory of Nazianzus and Chrysostom's reinstatement, it is sufficiently clear that the Roman pope's power has taken the means, as witnessed by St. Athanasius of Alexandria, St. Paul, and other Eastern bishops who appealed to the Roman pope for reinstatement.

That he indicates that there was also something of human frailty in the apostles, we know. But since they held a public office, one must not disparage such holy men without consideration and cause.

He says of Platina that he accepts his historical testimony; and I, too, have quoted from Platina not a testimony, but a history.

Regarding the letter of Innocentius, he answers that it does not serve the cause, because he allows it to apply to the Latin church, but not to any other. But because this is a Lutheran gloss that is not based on any testimony or evidence, we despise it just as easily as it is cited.

About the twenty years he answers that I have been an opponent for three days now. I should have been in any case, if the venerable father had not, by his precautions, sometimes made the opponent a responder. For I did not object to this ground of proof, but he himself put it forward, and certainly Peter did not take that chair with him to Rome, but transferred the supremacy there.

Regarding the word "pasture", he wants to let Gregory, Ambrose and Chrysostom go, because the simple word should not be made ambiguous. I say: Who does not know that the word "shepherd" is an official name, a name of honor and also of burden! Therefore, he received both the office of the headship and at the same time the burden of shepherding.

I do not accept what the venerable father said about the condition, because Christ, as he is always attached to the letter, did not attach a condition to the pasture. For this would confirm the Hussite error that one who is not in love cannot be a bishop, a prelate, a shepherd 2c.

From the Canon significasti, de electione I know that Gerson and other teachers waver in the matter whether a concilium is above the pope. But because the words of the Decretale have not been consulted, cannot say anything, but assume, without wanting to bind myself by it, that Paschalis took "condition" for "quality".

As for Paul, who is said not to have acknowledged Peter's supremacy, but to have been an apostle of Christ (we are all Christ's, I believe), he nowhere took away Peter's supremacy of the regiment, but, as it is written in the Epistle of the Apostles' Entry, while still dying, he gave the apostle's supremacy of the regiment to Peter.

Peter as the head of the Church. I am not quite sure whether this letter is from St. Dionysius or not.

He said that Paul was a governor of Christ, but not a general one. For also in Revelation [Cap. 21,14.] twelve foundations of the church are laid, and yet [1 Cor. 3, 11.] no one can lay any other foundation, namely the main foundation, than the one that is laid, namely Christ.

Of the second, he said that it did not belong to the matter whether Peter was the rock, and yet this is all our bargain. But the answer I gave the day before, to which I referred, he concealed, since it is literally expressed that Paul disapproved of the quarrel. But I do not know by what perspicacity the venerable father may come to the assumption that Paul for the sake of this had put in abnegation the supremacy, in order that he might resist the schism. Perhaps he has not been in a country that had no prince, because he would have experienced the opposite, how many disputes, quarrels and disunity arise where there is no prince and head who judges and recognizes things. And it seems strange to him if I want to refute such a great testimony with so few words, namely the apostleship and the regiment; the elements (principia) are very small in size and very great in power. If the venerable father had paid attention to these two small words apostleship and regiment, the supreme head and the next after the same, which now dispute against each other, as it seems to him, he would have united the opinion of the holy scriptures and the holy fathers with each other; since this is neglected, strange and foreign doctrines must follow.

July 8.

Martin.

To the testimonies that I have brought from the letters of Paul to the Corinthians and to the Galatians, the excellent doctor, as is his way, has answered nothing, only that he repeats the Costuican Concilium and the Hussites, by which the testimonies are not refuted to me. For, as I have said, the Nicene Concilium, which is much holier and more famous, has established other things. Therefore, as much as he bases himself on his own, I base myself on mine, and say, as I said yesterday: however much a concilium may be attracted

If one becomes a divine right, then one does not receive a divine right thereby yet. Of this alone is the question; therefore a concilium does not serve the cause.

Secondly, in order rather to escape the testimonies than to refute them, he has brought forward the distinction of apostleship and government. Since this is invented by human will, and is neither contained in the holy Scriptures nor in the holy Fathers who interpret them, I am not satisfied that it has been made to me, especially since apostleship is not, as he with his own thinks, the name of a dignity, but of an office, as the apostle is clear in the Epistle to the Romans [Cap. 1, 5.] and everywhere, since he says that he received grace and apostleship for the obedience of faith. For an apostle is a messenger of the word, and apostolate or the office of the word, and so in the holy scripture apostleship or administration are generally the same, unless he wanted to understand by administration the dispute in court because of temporal church goods, which is not really an apostolic administration. I confess, if this freedom to invent were allowed, I would also like to invent that St. John is the chancellor, 1) and another apostle something else. But all this is not divine right. Therefore, that element disappears of which, although it is very small in size, it is said to be very great in power, and I am very surprised that the good Lord so shuns the holy scripture and flees from its face, turning away to those dark caves invented by men.

Therefore, the testimony to the Corinthians [Cap. 1, 12. ff. 3, 5.] still stands that Paul, in order to abolish the division, takes away the reputation of Peter, Paul, Apollo 2c. and leaves only Christ, leaving him, of course, the ministry of the word, which is indeed the apostleship and the government of the church. And it is not true that he wanted to destroy this exceedingly strong testimony by this dull similitude that a kingdom without a head is subject to divisions and many dangers.

be exposed. For there can be no church without a head, while there can be many bishops without the pope, as we see happen in federations (federibus), where the commonwealths are administered the more beautifully the less they have a common head. For this is before our eyes, that the kingdom of France, "England, Britain, Gaul, and innumerable others in the world, are without a common head, and yet they do not clash, each kingdom being satisfied with its king. Now if in these temporal, fluctuating things, with so many different minds and customs of men, who have neither in heaven nor on earth a common head, there is peace and concord among the countries, how much more can this happen in spiritual, permanent things, that is, among men endowed with One Faith, with the same love, the same customs, then having a common head in heaven, as the apostle says, "One Faith, One Lord," in the Epistle to the Ephesians [Cap. 4, 5.]. Therefore, if there were ten popes, if there were a thousand popes, there would not be divisions for this reason.

Therefore, I still wish that the Doctor would better refute Paul's testimony; likewise also that in the letter to the Galatians [Cap. 2, 6]: "God does not respect the reputation of men" 2c., where Paul rejects everything that can only ever be a personal reputation or what is called a personal reputation in Peter and the apostles. This is' not yet touched, let alone refuted.

To end the disputation, I also add that Paul in the first letter to the Corinthians Cap. 12, 28, when describing the body of the church, names in the first place the apostles, in the second place the prophets, in the third place the teachers, and almost in the last place the governors, whom the Lord Doctor calls administrators. Therefore, if Peter's supremacy were such a great and necessary thing according to divine right, Paul would have described the church insufficiently, since he has omitted the most important thing that is in it.

2) It seems from Eck's answer that rather: "Spain, France, England, Hungary" should be read.

1) As one can see from the following answer of Eck, Luther added here: "Marcus the seal-keeper".

Furthermore, it is still certain that neither Peter nor all the apostles could ordain Matthias, Apost. 1, 15. ff., nor give him the administration. Therefore, the Roman Pontiff presumes more with the bestowal of administration over the whole world, which he does not find in the apostle who is his predecessor.

In the same way I judge the ordinance of Paul and Barnabas Apost. 13, 2. 13, 2. The Holy Spirit, not Peter or the church, segregated. Therefore he boasts [Gal. 2, 6.] not unjustly that he received nothing from the great apostles. Yes, when he writes to the Corinthians, he says [2 Cor. 11, 5. Vulg.] that he did nothing less than the other apostles.

But even this saying restricts Peter still more narrowly, since he writes to the Galatians [Gal. 2:8], "He that was strong with Peter for the apostleship among the circumcision, the same was strong with me among the Gentiles"; and afterwards [v. 9 f.], "They gave me and Barnaba the right hand, and became one with us, that we should preach among the Gentiles, and they among the circumcision; only that we should remember the poor." If I were to rely on this saying, neither the Lord Doctor nor any man could enforce that Peter's apostleship by divine right extended further than over the Jewish land, and that for this reason all the sayings on which he relies [John 21:17]: "Feed my sheep" 2c. and [Matthew 16:18]: "You are Peter" 2c. must be referred to the boundaries of his apostleship. Alls this way Christ Joh. 10, 16. clearly separates the sheep of the Gentiles from the sheep of Israel by saying: "I have other sheep, they are not of this fold."

And finally, what the Doctor also touched upon yesterday, Revelation 21:14, the new Jerusalem is described with twelve reasons besides the main reason, Christ, and yet no distinction is made among the twelve reasons, which would have had to be done if so much were to be thought of Peter's supremacy. Many figures in Scripture refer to the same thing, such as 1 Kings 7:25, the twelve oxen of the brazen sea, the twelve lions at Solomon's throne, the twelve stones, and the twelve lions of the kingdom.

at the Jordan [Jos. 4, .] and the like, in which a complete equality of all apostles is described. And against this no inequality can be proven by divine right.

This shall be said for this thesis, of which I believe to this day that it is quite true, yes, I know for sure, I also do not hope that it will ever be overturned. Therefore, I ask that the excellent doctor, since he has not yet produced any testimony of divine right for his opinion, should at least refute some clearly and without detours, otherwise I will not consider him a theologian who has a right opinion of Scripture, and leave it to the judgment, not of envy nor of the great crowd, but of the judges to be decreed and of every understanding reader and sincere listener.

Corner.

I do not know what the venerable father may want, since he says at the beginning of his speech that I have answered nothing, and yet in the further course of the same he endeavors to overturn my unconquered and exceedingly strong answers given yesterday: whether this rhymes with each other, let him see for himself.

Then, that he does not want to be bound by the reputation of the Costnitz Council, he may see for himself, the judges may see how right he has done it. I do not reject the Nicene Church Assembly in matters that are based on faith and morals, as the ordination of bishops can be changed according to the nature of times and places.

He demands from me that I teach him divine right. Although I have often done this, there is nothing about it in my thesis, but only because the venerable father said in the "Explanations" 1) that the Roman Church was not higher than others before the times of Silvester, which I deny in my thesis: but I confess that the supremacy of the Roman Pontiff, according to what I have taught, is from divine right.

Then, in order to reject my answer, he says that my distinction is invented by human will, as if in theology it were not allowed to

would be to make distinctions. Thus Arius wanted to mock Athanasius (for he held too tenaciously to the letter, and said that the Son was a creature) by the word [Joh. 14, 28.]: "The Father is greater than I." This Athanasius refuted by the distinction: The Father is greater than I according to humanity, but not according to divinity. Because Arius did not distinguish the sacred Scriptures, he did not accept this [refutation] 1) and remained obstinate in his error. Thus, in the present trade, since those who expound the sacred Scriptures will have eternal life, distinctions must be made by comparing the various passages of Scripture, lest a contradiction be allowed in the sacred Scriptures, lest one who clings too closely to the letter be killed, but rather be made alive by the Spirit. And because Peter is often preferred to the others in the Scriptures, often found equal to them, it is necessary, in order to avoid contradiction, to make a distinction in accordance with the Scriptures. This is also stated by Jerome and Cyprian, whom I have mentioned, in the fourth book of the ninth epistle, who also confess the equality of the apostleship and yet attribute supremacy to Peter, which cannot happen if it is not referred to different pieces.

It pleases me that he says the apostolate is an office, but only in such a way that he also says it is an honor. For these are names both of honor and burden, as I have said, which the apostle indicates in the Epistle to the Romans Cap. 10, 15. "How shall they preach, if they be not sent?"

With regard to administration, I again agree with the venerable father, namely, that in temporal matters it is much less than in spiritual matters. Let us pray to God that our bishops may recognize this, and not, through their deputies, neglect the spiritual and the temporal themselves. I have indicated the administration of the regiment in spiritual things according to authority (potestive), and it is not opposed to this that the venerable father says, so he too can invent that John is the chancellor, Marcus the seal-keeper 2c., because, as Augustine says, the philosophers use free words, but for us it is proper to speak according to a certain rule. Therefore, one must teach such things as receive their reason (fundamentum) from sacred Scripture, as the first member of the apostleship in the equality of the apostles, the other member of the government in the supremacy of Peter. Therefore, I confess that Paul's testimony is exceedingly strong, but that it does not contradict me in one letter.

The venerable father disregarded the simile I mentioned about the divisions in a country when there is no overlord, because it is like that in the kingdoms of the faithful in Spain, France, England, Hungary, which are without a head, and yet peace exists because there is unity among them. I wonder how the venerable father can have forgotten so many murders, wars and battles that he must know about. I do not want to say about the so long disunity and the constant hatred between the French and the English, also the deep-rooted hatred between the French and the Spaniards, who have so often waged wars for the Kingdom of Naples with very great shedding of Christian blood, and yet God would that there would finally be a constant and lasting peace! I acknowledge one faith, one Lord, Christ, with the apostle, but I worship the Roman pope as Christ's governor. Therefore, the previous answer stands unconquered and firm, at least according to my poor judgment. Scholars may judge about it. 2)

Moreover, the reverend father says that the words of Paul [Gal. 2, 6.]: "God does not respect the reputation of men", are not touched by me and therefore even less answered. Perhaps he overheard it because I indicated both from Ambrose and Jerome the opinion of these words. For John and Peter were unlearned men and could not read (analphabetici) in the law, Paul, on the other hand, was learned and took to above many of his contemporaries, as he testifies of himself. Therefore, Paul did not want to take into account what kind of people Peter and John would have been, because God does not respect the reputation of men. For He chose the fisherman as well as the learned scribe, but this does not abolish Peter's supremacy. But God cannot be blamed for the reputation of the person, even if He chooses one before another, as Peter confessed of Cornelius [Acts 10:34]: "Now I learn with truth that God does not regard the person."

Now let's move on to what Venerable Father was referring to.

He cites the apostle in the first letter to the

1) Thus supplemented by the Weimar edition.

2) In passing, "Because we are all blind, Eck said." - The Erlangen edition notes, "It is to be read: Luther."

Corinthians, Cap. 12, 28, which, in describing the spiritual body, lists the apostles, the prophets, the teachers and finally the government. I say that the apostle did indeed describe them well, but that he neither denied nor taught the supremacy. Therefore, the reason for the proof is without force: Here Paul did not think of such a supremacy, therefore there is no supremacy in the church, both because even children know that a doctrine from a saying has no validity in a negative way, and also because even in the holy Scriptures what is not expressed in one place, according to the teaching of Augustine in the book "Of Christian Doctrine", must be taken from another place, as we have done. Similarly, I answer the word Revelation 21:14. I confess that there are twelve reasons. These may also be represented by the twelve oxen, by the twelve lions, by the twelve stones of Jordan. But in this the twelve number of the apostles is taught, but for this reason the supremacy is not denied. But I have quoted this passage because it is necessary to show that the various pieces of Scripture agree with each other, and since the apostle [1 Cor. 3:11.1] laid one foundation, Christ, and no one can lay another, it is not necessary for this reason to deny Peter as the foundation of the church, because John, who is also holy, laid twelve foundations. If one does not accept the distinction between the foundation of the reasons, which is the most important one, and the one that is put in its place or the one that is put in second place, then one will not be able to unite Paul and John.

In the second place he mentioned that Peter could not have ordained Matthias, so the Holy Spirit had ordained Paul and Barnabas. I answer: Since the apostles were bishops, I do not remember to have found in the Holy Scriptures that bishops were ordained by Christ, since he first ordained them priests at the Last Supper. Therefore, I can also refer this to Peter as far as the ordination to the bishopric is concerned. But because I allow that the office of apostleship was conferred by God alone, it is not surprising that they asked for divine assistance. For they did not cast the lot in a common way, but, as St. Dionysius testifies, that lot was the visible appearance of the Holy Spirit. Therefore this passage serves for the supremacy of Peter, because he exercised the supremacy granted to him [Apost. 1, 15. ff.]: "In those days Peter stood up among the disciples" 2c., as also with Ananias and Sapphira [Apost. 5,

3. ff]; so in the apology of the apostles [Apost. 2, 15.] that they were not full of sweet wine; so in the answer and defense before the assembly of the Jews [Apost. 4, 8. ff] and in other things contained in the Acts of the Apostles, where he exercised the rule of the higher position. Thus I believe that Matthias received the apostleship from the Lord and was ordained bishop by St. Peter. I have also long since admitted that Paul received the apostleship from God; I confess that he worked more than the others.

But let us come to the third, which among the other things mentioned by the venerable father seems to be the most relevant, Gal. 2:8: "Who was strong with Peter." And I say that Paul did not make known a divine right there, but tells a fact, because Peter also received the command in the Acts of the Apostles [Cap. 10] to instruct the Gentile Cornelius in the faith, and presided over the Gentiles in Antioch, where he had his highest seat, and likewise in Rome, where he was finally crowned with martyrdom by the Gentile Nero, 1) and taught at the same time as the Jews who had been converted to the faith and were to be converted. Therefore it is clear that Paul told a fact at that time. I pass over that St. Paul does not think of the office of the regiment or the supremacy of the first place, but of the exercise of the apostleship, according to which the apostles were given different lands, in which also Peter was equal to the other apostles, according to Anacletus eun. in novo, according to Jerome against Jovinian and about the epistle to the Galatians, according to Cyprian in the ninth letter to the Pope Cornelius, in the fourth book. On this matter, the Scriptures must be understood with precision, so that we may be careful when they speak of the apostleship and when they speak of the regiment of authority or the supreme authority.

There is nothing in the fact that the venerable father still denies that I have cited divine law for the supremacy and have not refuted the testimonies that he has cited, because I could say the same about him. But none of the holy fathers has understood the testimonies which the venerable father has cited in such a way as to deny the supremacy of Peter over the others, as he has cited them. On the other hand, the holy fathers have in many places the testimonies, which I have quoted, so that they speak of the supremacy of Peter. Therefore, if I have sometimes spoken somewhat bitterly and harshly against the venerable father with respect to this thesis, do not think that it is said against his person, but the matter being treated seemed to me to be so weighty and necessary that sometimes harsher words had to be used; with the other theses you will always experience the corner modesty.

Therefore, I will end this thesis for now by repeating that St. Peter held the supremacy over the whole church from Christ, from the promise given to him Matth. 16, 18. f., as Jerome, Ambrose, Cyprian and others understand it; from the naming, because he is called the first, Matth. 10, 2. according to the gloss there; from the payment of the interest Matth. 17, 24. ff, where he alone was likened to Christ, according to Augustine and Ambrose; from the fact that Christ pleaded for his faith not to cease, and commanded him to strengthen his brethren, Luc. 22, 32. according to Chrysostom and St. Leo; from the fact that he was appointed shepherd of Christ's sheep Joh. 21, 17., according to Chrysostom and Gregory; that Christ [John 21, 19.] says to Peter, "Follow me," not only in the manner of martyrdom, but also in the rank of mastery, according to Theophilus; that [Matt. 14, 29.] Peter alone received the command to come over the sea to Christ, that thus the world, which is signified by the sea, is entirely subject to him, according to Bernhardus de consideratione to Eugenius, and by the other passages quoted above, I hold that this thesis, which has been approved by so many holy fathers and last of all by the Costnitz Concilium, is true. However, I do not want to rely on my own insight, but I am ready to give my mind in these and in all other things captive under the judgment of the judges to be decreed, the apostolic see and other insightful and pious men. Glory to God alone!

Two o'clock.

We are forced to add another conclusion, because the excellent doctor, since he refutes my rebuttals, at the same time has objected to very many things and has again forced me to answer. And although I would have wanted to let this pass, I answer the

I will say this in a few words in order to make my opinion clear in all matters to the judges who are to be appointed.

First he interjected that Peter [Apost. 1, 15. ff.] gave a speech before the election of Matthias and admonished the apostles 2c. But I believe that even the Doctor does not think that Peter's preaching proves Peter's supremacy, since he himself answered me in the foregoing that the apostleship is something different from the administration of the government. Therefore, he did not correctly say that Peter, by preaching in this way, exercised the administration of the governmental office. Otherwise, Stephen would also be the first and a pope, because he also preached and did many things among the people. And that he believes that the apostle Matthias was ordained bishop by Peter, I am satisfied that he believes what he wants; I do not believe it if he does not prove it. Likewise, that Peter [Apost. 5, 1. ff.] exercised his supremacy by striking Ananias and Sapphira can be said, but it is not proven; for he raised the dead, which the other apostles also did. Likewise, that he excused the apostles [Apost. 2, 15.] that they should not be considered drunk, this is also no sign of supremacy, since, as I said, the excellent Doctor always distinguished supremacy from all other common works and activities. Likewise, that Peter walked on the sea, and Bernard interprets "the sea" through the world, I admit, but this has nothing to do with supremacy, since we too should trample the world underfoot.

I gladly ignore the promise that faith should not cease, since Christ asked for it [Luc. 22, 32...] because I admit that Peter's faith never fell away, even though he fell away from faith. For at that time the thief believed with the faith of Peter, since Peter denied, as Augustine says. The faith is something completely different than the supremacy. Likewise also that [Matth. 17, 24. ff.] that Peter gave the stater for Christ and himself, from which it is added that he was likened to Christ in it, I admit; but that does nothing.

to the supreme authority, is rather against the supreme authority. For it follows immediately (Matth. 18,1. ff.), as Jerome also interprets it, that the other apostles were angry because they assumed that Peter would be the greatest. They began to talk about who would be the greatest; therefore Christ called for a little child and thus curbed their ambition. And so the following in the text argues more strongly against the supremacy than the preceding for the supremacy.

The word Joh. 21,19., that only to Peter is said: "Follow me", should be understood according to the interpretation of Theophilus not only from the kind of martyrdom, but also from the rank of mastery. I lengthen Theophilus, since only Augustine seems to have a better opinion, who thus says: Follow me in enduring temporal evils; and if Augustine did not say it, the text of the Gospel itself would prove it. For a discourse had gone forth among the disciples that this disciple would not die, since they had heard Christ say: If I want him to stay, what is it to you? You follow me. Therefore it is quite obvious that this following is to be understood in the way of martyrdom and suffering.

Therefore, I ask the Doctor to refrain from introducing new things and especially those that do not serve the cause, since I could also introduce the word Apost. 8,14. where the apostles sent Peter and John as a lower; and Apost. 15, 13. Jacobus confirmed Peter's speech and changed it. But I did not want to bring in this and similar things, since I have long since conceded the supremacy of honor to Peter and have only denied the supremacy of authority over the other apostles. For this is the prestige (yes, also the supremacy of honor), which God does not respect, as I have stated above, but not the prestige of the fisherman and the poor, as Ambrose has interpreted it according to the report of the Doctor. For Jerome interprets Paul better from the glorious character by which the false apostles wanted to overthrow him among the Galatians by means of Peter's reputation. For I am very well satisfied with the fact that the Doctor supports his thesis with testimonies of Jerome.

nymus, Ambrosius, Bernhardus, Leo, besouders about this saying (Matth. 16, 18.): "You are Peter", if only my opinion, as stated in the foregoing, is considered better confirmed with the same and greater testimonies, and which speak more to the matter, and also place this to the judgment Heini, as above.

Corner.

Today, the venerable father opens again what he has closed, and what he has added in the conclusion, as it were side things and ornaments in the thesis, he strikes back again as main things, and brings about a transformation to such a degree that I do not know whether I am transformed into an opponent or a responder.

To the point in short words.

Never have I dreamed of the conclusion: Peter preached, therefore he was the first.

Then he disapproves of my credulity concerning Matthias (Apost. 1, 15. ff.), and yet he does not refute my reason. Matthias and the other apostles were bishops, and were not ordained by Christ, nor did they ordain themselves; therefore they are not ordained other than by Peter, whom Christ appointed as shepherd. Therefore let him believe with me or answer otherwise.

Regarding the apology of Peter (Apost. 2, 14. ff.) he imposes something on me, which I never thought of, that I would have separated the supreme office from the works of the administration of the other apostles; this never occurred to me, yes, I quoted St. Gregory, that the other bishops were called to participate in the care, but not to the fullness of authority.

He says of St. Bernard about the passage of Peter over the sea that this has nothing to do with the supreme power. I wonder how he could say that when he has read Bernhardus. For according to his intention, Bernhardus wanted to prove from this the supremacy of Eugenius over others, and that the whole world must be subject to him, but not in such a way to the other bishops or apostles.

About the stater (Matth. 17, 24. ff.) he wants to bring out the opposite from the following letter, but he did not do it, but Christ muffled the murmuring of the apostles. But I do not take the words of the holy Scriptures according to my own head, but according to that of the holy fathers. For by these words St. Ambrose wished to indicate that Peter was higher than the apostles.

than the others, which Augustine also testifies quite explicitly in the evangelical questions; the question is not present to me now. Therefore, we should not base ourselves on our opinion, but on the holy fathers.

About the faith that should not cease [Luc. 22, 32.], the Father has passed over, citing, however, the word of Augustine, that the thief on the cross kept the faith which Peter denied. - I, too, pass over this saying; but let the venerable father know that St. Cyprian, supported by the words of Christ, willed that no heresies should have arisen at Rome or in other churches, as I said the day before, that in the Roman see there have been two hundred and twelve popes 1) and yet that before their deposition 2) none has erred in a determination and in passing a sentence in the faith.

With regard to Theophilus, whom he denies at his will, without citing any testimony or reason, I am surprised that he despises the Church Fathers so much, since he is very hostile to the Sophists. He has attracted Augustine, who is not opposed to Theophilus, that Christ spoke of the kind of martyrdom; but let him teach where Augustine denied the rank of mastery, since he confesses in the 124th tract of Peter that he had more abundant grace and was also the first apostle; and in the 162nd epistle he says: in the Roman church the supremacy of the apostolic see has always flourished. Therefore, may he not ask me not to defend our thesis, which I believe to be true.

And he has quoted his own from Peter, who is sent to Samaria, and by this the supremacy is taken away from him; as if we do not know that someone sends himself, as the Son of God, who is sent by the Father and by himself. It is not only recently that one has begun to discuss this, but it has all long since been brought to a conclusion by Alpharus, John de Turre Cremata and others. Even if Peter gave way to James at the Jerusalem Council, taking into account the place and its high age, it does not deprive Peter of his supremacy.

But in order to appear to be doing something, he ascribes to Peter the supremacy in honor, perhaps as an ambitious one, while he has heard from me Cyprian, Jerome and Anacletus that the apostles were equal in honor. Therefore, the venerable father ascribes to Peter the supremacy in honor, which the holy fathers deny, while he denies to Peter the supremacy in dominion, which the unanimous opinion of the holy fathers and the Costnitz Concilium ascribes to Peter. Therefore, I ask him to refrain from boasting that against such holy fathers, against such a famous council, he relies on greater testimonies, because I have often shown that the testimonies he has cited, according to the opinion of any holy father, do not deny the supremacy. Therefore, let him rather with the Greeks, who late become wise, as it is said of the Trojans, finally become wise that the Roman Pontiff, the true governor of Christ, holds the first place in the whole world, as even the Greeks, the emperor, the patriarch and the sovereigns confessed this and rendered obedience to the Roman Church in the year 1439 on November 22, and so let there be peace in our time. I leave all this, as above, to the judgment of those whom it concerns or will concern. Glory to God alone!

Martin.

I do not exactly dislike everything that the excellent doctor said, especially Augustine's word that the supremacy of the apostolic see has always flourished in the Roman church, if he had only added the one word, namely the supremacy of authority over all bishops. And I think that Bernard is twisting the text [Matth. 14, 29.] of Peter's walking on the sea, since what follows clearly attributes this walking to faith, not to supremacy, since Christ says when Peter began to sink [Matth. 14, 31.], "O thou of little faith, why didst thou doubt?" And that he wishes me to believe with him that the other apostles were ordained bishops by the apostle Peter: to be at his will in this, I do not like, since all of them were bishops in the same way as Peter, as the text about Judas quoted by Peter [Apost. 1:20] proves: "And let another receive his bishopric." So much about this.

1) "In his writing Os primatu kstri lib. II. c-np. 29, Eck counts 229 popes except for Leo X." (Weim. ed.)

2) Walch makes here the remark: "arnotionsm, I understand their change after Avignon; or one would have to understand some deposition in the Costnitzerconcilio." The latter will probably be the more correct, because in the Roman Church, almost as Eck states here, one counts 209 popes except for the Concilium at Constance. Hrsulius iVtuual, Laltimors 1863, p. 572.

Corner.

About the bishopric that Judas was also a bishop according to the words of the Psalm [Ps. 109, 8]: "And let another receive his bishopric", I say that bishopric is taken there for apostleship and not for the episcopal state. For with most it is doubtful whether Judas was also only a priest. But that does not matter. But Judas went out after he had taken the bite. Therefore, since Christ ordained the disciples priests at the Last Supper, Judas was not an ordained bishop. This I submit to the judgment like the other.

From Purgatory.

Eck disputes the ninth thesis.

Not only in bad theologians (theologi- stas), but also in the Holy Scriptures and in the Holy Fathers, it is found that this present life is the state and time limit for merit or debt, for which reason those who are in purgatory cannot merit more and thus do not receive greater grace.

That this is so, I prove by Jer. 25:14: "I will recompense them according to their works, and according to the deeds of their hands." So also Paul says [2 Cor. 5:10 f. Vulg.], "We must all be made manifest before the judgment seat of Christ, that every man may receive according to his life what is due him, according to what he has done, whether it be good or evil. Knowing therefore the fear of the Lord, we counsel men."

I add Jerome to descend gradually, as he understands the apostle in this passage: This he says, I say, as long as we, being in this world, have our pilgrimage from the Lord, let us do it in a good walk, that we may please him in the future, not, as some think, that after we have departed from the body, we can still earn anything there by works. The same is confessed by the glossa ordinaria. In vain, therefore, does man promise himself this after the life of the body, which he has failed to procure here. This is how Ambrose understood it, that only the deeds of life are rewarded elsewhere.

From this it is clear: since the grace is increased according to the merits, and the souls in purgatory will not be able to work anything in a meritorious way, then according to the mentioned grace will also not be able to be increased in them. This is clearly stated by Augustine in the Enchiridion, Cap. 109 and 110, and he repeats

The same words mainly quæst 2. about the eight questions of Dulcitius, where he says after many things: Therefore, all merit is brought about here, by which someone can be either relieved or burdened after this life. But let no one entertain the hope that what he has missed here he will be able to earn after his going to God. Therefore, after death, the increase of meritorious works ceases; the increase of grace corresponding to meritorious works also ceases.

The excellent doctor has opposed me with two testimonies of the Holy Scriptures and four of the Holy Fathers.

First of all that of Jeremiah [Cap. 25, 14], where God says: I will repay them according to their works. I am very surprised that the excellent Doctor is of the opinion that this and similar things argue against me, since in my "Explanations" 1) I have cited and explained many more testimonies to this effect, as they do not argue against me, or argue just as much against purgatory. For since the whole of holy scripture contains absolutely nothing about purgatory, but everything speaks either of hell or of heaven, I want to have answered this with an answer to all testimonies, that they do not serve the cause, consequently also the interpretations of all fathers, if they do not expressly think of purgatory, for it is to be believed that when they act the holy scripture, they also follow the sense of the holy scripture. And therefore it must be taught with other reasons and testimonies that the souls are certain and that they do not increase in love.

Corner.

Since the venerable father says that he has cited and interpreted more testimonies in his "explanations": so we have seen them. We have also seen that his gloss on the text does not add anything, which we will now show. We also do not accept that there is nothing in the Holy Scriptures about Purgatory. This statement would certainly be favorable to the Greeks and Picards, but contrary to the Christian faith, as he correctly noted in his "Explanations". But we want to use his One answer to the

1) Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XVIII, 147 ff.

Battlefield, in which he says that the dressed things do not belong to the matter. How appropriately he answers! The apostle says [2 Cor. 5:10] that every man will receive after he has acted in the body. The Lord Father says that man also receives according to what he has done in purgatory. Augustine says that every merit is brought about here, and the Father contradicts this, saying that merit is also brought about in purgatory. Jerome says that after we have departed from the body, we earn nothing from God; the Father, on the other hand, says that after we have departed from the body, we still earn in purgatory. This is how it is written in relation to Ambrosius. Now may the most illustrious sovereigns, and your respectable and dignified ones, judge whether what I have said does not serve the cause, in which there is precisely nothing contrary to the sayings of the Fathers. I therefore ask that he may refute in truth or show how it does not serve the cause, and he may not be surprised, as I will also show him more testimonies, that it should become evident that this is not a matter of bad theologians (theologistarum), but of right theologians.

Martin.

I, who firmly believe, yes, would dare to say, I know that there is a purgatory, am easily persuaded that it is mentioned in the Scriptures, as Gregory in his dialogue cites the word of Matthew [Cap. 12, 32: "It is not forgiven, neither in this world nor in that," since he wants some sins to be forgiven in Purgatory. I also admit this in the second book of the Maccabees [Cap. 12, 45. f.]: It is a good and salutary thought to pray for the dead 2c. But I will this, that in all Scripture there is no such mention of sweeping fire as could stand and convict in controversy. For even the book of the Maccabees, since it is not in the Canon, is powerful for the faithful, but does nothing against the obstinate, and the saying of Gregory can easily be nullified, that neither here nor in the future life will sin be forgiven, that is, never. Therefore, I do not want the suspicion to be harbored against me that I am favorable to the Bohemians and Greeks. This for the first. In response to the doctor's reply, I will say nothing other than what I have already said to you.

before; because he repeats the same, therefore I will also answer the same. For I have said that there is nothing about purgatory in the Holy! For I have said that there is nothing in the Holy Scriptures about purgatory, so neither they nor their interpretation can be applied to the trade of purgatory. After death, however, either good is repaid to the good or evil to the evil. Those who are in purgatory are in the middle; the testimonies do not speak of them. Neither good nor evil has been repaid to them, and so the purgatory has always passed through the middle of the testimonies.

Corner.

That he excuses himself, that he believes and knows that there is a purgatory, I accept well and have known it before, but that he denies that purgatory is proved in the holy scriptures, I reject as something false and taken from the Greeks and stick to the matter at hand, even if neither the same nor other much greater things could be proved against insolent and stubborn people, as happened with Arius and the other fathers. But that it is said for this reason that it is not found in Scripture, because it cannot be convincingly demonstrated against obstinate people, is quite dangerous and contrary to our religion.

As for the books of the Maccabees, of which he says that they serve for the faithful, but are not in the Canon, I say that this is also false. For although they were not in the Canon among the Hebrews, yet the Church included them in the Canon, as the Father of the Lord Father, Augustine, testifies in the book de civitate Dei lib. 18. and St. Ivo (Ipho) inserted in his decrees the decree according to which the Church included these books in the Canon.

That the venerable father wants to insist on his presumption that what I have mentioned does not serve the cause, - it is nevertheless virtually contrary to him. For, first of all, that he says that those testimonies have their purpose in heaven or hell, does not help him, because they just mention the state of merit and demerit, and establish that this state has an end with death. On the other hand, the venerable Father, without relying on a holy teacher, dares to prolong the time of merit for the souls who are out of the body, and to reward the merits of the purgatory in heaven: and yet the apostolic

He said that only the works that man has done in the body will be rewarded. Therefore, I have considered the statements in his "Explanations", but could not accept them as insufficient, so that he could eliminate these contradictions beforehand.

Martin.

First of all, that the excellent doctor says that it is not necessary to deny something of the Scriptures because the obstinate cannot be convicted, he says this very well and true, but I am talking about the obstinate who can pierce us with our own testimony and our own bullet. It is clear that the Book of the Maccabees belongs to the Old Testament. Now, since St. Jerome has recorded the Hebrew Canon and states that only the books belonging to the Canon are valid in the dispute, and in this his opinion has been generally accepted, we will easily be beaten with our own weapons if we do not persuade the faithful.

Secondly, he proves that the Book of Maccabees was included in the Canon. He is arguing about an ambiguity, and we will easily agree. I know that the Church has accepted this book, and I have said so. But the Church cannot give more prestige or firmness to a book than it has in itself, just as it approves and accepts the works of other Fathers, but does not therefore make them stronger or better. I therefore pass over that which is called Canon and Canon by many.

Thirdly, he says that the testimonies cited just mention the state of merit, and that it is terminated by death. I answer as before: because they mention nothing of purgatory, but only of heaven and hell, therefore a dying man deserves nothing to heaven, and a dying man nothing to hell, and so in both the state of merit has an end; otherwise from the same testimonies purgatory could be quite clearly proved.

Fourthly, he says that I do not rely on any warrant and prolong the time of earning; likewise, he claims that the merits of the purgatory are recompensed. I admit it, because this I have done in order to zn and to hear better than I know. For I know nothing more about purgatory than that souls suffer there and that we must help them with our works and prayers, and I am willing to be instructed if anything more can be said about it. Therefore the passage of the apostle [2 Cor. 5:10], which has been invoked against me, that only the works done in life are recompensed, is taken by the Doctor with reference to purgatory, as I have already said that it could not be taken, but only with reference to heaven or hell. If this relation is observed, it is evident that it does not argue against me, or it will prove purgatory.

On the ninth of July. 1)

Corner.

First of all, since the Father says that the testimonies mentioned are not to be understood of purgatory, I like that because the merit is only in this life, therefore they exclude purgatory in this life. Then it is certain that Augustine also speaks of purgatory in the Enchiridion, because he proves there that the souls are relieved by the help of the living, and Jerome scolds those who think that the souls stripped of the body deserve what Isa. 66, 24. teaches about purgatory.

But that he says that his thesis is a disputation, as if he had no great confidence in it, I am very surprised, since he has been considering it back and forth for more than a year now, and has entitled the disputation with the pompous title: "Wider neue und alte Irrthümer" ("Against new and old errors"), also claims that the opinion of the newer theologians is not likely even to a simple-minded person (stulto), and contemptuously calls them bad theologians (theologistas).

But that he expresses the opinion that the word Canon is ambiguous, I do not suffer, because Augustine in the 18th book de civitate Dei could not take this expression, especially in a controversial point, ambiguously, since he says that it was not in the Canon, with the Hebrews, but with the Church. Then this is established, since several

1) The Weimar edition notes: "In the manuscript according to Lösscher for it: Lapatlic" D. Marci; presumably a reading error instead: Kadatllo 8. Marias." This means: on Saturday, the Octave after the Visitation of Mary, which is July 9.

The preface (prologus) testifies that the books of the Maccabees were included, but they are placed by the church among the histories of the holy books. But better to the point.

Since he bases himself on the fact that Purgatory is not expressly mentioned in the Holy Scriptures, this is contrary to what the decree of the Council of Florence determined, which the Greeks also accepted after they had renounced their error. Then several passages of Scripture, such as this word [Ps. 66:12.], "We have passed through water and fire, and thou hast brought us through to refreshment." The word of Ecclesiastes Cap. 4, 14. [Vulg.], "Out of the dungeon and bonds some come to the kingdom." The word Matth. 5, 25. f., where the Lord said, "Be willing to your adversary soon 2c., lest you be cast into prison. I say unto thee, Verily thou shalt not come forth thence, till thou pay the last farthing." There he understands by the dungeon the place of the sweeping fire, from which a man is not released, if he has not done completely enough, as St. Gregory interprets it in the corresponding passage about Lucas [Luc. 12, 58. f.]. But Gregory's reason for proof, which St. Bernard takes up again in the 66th Sermon on the Song of Songs, is strong: that Christ indicates that some sins will be forgiven in the world to come.

But extremely clear is the text in the first letter to the Corinthians Cap. 3:15: "But if any man's work be burned, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved, even as by fire." And [v. 13]: "The day of the Lord will make it clear, for it will be revealed by fire, and what each man's work is, the fire will prove," and there [v. 12.] is said of the stubble, hay 2c. where St. Ambrose says that the apostle expressly spoke of purgatory. The same testifies the gloss between the lines (inter-linear), also the ordinary gloss. St. Jerome signs this in the second book against Jovinianus, also St. Gregory takes this from Purgatory, what also St. Bernard does about the Song of Songs. And lest someone oppose me Augustine in the Enchiridion 6. 67. who says that those words could also be understood from the fire of the present time, let him read the same more completely there and the second question of the eighth questions of Dulcitius, and he will find that Augustine understands these words of the apostle also, as they are quite evident', of Purgatory.

Therefore, not only in the books of the Maccabees, which would be bad enough for the Church, but also in other passages of Scripture, purgatory is taught, unless Gregory, Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, Bernard belong to 'the number of bad theologians; otherwise I do not know how the venerable father could confess that he knows that there is a purgatory, since he wants to rely so strongly on the letter of sacred Scripture, and the testimonies of Scripture are exceedingly clear to the more recent theologians, he also cannot indicate A passage in Scripture where it is asserted that merit or grace is increased in the purgatorial souls (in purgandis ---- in those to be purified), while on the other hand the wise man, Eccl. Sal. 11, 3, says: "And when the tree falls, let it fall about noon or midnight, on which place it falls, there it remains." The glossa ordinaria says: That is, the place which thou shalt have prepared for thyself here, thou shalt have then, for, says Christ [Hoh. 14, 2.], "in my Father's house find many mansions." A certain dwelling is assigned to the dying, beyond which he cannot ascend by his merits in purgatory.

Thus Damascenus testifies in the second book Cap. 4: But it must be known that with men death is that which is the case with angels, and explains this in relation to the goal of earning. Thus says the wise man, Ecclesiastes 9:10: "All things that come into thy hand to do, do them fresh," as the devout and worthy minister of the church, John Capistranus, put it in this sense. The apostle taught this in Gal. 6,7-10: "Do not be deceived, God is not mocked. For whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For those who sow to their flesh will reap corruption from the flesh. But let us do good and not grow weary. Now that we have time, let us do good to everyone." The gloss says: "What a man sows", namely by the work of the present life. Therefore, merits are not sown in purgatory, but in the present life. Chrysostom also confirms this by the word John 9:4: "I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day; the night cometh, when no man can work." "The day," says Chrysostom, is the present life. Therefore Augustine exhorts us that we should work while we live, lest the night overtake us. To this may St. Ambrose also come as a witness.

Who wants the apostle to speak of the time of the present life, which is allotted to us, that we may walk righteously. Therefore the excellent psalmist says in the 104th Psalm, v. 23: "So man goes out to his work and to his farm until evening."

Finally, apart from what has been mentioned above, Augustine's saying is clear where he nevertheless thinks of the fire of sweeping. His saying is Cap. 3 de fide ad Petrum: The time to attain eternal life, God has given to men only in this life. Jerome also shows in the third book on the word Gal. 6, 5: "Every man shall bear his burden," how men attain help only in this life through their merits, but when they are called before the judgment seat, which happens in death, then neither Job, nor Noah, nor Daniel can stand up for anyone, but every man shall bear his burden. For, as St. Bernard teaches beautifully, at the death of every man a special judgment will be passed on him, which could not happen if he still had a time to accumulate his merits in purgatory and to increase grace, because, as he says through the prophet Zechariah [Cap. 4, 7. Vulg.], he will make grace equal to grace, will repay grace with glory in proportion to the grace of faith.

Even if these testimonies were not so clear, which are very clear, this one thing should deter the venerable father, that a theologian without theological foundation wants to extend the period of merit of the departing souls at his will, since he is not a judge nor an assessor of the judge. Therefore, in relation to this piece, it seems to be concluded that the souls in purgatory suffer enough and are cleansed of their transgressions, but do not deserve greater grace.

As for the second main part, where he denies that the souls in purgatory are certain of their bliss, again this is my opinion, that this is not substantiated by any testimony of the holy scripture. But for now, I cite the word Revelation 5:1 ff. as proof that they are certain of their blessedness: "And I saw in the right hand of him that sat on the throne a book 2c., and no man in heaven, nor in earth, nor under the earth, was accounted worthy to open the book." In hell there is undoubtedly no worthiness to open the book, therefore he speaks of purgatory, in which there are also sometimes holy men who shine by miracles. This is what St. Gregory testifies about St. Paschas in the fourth book of the Dialogues, and the history of St. Severinus, who was bishop of Cologne, but according to his origin a Swabian. The same teaches the revelation also further down [Cap. 5, 9. 13.]: And all sang who were in heaven and on earth and under the earth. But those who, as it were, despair of blessedness, do not sing. Therefore, the holy soul, by assuring that there is singing, confirms that the souls are certain of their blessedness. Moreover, in the Canon of the Mass, where prayers are said for the departed in purgatory, we say thus: Remember, O Lord, thy servants who have gone before us with the banner of faith, and sleep in the sleep of peace 2c. To them and to all who rest in Christ. If, therefore, according to the Most Holy Canon of the Mass, souls rest in Christo, how can they be in such alarm and terror, which is, as it were, despair, as the venerable Father explains in his "Explanations" from the 14th to the 20th thesis 1)? For I do not see how in such terror, trembling, disquiet, and, as it were, despair, all of which expresses the highest unrest, it can be said of the souls to be purified that they sleep in the sleep of peace, because all that has been said before is contrary to peace. But then they will be rightly considered by the true Christians as resting in peace, when they safely await the end of their purification.

This is partly what has moved me and still moves me today to disagree with the venerable Father, but I am willing to leave this to the judgment and instruction of others.

Martin.

The excellent doctor has defended three things in turn against me with many words: first, that the Canon of Scripture also understands the books of the Maccabees; second, that Purgatory is also proven by other passages of Scripture; third, he has endeavored to show that souls are certain of their blessedness.

I answer: About the first two pieces there is no dispute between me and the worthy gentleman, therefore it would not have been necessary to bring together so many testimonies about this matter, which I perhaps assert more firmly than he, since I have confessed that I know that there is a purgatory. But that is what our

The purpose (scopus) is whether it can be proven that the souls in purgatory deserve something and whether grace is increased in them. But let us go through it one by one.

First of all, he said that by the testimonies mentioned yesterday it is established that merit only takes place in this life, therefore it is excluded in the future life, which he understands as purgatory, and thus refers the testimonies to purgatory. But I admit it of the future life, either in hell or in heaven. He also cited Augustine, who speaks of purgatory in the Enchiridion, and Jerome, who scolds those who claim that the departed souls deserve it. Both I admit.

He also rebukes me for saying that I dispute this thesis as if I had no confidence in it, while I wrote with a pompous title, "against new and old errors" I will dispute, claimed that the opinion of the newer ones is not likely even to a simple-minded person, and contemptuously called them bad theologians. I say, as I said yesterday, that I do not yet know anything about the matter of souls and purgatory, and that I call it an error that some people presume to assert what they do not know, and proclaim the opinions of the Fathers, as of St. Thomas, St. Bonaventure, and the like, which they themselves have not asserted, as certain articles of faith; these I call bad theologians, and not theologians. Opinions must be treated in the schools, among the people the words and works of GOD must be preached, Ps. 19, 2: "The heavens tell the glory of GOD" 2c. Therefore, I do not condemn the opinions of the pious fathers, but resist those forges that make articles of faith out of the opinions of men; this is not the office of a good theologian.

That I have made the Canon ambiguous against Augustine, lib. 18. 6. 36 [de civitate Dei], St. Jerome encouraged me to do so, as did Eusebius in the History of the Church, where he also lists the testimonies of the ancients. Therefore, the ambiguity is certain.

since Augustine holds the older ones differently from the Canon than Jerome, and consequently no strong proof remains in the dispute. Whether the preface of Jerome lists the books of the Maccabees among the divine writings, I do not remember. 1)

I pass over that the four Evangelia are accepted by the prestige of the Church, for this will be another matter.

Then he says that it is against the Concilium of Florence that purgatory should not be expressed in Scripture. I answer: A concilium cannot make that belong to Scripture which by its nature does not belong to Scripture, just as the Church could not make an Evangelia, even though it approved the Evangelia.

That is why we want to look at the testimonies.

First, Ps. 66:12: "We have passed through fire and water." I answer, This has no application to purgatory; he speaks of the persecutions of the saints, as in many other passages; Ps. 17:3 [Vulg.], "Thou hast tried me with fire." Likewise Ps. 26:2 [Vulg.], "Burn my kidneys and my heart." And 1 Pet. 1:6 f.: "Ye that are now a little while sorrowful in divers temptations, that your faith may be found righteous, and much more precious than gold tried by fire." And in short, this is a very common and foggy way of speaking in the Scriptures, that by fire and water tribulations are understood; therefore, he who takes fire for purgatory is too much attached to letters and syllables, which the Lord Doctor interprets to me.

Likewise also the passage of Ecclesiastes [Cap. 4, 14], that some come out of prison and bondage to the kingdom. This is a very clear text of that which deals with the vanity of this world, that by change of fortune he who is now a servant becomes king, and he who is king becomes a servant. If we were to argue with these and similar testimonies against those who deny purgatory, we would accomplish nothing, except to give the adversaries cause to make fun of us.

1) Jerome, after enumerating all the canonical writings in his preface to the Vulgate, adds, "All that is besides these is to be placed among the Apocrypha."

I do not want to make fun of us and the church, although I am very happy to allow all this and what is like it.

So is the word Matth. 5, 25. f.: "Be willing to your adversary, so that he does not hand you over to the tormentor" 2c., where he says that according to Ambrosius by "dungeon" the place of the sweeping fire is understood. I gladly admit it; but because other fathers have interpreted it differently, especially Augustine, about hell and the one who will never come out, the testimony becomes doubtful, that it can well persuade the faithful, but not convict those who resist, not to mention that the context of the text does not even suffer it to be understood of purgatory, for it speaks of the willing and the unwilling adversary, and wants the unwilling one to sin damnably and against Christ's command. This belongs to hell, not to purgatory.

He says that the reason of Gregory, since Bernard agrees, is strong, that God forgives some sins in the world to come. I answer: This is true with the faithful, but invalid with those who oppose.

After that he says that the text 1 Cor. 3,15. is exceedingly clear: "But if someone's work is burned 2c., he himself will be saved, but as by fire", and it is understood by Ambrose and Jerome, the ordinary gloss and those between the lines, Gregory and Bernard the apostle of purgatory, although Augustine says elsewhere that these words could be understood by the fire of the present world. I answer: This text is so not at all very clear that I confess today, since I have searched many things, that I do not yet know the right meaning of Pauli, since the exegetes differ so much from each other, although I gladly admit him for myself of Purgatory. But since the apostle says quite clearly that the work of every man is proved by fire, and in this fire, he says, the day of the Lord shall be revealed, which shall make manifest the work of every man, as the words are clear, it seems to me, according to my little judgment, that he is speaking of the fire of complete burning and of the last judgment, or, as Augustine thinks, figuratively, of the fire of temporal persecution, by which faith in the Lord shall be judged.

steu is proven, and the doctrine of faith and all that is built upon it.

Therefore, there is still nothing clear from the holy scriptures about purgatory that could be valid in the dispute. Therefore, I do not consider the holy fathers to be bad theologians, because I confess purgatory with them, and they also did not put up their opinions and their ignorance about the state of souls as articles, as the bad theologians do.

The doctor wonders how I can know that there is a purgatory, and I also do not have a passage in the Scriptures for me, while these, as he says, exceedingly clear testimonies of the Scriptures, according to his opinion, serve for the newer theologians. I answer: It is not necessary to confess in which way I got to know Purgatory or anything else. Then these very clear testimonies are given for Purgatory, not for the state of the souls in Purgatory.

As for the saying of Ecclesiastes Cap. 11, 3, "on which place the tree falls, whether at noon or at midnight, there it remains," where the ordinary gloss understands it thus: the place that you will have prepared for yourself here, you will have, I do not know how it can reasonably be applied to the present transaction. For if by the place prepared for thee and thou hast kept it be understood purgatory, then thou wouldst have to abide eternally in purgatory; but if "the place which thou shalt have prepared for thee here" be understood, if thou shalt have merited it, then it does not belong to the saying of the preacher, who speaks nothing of merit, but of the death of man.

I pass over the fact that Christ says [John 14:2] that in his Father's house are many mansions, and that a dying man is assigned a certain dwelling, beyond which he cannot ascend; all this is for me. I know that a dwelling is assigned to everyone after death, but he does not come to the dwelling immediately after death, unless one takes "dwelling" again as purgatory, and so it excludes the dying from the eternal kingdom.

Likewise also the word of Damascenus: This is death with men, which is the case with the angels. I answer: If he therefore fell into purgatory after death, it follows that he will be purified for all eternity, or Damascene, like all the preceding, must be understood of the two last dwellings of damnation and blessedness, and not of purgatory.

So also the passage Ecclesiastes 9:10: "Whatever comes to your hand to do, do it freshly, for in hell, where you are going, there is neither reason nor wisdom." If he understands it of purgatory, purgatory will again be hell. Therefore, the passage speaks of hell alone, without thinking of purgatory.

I will gladly leave the Johannes Capistranus, but outside the dispute.

That he says zero, the apostle speaks Gal. 6, 7. against our opinion: "What a man sows in the flesh, that he will reap", and the word Joh. 9, 4.: "The night is coming, when no one can work", which Ambrosius interprets of the life of the present time, as we deserve: so it is clear that it serves nothing for the matter. For the apostle does not speak of purgatory, but of the last judgment, and Christ understands by the night, yet without prejudice to the deference to Chrysostom, unbelief, as is clear from the next following text [v. 5.], "Because I am in the world, I am the light of the world," and will that without faith in Christ no one can do good works. But I admit Chrysostom because he has the last judgment in mind.

It is permissible that the saying Ps. 104,23: "So man goes out to his work until the evening", is referred to the life and death of man in a figurative sense, but according to its proper sense, which can also argue in battle, it speaks of the admirable arrangement of God, that He has created man in such a way that man goes out to his work until the evening of the natural day.

And Augustine cap. 3. de fide Petrum rightly judges that the time to attain eternal life is given to man only in this life; because, as I said, they always have the future life in mind, not purgatory.

And Jerome on Gal. 6, 5: "Every man shall bear his own burden" 2c., also shows very well that men only obtain help in this life through their merits, but when they have been called before the judgment seat, which happens in death, then neither Job nor Daniel can stand up for anyone. I answer that this testimony is very strong against the excellent Doctor, if it is true that a man is called before the judgment seat in death and then neither Job nor Daniel can stand up for him. In vain the church prays for the dead, and thus purgatory is denied. That is why Jerome speaks of the last judgment seat after the end of purgatory.

He also cited St. Bernard for the fact that a special judgment is held in the death of a man, which would not happen if he still had a period of time to deserve. I answer: Whatever it may have to do with the special judgment, the conclusion does not apply.

I pass over the saying in Zechariah [Cap. 4, 7. Vulg.], "He will make grace equal to grace," because it is interpreted in a figurative and good sense, but not in a proper sense.

At the end of this article he says: Even if these testimonies were not so clear, this should still deter me as a theologian, that I so without foundation, according to my liking, since I am neither judge nor assessor, nevertheless extend the period of merit for the departing souls. I apply the same to the doctor, since he himself is neither judge nor assessor, and yet determines a certain condition for the souls according to his delusion, without a basis, especially since he does not want (which I would gladly allow) that it is only an opinion, but a certain knowledge.

At two o'clock the disputation was continued by the same D. Martin, who said that he would declare himself to be correct and honest about the Scriptures.

And because my opinion does not seem to be sufficiently understood by the excellent Doctor, I declare more clearly that the

In their sayings, the Scriptures and the ancient holy fathers have in mind the future life in which souls will be either blessed or damned, not thinking of purgatory. Therefore, the many testimonies that deny the state of merit after this life do not refer to purgatory. If this is not yet understood, imagine that there is no purgatory, just as there was no thought of it in their minds. Then all the testimonies mentioned above will still stand and be true, that before death there is life, which must be earned.

Then I do not speak of the merits of the souls in purgatory in such a way that they work something, but that they receive greater grace, since it is established with all that the debt is not forgiven, not even the venial, without an increase of grace, and St. Gregory writes, in the 4th book of the Dialogues, that in purgatory the debts are remitted; and this is stated dist. 25. 6. dualis cited. But I assert this in such a way that I consider it an opinion, nay, that I confess it to be an ignorance. I believe that only GOtte knows the state of the souls in purgatory.

With regard to the third main part, about the knowledge of their blessedness, where he first introduced the fifth chapter of Revelation, v. 3, that no one is found either in heaven or on earth or under the earth, who would be worthy to open the book, by wanting "under the earth" to be understood as purgatory, since in the same there were sometimes also holy people, like Paschasius and Severinus, I say that this gloss has no testimony for itself, therefore it is just as easily despised as approved. I do admit that saints have been in purgatory, indeed that no one is in purgatory who is not a saint. Therefore, a pious person could say that "under the earth" is the same as hell or something else, since neither devils nor men nor angels can open the book, as it is said that the threefold structure of things (trina machina rerum) honors God, and in the apostle [Phil. 2:10] it is said that both what is in heaven and what is on earth, as well as what is in hell, bows the knee. For they also tremble Devil [Jac. 2, 19.], yes, as is the custom in the same book [of Revelation], "under the earth" also means the dead, as it is said in another chapter [Revelation 20, 13.]: The earth gave its dead, and hell gave its dead again.

But what he states in the following [Rev. 5, 9. 13.]: All sang in heaven and on earth and under the earth, but those who despair cannot sing, I say: I did not say that souls ever despair, but since according to the unanimous opinion of the church the punishment of hell and purgatory is the same, I said that they are similar to those who despair, as it is read that also in this life some have been afflicted with despair, as it is said in many places in the Psalter [Ps. 102:3], "Hide not thy face from me," and [Ps. 28:1], "I will be like them that go into hell." Then, "to sing to the Lord" is not always to rejoice and be glad, yes, a new song is the song of the cross, that is, to praise God and to please Him in the midst of tribulation and even in death.

Thirdly, that he has cited the Canon of the Mass, where, praying for the departed, we say: They sleep in the sleep of peace and rest in Christ, he does not see, as he says, how it can be said of them that they sleep in the sleep of peace, when they are in such anxiety, trembling and the greatest restlessness, therefore, interpreting this rest of peace, he says that they surely await the end of their purification. I answer, It is not enough for me this gloss, and the same is proved by the same. For that they are in unrest is proved by what follows in the Canon: Grant to them, O Lord, and to all who rest in Christ, the place of refreshment, light, and peace; and that which we all pray: O LORD, grant them eternal rest; likewise, Grant them peace, which cannot be so understood: Grant them that they may safely await the end of their purification, which, as the Lord Doctor has interpreted it, is peace. More correctly, therefore, in my opinion, they rest in peace as far as the body is concerned. For to sleep in peace means in the Holy Scripture: to rest in the grave, and so it is clear, that the excellent Doctor has not proved the certainty of their blessedness, indeed, in a sense, he cancels the penalties of the purgatory, since he attributes peace to them.

Corner.

Since the short time we have is determined to finish this matter today, so that I cannot refute the invalid answers and touch on other points of the purgatory, I will add a few things, so that it can be easily recognized that the venerable father has avoided the core of our matter and sought diversions.

Therefore, when I first quoted Augustine: All merit is accomplished here, and no one should hope that what he has neglected here, when he has passed away, he can earn with God; likewise also Jerome; he says that he admits both: but what is it then for obstinacy, when he admits Augustine, that all merit is accomplished here, that he says that grace in souls is increased also in purgatory? Nor does his eye-salve apply in the present case to all the testimonies of which he says that they do not speak of purgatory. For St. Augustine says just that, when speaking of the souls in purgatory, both in the Enchiridion and in the book "Of the Care to be Taken of the Dead," Cap. 1. For after death we cannot work that which is useful, but we receive that which we have worked. For Augustine had run into the difficulty of how the intercessions could be of use to the dead, since they deserved nothing, and resorts to the idea that they deserved in this life what could be of use to them after death. Therefore he tried in vain to instruct me about his view, which I grasped well enough. Also, his bad persuasion has no force among Christians that venial sins should not be forgiven without increase of grace. Let the venerable father prove this; it is not supported by any testimony, indeed, it is false, since a venial sin, according to God's mercy, causes no offense to God. No new grace is necessary for its redemption, but it is sufficient that someone suffers enough for it.

But secondly, since he excuses himself for error, and since I do not see that even one letter has been cited by the Lord Father in support of his new doctrine, it must therefore rightly be considered suspect, while the opinion of the more recent theologians is based on such many testimonies of the holy scriptures and the holy fathers. Nor does it excuse him that he interprets some to make the opinions of Thomas or Scotus articles of faith; I know nothing of this. I have not cited Thomas or Scotus, but the brightest lights of the Church with the sacred Scriptures; he may see for himself which ones he accuses of being bad theologians.

Thirdly, he speaks of Augustine in relation to the books of the Maccabees, opposing him to Jerome as the stronger. But Jerome nowhere denies that the books of the Maccabees belong to the Canon of the Bible in the Church, indeed, in the Prölogus he constantly maintains that itH is listed among the histories of the sacred writings; therefore, it should not be equated with the works of the holy fathers in the Canon Sancta Romana, 15. äist. But since I had held this against him from the Florentine Concilium, he replied: a Concilium cannot make that something belongs to sacred Scripture, which does not belong to it. This is true, but what is this? That he defiles such a praiseworthy council with such a great insolence that it decides something so inconsistent! But since there were very learned men at this concilium, I would rather believe the concilium that is governed by the Holy Spirit than Mr. Luther, not because I believe that a concilium makes something into Scripture that it is not, but because I believe that the concilium has better knowledge and understanding in deciding about Scripture, that belongs to Scripture what is found in Scripture.

His excuse that an interpretation can always be found, so that the quoted text should not apply in the dispute against the stubborn, is powerless. For this would be a hiding place for all heretics, who can always bring some pretense for their interpretation, with which they would like to claim that the Catholic truths are not expressed in the Holy Scripture. Thus, the heresy of the godless Arius would still continue today, because the homousia could not be proven from the holy scripture with such explicit words that a stubborn person could not escape with any pretense in the dispute.

Likewise, we know well that the Church cannot make Gospels; yet the Church makes us, leaving aside the Gospels of Nicodemus, Bartholomew, Thomas, and others, believe only four without doubt.

1) This will refer solely to the first book of the Maccabees, which Jerome notes in the prologus that he found in Hebrew.

The same applies to the understanding and interpretation of the Scriptures. This is also the case with the understanding and interpretation of the Holy Scriptures.

Furthermore, since he accepts the testimonies that I mentioned at the beginning, he thought that this [citing of the testimonies was done without necessity because he also believed that there was a purgatory. He does not remember that he wanted to wriggle out of so many testimonies that put the goal of earning in the present life, because purgatory would not be proven from the holy scriptures. I have had to refute this statement in order to prevent the Picards and other Rottians from taking it up for themselves, who do not know that there is a purgatory. Leaving some things aside, let us look at least at two passages more closely.

Matth. 5, 25. He did not want the dungeon to be understood as purgatory, since Augustine also understands hell by the dungeon, which was not hidden from me. I also add, apart from what the Father has done, that Chrysostom understands the present life, but that the opinion of Ambrose is more correct, or at least not to be despised, who understands purgatory by the dungeon. The words of Christ indicate that he must pay to the last penny, but in hell there is no payment, just as there is no redemption. Nor can the dazzle added to Ambrose's interpretation disprove that he who is to be thrust into the dungeon has sinned unto death, because they are punished in purgatory both for venial and mortal sins, which are nevertheless repented of, which we learn from the books of the Maccabees, where it is said [2 Macc. 12, 45. f.]: "It has been a holy and wholesome opinion to pray for the dead, that their sins might be forgiven them." For those who had been slain, and for whom Judas Maccabaeus offered sacrifices, had sinned unto death by the spoil taken from idols, though they are believed to have repented when they were slain, as the ordinary gloss there says, and the word of the Psalm [Ps. 78, 34.], "When he slew them, they sought him."

Fourth. Since I had referred to the very clear passage of the apostle Paul in the first letter to the Corinthians, Cap. 3,12. ff., which Augustine, Ambrose, Jerome, Gregory, Bernard, Isidore, together with the ordinary gloss of Purgatory understand, the venerable father confesses that he does not have the right sense of this passage; therefore, he he respected so many holy fathers and brought up a new opinion that the apostle speaks of the fire of complete burning, because the apostle thought of the day of the Lord, and because the fire will prove the work of everyone. But I, who have always heard that one must believe the ancients, especially the saints, accept the opinion of the holy fathers with reverence, and I do not accept the new gloss and the words of Mr. Luther, unless he proves them by the testimony of the holy Scriptures. Therefore, what he asserts here is of no use to him, since the holy fathers have also read this very well. For although the day of the last judgment is especially called the day of the Lord, as Bernard also reminds us, nevertheless, since the judgment takes place at the death of every one, this can be called the day of the Lord, and he does not make such a precise and subtle distinction with the little word "every one," as the Sophists are wont to do, but takes it to mean those who have built stubble, wood, and hay upon it, as Augustine also summarizes this figure of speech (distributionem) in the first chapter of John [V. 9.]: "It [the light] enlightens all men who come into this world." Therefore, the apostolic opinion is insurmountable, that those who build on the ground wood, hay and stubble will be blessed, but by the fire of purification, so that in such a way no evil remains unpunished.

To the word of the Ecclesiastes [Cap. 11,3.] about the falling of the tree he answers: if the same speaks of the purgatory, then it would be proven that the souls remained eternally in the purgatory. I say that the gloss has understood it very well in such a way that by the "tree" man is understood (therefore it [the tree] denotes also in Ezekiel Cap. 31,8. a rational creature: "There was no cedar tree like him in God's garden" 2c.), and by the "fall" death, and that nevertheless it does not follow that for this reason he remains eternally in purgatory, but that he [Ecclesiastes, as St. Jerome aptly interprets it, designates by the "noon" the good, by the "midnight" the evil and damnation. Therefore, the wise man did not understand those places, but the state that when he falls, either he is good, and will remain so, without increase of grace because of the redemption of sins, [or] if he is evil, he will remain evil.

He said about the dwellings in John [Cap. 14,2] that soon after death the soul will be assigned a certain dwelling. Now how can it be a certain one, if a greater one is to be found?

Grace is to be added? For then a higher dwelling will necessarily be added. It would also follow that he who enters purgatory with many venial sins would be better off than he who descends with few, or than he who dies with none, because a greater grace would flow to him for the redemption of the many venial sins. I add that it would be harmful and damning to pray for the dead, and that it would be more beneficial for them if they remained in the punishments of purgatory, because of the addition of greater grace, as the venerable father has written elsewhere that a soul that is freed by foreign aid receives less bliss than if it suffers enough for itself alone in purgatory. This is not only against the holy scripture [2 Macc. 12, 45. f.]: "Therefore it has been a holy and salutary opinion" 2c., but also against the custom and the godly conduct of the whole church, which we must show towards the dead, as St. Augustine explains exceedingly beautifully in the book "Of the care that must be taken for the dead" and in the book "Enchiridion".

Furthermore, he answers Damascenus that he does not speak of purgatory, because then they would have to remain in purgatory forever. I also hold that neither Damascenus nor the other testimonies speak of purgatory, for otherwise they would be against me and would benefit the Lord Father; but since they speak of the present life, in which they place the goal of merit and demerit, the time of merit cannot be extended beyond the ordered goal, namely death. Therefore, I do not accept any other interpretation than that which the author himself wants, who speaks of the goal of earning in the passage cited.

I can say the same about the others, and not be heaped with the same reproach as the venerable father, because according to the testimony of the holy fathers and the holy scriptures, I end the course and the limit of merit with death. He, however, without being based on a testimony of the holy scriptures, stretches and extends the limit against Augustine and Jerome, although he has the modesty to call this opinion his opinion; but then he should not call the opposite an error.

As for the testimony of Jerome, for he has endeavored to hurl the same back at me, that neither Noah, nor Job, nor Daniel can vouch for anyone after death, because there of the recent Ge

He does not prove it by the letter of the law. For not only in the last judgment, but also soon after death, each one will bear his own burden [Gal. 6:5].

Finally, as he approaches another piece, he answers the word of Revelation [Cap. 5, 3. 9.] that by "under the earth" hell is understood. But then the following about singing cannot stand, because the devils and the damned do not sing, but blaspheme and howl. Therefore, "under the earth" must necessarily be understood of purgatory, and cannot be understood of hell, although I do not deny that in the Holy Scriptures also the devil is mentioned in hell, in the apostle [Phil. 2,10.]: "Who are in heaven, and on earth, and under the earth." But this does not serve the point. 1) But he has added a gloss on the word "sing," that it is to bear the cross and to praise God in tribulations. This gloss I despise as one invented by the Lord Father in this place as easily [as he puts it forward].... Yes, John does not suffer it to be so interpreted, for he says [Revelation 5:9], They sang in heaven, not: on earth. Now in heaven they do not bear the cross, nor do they praise God in tribulations, for God wipes away all tears from their eyes, now there is no sorrow nor pain 2c. Now even if his interpretation were admitted and true, while it contradicts the letter, it would not overturn this matter. For those who praise God in tribulations after death would have a certain sign of future blessedness, whereas the damned, out of complete hatred for God, constantly blaspheme the Creator. Therefore, the souls to be purified surely sing and praise GOD, awaiting the end of their purification.

But since I had cited the Canon of the Mass, in which it is affirmed that they sleep in the sleep of peace, he does not suffer my conclusion: if in the sleep of peace', therefore they are safe because of their blessedness, and not in horror, trembling, despair and as it were in despair. He has given a twofold reason: 2) First, because it follows: Give them the place of refreshment, light and peace; secondly, because they are in the sleep of peace.

1) āā Itdornduiri. Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 1675.

2) In all Latin editions: āāāuxi, which, as the old translator already recognized, is to be changed to āāāuxit. For it was not Eck who added this twofold reason, which would be against him, but Luther. Compare Col. 1025 f.

t because we often pray: Lord, give them eternal rest, and: Give them peace. Therefore, he has given another gloss, that they sleep the sleep of peace, namely, concerning the body. I am not satisfied, neither by his interjection, nor by his new gloss, which has no semblance, nor reason. For the Canon says, Remember them that sleep; and afterward, And all that rest in Christ. He does not say: to those who rest in the grave. Furthermore, what does it matter to the soul whether the body has peace or not, whether it is tossed to and fro by the sea or torn apart by wild beasts? as St. Augustine testifies. And what man can suffer that a body that is dead and dead should sleep in peace? Therefore, he does not like to admit the distinctions of the newer theologians, and yet he distinguishes here very well between the peace of the body and the soul.

Therefore, one must accept the more correct opinion that the souls to be purified both sleep in peace and rest in Christ. Therefore, this rest and peace excludes the disturbance of the soul, horror and, as it were, despair, since the souls are in the greatest restlessness, which are moved by such disturbance of the mind that they, as it were, despair.

To the unimportant objections, however, we answer that we pray and implore God to give them peace, not the peace they already have, namely, the security of their blessedness, but eternal peace, because, as St. Bernard testifies, there is peace both from guilt and from the unhappy state (miseria). May God therefore give the souls in purgatory peace from the punishments, just as He has given them grace against the sins.

Therefore, it is still the right and unshaken truth that the souls in purgatory do not, as it were, despair of their blessedness.

Martin.

Against the answers the excellent Doctor replies from Augustine, who says: All merit is accomplished here; and since he deals with purgatory, that after death we receive only what we have acted. I answer very briefly: So there is no purgatory, or purgatory will be what one receives for the past life. Therefore, it is evident that Augustine could not be understood of purgatory. Because they did not act that in the past life.

that they would like to receive purgatory. But also this testimony comes to me that they have earned the merit by which they deserve. They have earned the merit of receiving help here. But I confess that I cannot understand how the souls in purgatory are helped and how they are freed without any gift of grace, only by taking away the punishments; understand it, whoever can!

Then he says that it is false that venial sins are not forgiven without increase of grace. Since the Lord Doctor wants venial sins to be forgiven without increase of grace, I will not allow this until he proves it; indeed, it is contrary to the explicit text Rom. 7, 14.24. f. and Gal. 5,17. where the apostle says: "I am sold under sin. Who will deliver me from the body of this death?" He answers, "The grace of GOD through JEsu Christum." But it is certain that the apostle has not been in mortal sin. The other I leave to the future disputation between the excellent Doctor Andreas 2) and Johann Eck. And this is erroneous, that a venial sin does not offend God, since God dislikes everything that is impure, and he rejects the one who dissolves even the smallest [commandment], Matth. 5:19, nor has the Doctor proven that it is enough that they suffer enough.

Secondly, he accuses me of not having cited even one letter for my opinion, while he has brought so many testimonies of the Scriptures and the Fathers for the opinion of the newer ones. I answer: The more he has produced, the more his opinion is suspect to me, because he has pulled them [the testimonies] by the hair and twisted their necks, as I have said sufficiently in the foregoing. Less sinful is he who doubts in his thoughts than he who seeks to raise his doubtful things with the words of God.

1) At all Latin editions: de mortis sorporis ūjns instead of de corpore inortis ūnjus, as it should be, also according to the Vulgate. - The answer that follows is according to the Vulgate, v. 25.

2) It should be noted here once and for all that in this disputation between Luther and Eck, Carlstadt's name has been erased everywhere in the Wittenberg and Jena editions and "N." has been put in its place.

He also says that it is not known to him which people have set up the opinions of Thomas or others as articles of faith, because he has cited the lights of the church with the Scriptures; therefore he warns me to beware of those whom I call bad theologians. I have said today and I say again: I let opinions be opinions and do not impose this on anyone as an error, but if one draws the scripture that is in conflict with it to a foreign meaning in order to confirm the opinions and insists stubbornly on it, this, I say, is the doing of bad theologians.

With regard to the other, the Canon of Books, where, based on the testimony of Jerome and the Concilium of Florence, he prefers to believe the Concilium, which is governed by the Holy Spirit, rather than me, I thank him. For he has a godly opinion; I have never wanted to be believed. But I answer briefly: let him first reconcile with himself Jerome, who in the prologus galeatus 1) the books of

of the Maccabees and several others are obviously counted among the Apocrypha. By this testimony it comes that the book of the Maccabees is dear and valuable to me, but the disputants are free to reject it. I have said enough of Council today, yes, as the Doctor himself says, a Concilium does not err; but if it errs, it is not a Concilium, and that I speak according to my sense, I believe that a Concilium and the Church never err in things pertaining to the faith; in others it is not necessary that they should not err.

But that he exclaims that this is a hiding place for the heretics, who, trusting in it, may reject or accept any interpretations of the testimonies, I answer: Why did St. Augustine, Jerome, and other exceedingly victorious triumphants over the heretics not complain of this, but abandoned ambiguous passages, and endeavored to contend with certain and clear passages? Let us do the same with regard to the souls in purgatory.

1) That is, in the preface to the Vulgate. Compare Col. 1019, where Luther says he does not remember it. Meanwhile, he reread the prologus. - "with himself," that is, with Eck, who had asserted the opposite.

To the point.

Regarding the answers to the testimonies, he said that I had despised Augustine, Ambrose, Bernard, Jerome, Gregory, Isidore, together with the proper gloss; he said this according to the Eckian modesty, rather arduousness, 2) being all too eager to arouse hatred against me. I have said today and say again that they have not been despised by me; but that he does not accept my gloss, I do not care about that; but he himself also proves his own, since the text is clear about the day of the Lord and the fire in which the day of the Lord will be revealed. Although this can be applied to purgatory, as I have said, and thus have not rejected the opinion of the doctor, namely that there is a purgatory, the mouths of the disputants cannot be shut with this opinion.

Likewise, I have not despised the word Matth. 5, 25. about the prison, as it is according to the opinion of Ambrosius. That the Doctor adds that Christ's words indicate that payment must be made to the last penny, therefore they must not be understood of hell, I answer: This is sufficiently refuted by St. Jerome, who against Helvidius interprets this expression "to" correctly, so that there is no need for it to mean what Ambrose and the Doctor here put it. For it is also written of Joseph in Matth. 1, 25: "He did not recognize her until she gave birth to her son," and yet it does not follow that he recognized her after the birth. So it does not follow here that he will go out after paying, but he will pay and not go out.

But that he has adduced in refutation that he has not sinned unto death who is not willing to his adversary, and that even mortal sins, if only they are repented of, and venial sins are purged in purgatory, to this I say that this text does not speak of mortal sins repented of, for a repented mortal sin is now no longer a mortal sin, and a penitent is no more one who is not willing to his adversary. Therefore, Christ speaks of one who is not willing and remains so.

2) In Latin, a play on words: modestia- modestia.

I pass over that of the falling of the tree in Ecclesiastes [Cap. 11, 3], where he says that Jerome understands by noon the good state, and by midnight the evil state: both I admit, and it has nothing to do with purgatory.

Regarding the certain dwelling in John [Cap. 14, 2.], where he speaks pointedly in this way: how it could become a certain dwelling, if an increase of grace took place, to which a higher dwelling was due? The same can be said of every believer after baptism, who has a certain dwelling provided for him from eternity. Then those who are in purgatory are so ordained that they come to a certain dwelling in this way. Nor does that human argument imply that it should follow that it is better for him who goes down with many sins than for him who goes down with few. If this reason is valid, then it is to be feared that a whore would be better than the holy virgin: as if there were not different degrees of souls in purgatory, since today he himself assured that the saints, who are more excellent before others, are in purgatory.

Then he states the reason of New Year's Eve ¹⁾ that it would benefit them if they remained long in the punishments, because in this way it would also be useful for the martyrs to die and suffer until the Day of Judgment: Day of Judgment to die and suffer. As if the Lord Doctor did not know that the punishments are assigned to the souls according to a certain measure. Therefore, it is not reprehensible to pray for the dead, just as it was not reprehensible that the apostle prayed for himself and desired to be prayed for, while his strength increased in weakness. So every believer should pray for every need of every believer, he should help him, regardless of the fact that he deserves more and more through this need.

By this I also want to have answered that it is against the custom of the church and godliness that I said that a soul, which is freed by foreign help, receives less beatitude than if it suffers enough for itself in purgatory. This he took as a corollary from my sayings, since I expressed the opinion that one must come to the aid of souls, as much as it is a more perfect kind of merit to do enough for divine justice in every way.

I pass over the Damascenus with the goal of earning and refer to the preceding.

Likewise, he again pulls me through, that I, without being based on a testimony, extend the period of earning, but he bases himself on many, and denies it. I answer: He also bases himself on none, except on those who are forced by force to his opinion, as has been sufficiently said.

Since he also wants to catch me in my words, he says that I called my opinion an opinion, therefore I would have called the opposite an error quite badly. I say as before: I call my opinion not only an opinion, but also an ignorance; I did not call the opposite opinion an error, but that one sets up an opinion as truth.

Then he says that the testimony of Noah, Job and Daniel is not only valid for the last judgment and I cannot prove this from the letter. I leave this to the judgment of the one who has a better insight, since the text clearly states that neither Job nor Daniel pray for a man who is brought before the judgment seat (which happens in death), which must definitely be understood from the last judgment, or at least not from purgatory, because Noah, Job, Daniel and all churches pray for the dead in purgatory.

To the saying of Revelation [Cap. 5, 3. 9.) he correctly says that the devils in hell do not praise God, but blaspheme.

The rest Doctor Martin wanted to write down on a piece of paper, because the time had passed, and show it to the doctor and the notaries. However, on the following day he handed over the following in writing.

1) From the "Dialogue of Silvester Prierias" against Luther's 17th thesis. Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 321. Compare "Luther's Response to the Prierias Dialogue," ibid. Col. 374, § 59.

That the devils in hell do not praise, but blaspheme God, I know. But that for this reason "under the earth" denotes purgatory, in which the souls sing, does not follow. First, because they are in tribulation and torment, and God has not yet wiped all tears from their eyes. But the Lord Doctor denies that singing is praising God in tribulations. Therefore, he speaks against himself, since he sets praise under the earth in purgatory and the punishments in which they cannot praise at the same time. But I also deny that the souls sing for the sake of having a certain sign of blessedness, because this certain sign should have been proved. Next, I did not say that "under the earth" means hell alone, but also other things, everything that is always under the earth, in which all the praise of God is superfluously present. For everything is full of the glory and praise of GOD, who is praiseworthy in all his works. Otherwise, the Lord Doctor must understand purgatory not only under the words "under the earth," but also a fourth place in the words "under the sea," since there in Revelation [Cap. 5,13.] also "under the sea" is indicated, "and all that is therein." Therefore we understand it more correctly in such a way that by this quadruple all creatures are indicated, as what the Lord Eck imagines.

But that praising God in tribulations is "singing," I prove that it is not invented by me, as the Doctor says; for Rom. 5:3 [Vulg.] says: "We praise in tribulations", and Ps. 42:9: "The Lord has promised His goodness by day, and by night (that is in tribulation) I sing to Him." And Jac. 5:13: "If any man be in tribulation, let him pray with a good heart, and 1) sing psalms." Likewise Ps. 34:2: "I will praise the Lord always." At all times, he says, even in adversity. On the other hand, he is reproached of whom Psalm 49, 19. Vulg/ says: "He will thank thee when thou hast done him good." I confess, however, that I did not say this of the damned under the earth, but to exclude the opinion of the Doctor.

who wants the singing to take place only because of the certainty of bliss in purgatory.

Regarding the Canon of the Mass, he is not satisfied that I have referred the "sleeping in peace" to the body, because the Canon says: "to those who rest in Christ", not: to those who rest in the grave. Furthermore, what does the soul care whether the body is in the sea or in the air, and does not rest? Likewise, he says, "Who will say that a body that has been disembodied sleeps in peace? I answer: This quibble is not valid, because those who rest in the grave, or wherever they are thrown around after the body, rest in Christ, that is, as the Revelation Cap. 14, 13. says, they rest from their work, namely, because the soul separated from the body now does not toil in the body in the various troubles of this world. Otherwise, how will he deny that Christ's body sleeps in peace in the grave and rests in God? since the Scriptures speak of Him in such a way in so many places, and the church sings [Ps. 4, 9.]: "I will lie down in peace and sleep." 2) And Ps. 16:9 [Vulg.], "And my flesh shall rest in hope." Likewise Revelation 14:13: "Blessed are they that die in the Lord." Likewise Stephen, Apost. 7, 59, "died in the Lord," which is undoubtedly said of bodily death, according to the flowery language of Scripture. If for Eck the disembodied body does not sleep, let it sleep, I pray, for God who will raise it up, and according to the testimony of Scripture.

At the end he says that we are asked for peace, not that which they have, but that which befalls those who have been purified from the misery of punishment. I answer: This is an unproven assertion, 3) because that peace of safety which they are to have has not yet been proven. Therefore, it only remains that they are in punishment, and we should pray that they will be released from it and have peace.

I want to have said all this in such a way that I wanted to show that in relation to the things

2) Thus Luther gives it in his first Psalter translation, St. Louis ed. vol. IV, 7; compare ibid. col. 383.

3) pstitio priueivii. Compare St. Louis edition vol. VIII, 1130 f., 885.

1) Here Luther read instead of 68t: st, and after oret no punctuation mark.

I am ignorant of what God is doing in purgatory; that those who, impatient with this ignorance, would rather invent than confess that they do not know, are taking too much liberty. I cannot prove what is mine, but neither can they prove what is theirs. Therefore my thesis quite rightly intended only this: that it is neither proved by Scripture nor by reason that souls are certain, at least all of them, of their blessedness, and that grace is not increased in them. It is enough that we know that they suffer and that we should come to their aid. The rest we must leave to God alone.

This happened on July 10 in the presence 2c.

Eck replied by note on July 11. 1)

The answers of the venerable father seem to me insufficient, mainly that he says that Augustine does not speak of purgatory, since he speaks of it above all things, namely of purgatory. And it cannot be denied that the souls of the departed are refreshed by the godliness of their own who are alive, since the sacrifice of the mediator is offered for them, or mild gifts are made in the church. But this is of use to those who, when they were alive, deserved that it might be of use to them hereafter. For the way of life is neither so good that it should not need this after death, nor so evil that it should not benefit it after death. Therefore, all merit is brought about here by which someone can be either relieved or burdened after this life. Now go, Luther, and say that Augustine did not speak of purgatory here.

Moreover, he does not prove that an increase of grace is required for the redemption of venial sin. I admit that an increase of grace sometimes takes away venial sins, but a venial sin is also taken away by sufficiency. Therefore, the mentioned apostle Rom. 7, 14. 24. f. does not speak of venial sin. Furthermore, if he were speaking of it, he would not exclude the suffering of satisfaction. But of his agreement, since it does not serve the matter, I say nothing for now. The venial sin, I admit, offends, but venially, because it does not lead man into hatred against God.

1) Löscher's manuscript adds: "at one o'clock".

nor does it make an enemy of God out of him, because otherwise he would not be able to stand 2) with grace. Therefore, in purgatory they have venial sins, but without enmity against God.

As for his claim that I am dragging the testimonies by the hair to the point, I will die if he has cited even one testimony in the entire disputation that serves the point as I have cited here. But that is for the judges to judge, not Luther.

He is annoyed why Augustine and Jerome did not also claim this hiding place of the heretics, of which I have spoken. Dear God, as if Augustine and Jerome did not cry out everywhere against the Pelagians, Cyprian and Ambrose against the Arians and Novatians, that they interpret the Holy Scriptures as they please!

He asks that I prove my opinion, while he cannot prove his; but that mine is proven, I leave to the judgment of the judges.

The "until" has a different meaning in Jerome to Helvidius, because elsewhere it is proven from Scripture that Mary has always remained a virgin. Therefore, the "until" does not indicate the consummation there, which it cannot do here.

Furthermore, I do not dwell on my reasons for the sake of brevity. But that he says that I have made it certain from his sayings that the souls liberated by the help of the living receive less bliss, he puts this on me wrongly. For I do not imagine dreams. For one will find in the refutation of my remarks 3) that Paschalis did not want his reward to be reduced, therefore he preferred to burn. But I let this go and order it to the judges.

Furthermore, I do not deny that someone may praise GOD even in tribulations, but this cannot be assumed in this passage, because it is said [Revelation 5:9] that they sing in heaven, and [Revelation 21:4] that GOD will wipe away all their tears 2c. Therefore it becomes clear to the reader how he twists my opinion. Therefore, according to John, the souls in purgatory sing GOTte, and I demand that he give the cause, if it is not to be the certainty of glory; therefore.

2) This HON has been added by the old translator, as it seems to us, puffing; in the Latin editions it is missing.

3) This is in Luther's refutation of Eck's 14th obelisk, in Luther's "Asterisks," Walch, St. Louis ed. vol. XVIII, 566.

he quite falsely invents that I speak against myself. Therefore, I do not deny that the pious boast and sing in tribulations, but I have denied the gloss which he invented that "singing" is as much as praising God in tribulations; otherwise, the angels and the blessed would not sing to God.

That he endeavors to defend the quite obvious error, namely, that souls sleep in the sleep of peace, namely, as far as the body is concerned 2c., because the soul separated from the body does not toil in various troubles, - see the mischievousness, since, while in his answer he had referred to those resting in the grave to the body, he now goes to the rest of the soul from the toils of the body. But listen, good man! Does this mean resting from work, because it does not suffer hardships in the body, but it feels incomparably greater hardships in the soul apart from the body? What use is it if I have rest from fever and am plagued by stone?

With Christ's rest it is something else, who expected the resurrection without decay. Blessed therefore are they that die in the Lord [Revelation 14:13]; but who shall say that the body is blessed, except by the soul overflowing into the body? This is the case with St. Stephen, who died in the Lord.

Finally, he says that I make the unproven assertion: they are at peace, and yet we ask for peace on their behalf. But because it is ridiculous to refer the peace one has to the body, it follows that in the soul it is the knowledge of security.

That he says that he cannot prove his own, I consider to be quite true. Others, however, prove theirs, although an obstinate and stubborn man cannot be brought to rest even by proofs, that he should not always argue that it is no proof, as Gregorius of Ariminum and Petrus Aliacensis do it with Aristotle in the reasons of the first mover in the 7th and 8th book Physicorum.

Therefore, I conclude with the common opinion that grace is not increased in purgatory and that the souls are certain of their bliss.

From indulgences.

On July 11, which was a Monday. 1) Corner.

First of all, before I enter into this disputation of indulgences, I testify that it is not my mei-

1) InLöscher's manuscript fst added: umsieben Uhr.

It is not my intention or intention that by this disputation of mine I want to contravene the commandments of the pope, in which he commands in the decree that begins Cum postquam, 2) that one should not defend or preach anything that is contrary to certain points of the indulgence, under the penalty of banishment, but rather that it is my intention to defend the truth that has been approved in this decree. Having said this, I now proceed to attack the eleventh thesis 3).

To say that indulgences are useful to Christians is right and godly, nor is indulgence an affliction for a good work; therefore it does not seem to be well said that those who assert this are nonsensical. This is proved: because the Church does not err in matters concerning faith, which are intended for the salvation of souls; indeed, as St. Cyprian says, God does not allow the greater part of the clergy to err, but in the general conciliarities and by the entirety of the clergy, indulgences have now been considered useful and godly for Christians for three hundred years. This became evident at the Concilium of Vienna, where the indulgence given by Urban IV for the observance of Holy Communion was approved. For the Concilium added this moving reason, that the faithful of Christ would be more ready to pay the sacrament the due reverence and honor.

Thus Innocentius III, at a general concilium where he issued the extremely useful decree Omnes utriusque, adopted by the whole Church, also made a decree concerning indulgences for the hospitals: For the remission of sins, we charge you to make charitable offerings to them from the goods given to you, so that by your support their lack may be remedied, and by this and other good things which you do by the Lord's gift you may attain to eternal joy.

At the same council, the power of the lower prelates to grant indulgences was limited, which was subsequently approved at the council of Lyons. But if indulgences were an affliction on a good work and useless to Christians, what need would there be to limit the granting of indulgences on a good work?

2) This is the new Decretal of Leo X of November 9, 1518, No. 234 in this volume, which is found in Walch's old edition Vol. XV, 760 ff.

3) Luther's 11th thesis is found in the St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 720, Eck's counterthesis idiä. Col. 714 f.

Works to diminish at a lower prelate, and transfer it to the fullness of power?

In addition, the laudable Concilium at Constance, which among the errors also condemned the contempt of indulgences, granted indulgences to all who were at the Concilium and fasted on Friday, which would have been as much as defiling and corrupting the good works of such great fathers.

And Gerson, whom the venerable father calls an excellent theologian, as he has been very careful about truth and respectability, has certainly declared that the granting of indulgences is not to be underestimated or despised, but must be received devoutly in faith, in the hope and love of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has given men such power of the keys of the church. For it is certain that the doing which is based on such an indulgence is more fruitful and more pleasing to God than another, and which, all other things being equal, is not based on it. This is what Gerson says.

So also other holy and highly esteemed men stood at the time when indulgences were given, which were also given by St. Gregory nine hundred years ago, and by Paschasius six hundred years ago. Therefore, only the prestige of such a great father must move any Christian to believe that the indulgence is useful to Christians, although I know very well that William Altisiodorensis 1) tells that there was no lack of people who even during the lifetime of St. Gregory contradicted the holy father in matters of indulgences.

Furthermore, I will add this: If indulgences are an affliction of a good work, I think that I can chiefly suppose this from the fact that they are sufficient. But by a sufficient work we deserve no less than if it were not sufficient; otherwise it would be better that we did not do sufficient works, lest we diminish our merits for this state. But if we sow in blessing, we shall also reap in blessing. But about this I want to hear the venerable father.

To this may be added the great unanimity of all Christendom in the Jubilees celebrated by the Popes, Boniface VIII, Clement VI, Urban VI, Nicolaus V, an exceedingly honest and very learned Pope, Sixtus IV, and that with the common consent of the most Christian kings and princes of the Pope has often given the fullest indulgences for holy journeys (passagiis) and crusades.

Since the faith of the Church cannot cease, for which Christ prayed that it would not cease, Luc. 22:32, and promised that He would be with us always, to the end of the age, Matt. 28:20, it cannot be admitted that the Church has erred for so long to the perdition of souls. And because the decrees of the popes must be accepted by all who stand in the communion of the holy church, as Gregory says in Canon praeceptis, 12. dist., likewise Canon omnia decretalia, 25. quaest. 1.2) under the penalty of the sentence of excommunication pronounced, that indulgences are useful for the expiation of the penalty for sins, which is due to those who are members of Christ through the bond of love, and because such an indulgence is paid for by the merits of Christ and the saints through the power of the pope: I want a believing Christian to have the firm conviction through all this that indulgences are not an affliction of a good work, nor that to say that indulgences are useful for a Christian is to be nonsensical, which is nothing other than to say that all the clergy in the church have been nonsensical for so long.

Martin.

The excellent doctor attacks my eleventh thesis with twelve reasons. Before answering this, I will first explain what I have called a nonsense, what it is that indulgences are considered good for a Christian, and that they are an affliction of a good work. Therefore I say: since the prophet in the 40th Psalm, v. 5. [Vulg.], dares to call even the statutes of men "false unisunies," and Ps. 119, 85. [Vulg.] How much more nonsensical it is that indulgences, which are neither commanded nor advised, nor necessary for salvation, but rather an indulgence of many good works, are considered to be a good of Christians!

1) William of Auxerre.

2) Leo X in the new Decretale. Walch, Vol. XV, No. 234.

Commandments and the covenants. 1) Yes, I say even more: since the extremely salutary law of God, according to the testimony of Ezekiel and the apostle Paul, Rom. 7,11. f., is not good for man, but rather a cause of sin, but grace alone is a good for the Christian, how much less must indulgences, which can in no way be compared to grace, but also not to the goodness of any law, since they are nothing and a kind of deprivation of good works, be considered a good! not as if I thought they were harmful or corrupting, as we will say.

Since the excellent doctor says first of all that the church does not err in matters concerning faith, nor in those which are intended for the salvation of souls, he is right in this; but indulgences are not of this kind, as has been said.

But that Cyprian says that God does not allow the greater part of the clergy to err, let him see what he has said. It is certain that at the time of the Arian faithlessness the greater part of the most eloquent bishops and the most learned men erred in such a great article of faith, so much so that almost no Catholic bishop remained on his chair.

That he says that at the general Concilium and for three hundred years indulgences have been considered useful and godly for Christians, and that at the Concilium of Vienna the indulgences granted by Urban IV, I answer that I have never denied that indulgences are useful, but not for Christians, that is, for those who act with fervor, loving and seeking Christ according to their name. For to them the abatement of works is disliked, but the imposition of works is loved. Secondly, I say that in these matters no one's person must be considered, neither that of a council nor that of a pope, but what is said must be seen, especially since this error concerning indulgences is seen as in

The first thing is that a man is not dangerous to a thing that is not necessary, but when all else is equal, that is, when he knows that he is not necessary and does not put his trust in it.

To the second of the general Concilium and Inuocens III, who ordered for the establishment of the hospitals that they should give mild contributions 2c. for the forgiveness of sins, I say that I do not yet understand this word of the pope, since the forgiveness of sins seems to me to be something different from the indulgence, and if it were the same, I say as before.

Thirdly, with respect to the Concilium of Lyons, at which, as is said, the limitation of the power of the lower prelates in granting indulgences is also approved, I admit the whole. But what follows: if it were useless, it would not have been necessary to reduce the granting of the indulgence of a work to the lower prelates, to this I say that the indulgence has been called by me the indulgence of a work, according to that which I have been attacked by the Lord Doctor in my 42nd thesis in the explanation of it, 2. Thesis in the explanation of the same, 2) where I said thus: not that the indulgence is evil and harmful, but because the wrong abuse harms, in that they would not do such a work if the indulgence were not, for thus the indulgence itself becomes the purpose of such a work. And it is quite clear that people would rarely contribute if indulgences were not promised. Therefore, there is always the danger of at least one defective work.

Fourth, he cited the laudable Costnitz Concilium, which, among other errors, condemned the contempt of indulgences. I answer: I have never despised it, or taught that it ought to be despised, unless contempt be understood in this way, that we can do incomparably better things with the same cost with which indulgences are purchased, or than indulgences themselves are. Therefore the preference of the better is not a hasty contempt of the lesser, just as gold is not a contempt of wood or hay, though it is more excellent.

Likewise to the fifth, where he cites Gerson, that the granting of indulgences is not to be disparaged, I add, "in its way," or, as he himself said, "if all else be equal." And I do not think that the Doctor is at all pleased with this statement that indulgences must be received in faith, hope, and love, since he has stated that even those who are beyond grace can have their indulgences fulfilled and remitted. I would allow that the action based on the indulgence is more fruitful than another which is not based on it, if everything else is equal, if only this "everything else equal" is applied correctly, just as I do not deny that a layman's Our Father can be better than all the canonical prayer hours of a priest.

Sixth, he states that St. Gregory gave indulgences nine hundred years ago, Paschasius six hundred years ago, although, as William Altisiodorensis relates, some contradicted St. Gregory. I answer: I do not yet have a credible history of the indulgences of Gregory. But, however this may be, it does not follow that the indulgence is anything other than an indulgence, that is, a remission of good works, which no one can call good for Christians, no matter how holy conciliarities or how holy men may have given or approved it. Therefore, may the Lord Doctor not act against me with the mere names of testimonies, but also with the truth of the matter itself.

Seventh, he says that indulgences are a defect in a good work because they are sufficient. I say that it is not sufficient, but an indulgence of satisfaction, and not to be considered a sufficient work. Therefore, by this reason, indulgences are compared very badly with works that are sufficient, as if for this reason our merits were diminished if indulgences were allowed to stand; rather, the opposite is more correct: merits are increased if indulgences are allowed to stand.

Eighth, he says that through the unanimity of the faithful, the Jubilee of Boniface VIII, of Clement VI, of Sixtus 2c.

had been accepted. I answer: Who knows whether the unanimity of the faithful has accepted it. Nor is Boniface held in such high esteem that whatever he has done can immediately be regarded as something well done, especially in a matter that is not good nor necessary for salvation, since he has also committed other monstrosities that have set an evil example in necessary matters.

As for the ninth, that the Roman popes, with the consent of the most Christian kings and princes, have given indulgences for holy journeys, I say as before: It is no wonder that God despises this, and allows to be done and to be done what does not serve salvation, who watches over us in this, that he teaches what is useful, as the apostle to Titus Cap. 3:8, that is, his commandments and counsels.

Tenth, he concludes that the faith of the Church cannot cease, and Christ is with us, therefore the Church could not have erred for so long to the ruin of souls. I say: not the whole church has erred. Then, even if she erred in these trivial things (I am always talking about the Christians), there is no danger if the faith remains unharmed. To differ in opinions and to err in temporal things does not annul the Church of Christ.

Eleventh, he claims that one must accept the decrees of the Roman popes. I answer: Without a doubt, they must be accepted, but with good judgment, as dist. 19. c.

Anastasius is written: because the Roman popes were men and had men around them, they could err. Then there is no decree that commands the purchase of indulgences, nor is there one to this day that clearly explains the value of indulgences.

Finally, with regard to the determination of the present pope that indulgences are useful and derived from the merits of Christ and the saints, I answer: He himself does not express it sufficiently, nor does he prove what he says with a single syllable. I have spoken more abundantly about this in my Augsburg Acts. 1)

1) In this volume you will find No. 176, 177. 200. 203. 204. 224. 225 and 226.

It does not follow, therefore, that the whole clergy in the church was nonsensical for such a long time, since in the meantime there were always people who disliked indulgences and who also, at least privately, contradicted them, as the well-known saying testifies: Indulgences are a divine fraud. 1)

Corner.

I have heard that the opinion of the venerable father is in many things milder and more lenient than the words of the theses seemed or other of his writings seemed to indicate to me, and it is not my purpose to defend the immodest proclamations of indulgences or the abuses, but to assert the truth and how much the indulgence granted with reason can be of use. And, to be brief, I give no discussion of the excuse of his thesis; but since he supposes that the indulgence is not commanded, not necessary, we admit that. But in all this, it seems to me, in my little judgment, that the difficulty of our disagreement is mainly that the venerable father says that indulgences are only a remission of good works. I do not remember to have found this interpretation in anyone who gives or allows indulgences, for then indulgences would in truth be harmful, dangerous and damning, since in such a way conciliaries and popes would remit these good works that man would either not deserve such great blessedness, which is contrary to the salvation of souls, or men, deceived by the remission of good works, would be sent to purgatory to suffer there the punishments which they have not paid here, which is indeed damning. Therefore, the unanimous opinion of all who either give or allow indulgences is that the indulgence is not a remission of good works, but the remission of the temporal punishment for the repented sin that is still owed and not paid, as Leo, the present pope, expressly declares in the aforementioned decree, which was done before him by Sixtus IV at the time of his Jubilee in an exceedingly definite manner. Therefore, I cannot reconcile that the venerable father says in his "Explanations" 2) that the indulgence is given only to lazy people, which he also asserts in his German Sermon 3) who do not fulfill the canonical penances.

and yet in the same "Explanation" says that the canonical penances are imposed on the lazy, because the otherwise zealous people repent throughout their lives. Therefore, the indulgence would be quite unfortunate if it were the remission of good works.

In refuting this, he answers the first: indulgences do not affect the salvation of souls, while it is indeed very important for the salvation of souls whether they promote or hinder salvation. Our faith is also interested in whether the pope, as the governor of Christ, can remit and extinguish the punishments due to sin by paying for them with the merits of Christ and the saints.

With regard to Cyprian, he reproached me with what also occurred to me when I read Cyprian, although I am not completely sure whether, as in Greece, so also in other areas of the church, the greater part of the clergy was corrupt.

Then he replied to the conciliar that indulgences are not good for Christians, that is, for those who follow Christ in faith and love. This certainly destroys the pronouncements of the Conciliar and the granting of indulgences, because they are granted only to the faithful of Christ and to those who have repented and confessed, according to the common form. Therefore, according to the general opinion, indulgences are not good for the wicked, because they do not obtain them, but for the good and those who are truly Christians.

I do not suppose that the venerable father here invokes Seneca's saying that one should not pay attention to who speaks, but to what is said, since, especially in matters concerning the faith, one must also pay attention to who says it, and a concilium that has been lawfully assembled must be heard by every Christian.

He says that it is not a dangerous error to err here in regard to indulgences; but it seems to me that the opposite is true, because it has been judged a dangerous error to disparage your holy order of mendicant monks from the beginning.

About the ordinance of Innocentius in the general Concilium, he says that he does not understand how that has validity, or whether the indulgence is the forgiveness of sins. I say as always: I will not admit that such a solemn and lawful Concilium could have erred, since it is not abandoned by the Holy Spirit, and the forgiveness of sins must be understood in terms of punishment, because the name "sin" is is not always taken for the guilt, but also for the punishment due to the guilt, as in the books of the Maccabees [2 Macc. 12, 46.]: "that the sin might be forgiven them," which cannot be understood of a guilt to death, but of the punishment due to the guilt. And when it is said of indulgences that they are given in order that those who obtain them may be absolved from punishment and guilt, let no one think that indulgences absolve guilt, but that, since the pope grants them, they are absolved from guilt by means of the sacrament of penance by the commissaries appointed for this purpose, and thereafter obtain indulgences, that is, the remission of punishments.

But that he excuses himself for having said that indulgences are an affliction of a good work, because he also wants that, all else being equal, a good work with indulgences is better than without indulgences, but as it is wont to happen, because men thus buy indulgences, that they would not do those good works without the indulgence, - although a great deal could be said about these sayings, as in a parable, when neighbors come together more out of friendship against neighbors for the sacrifices and the offertories (offertoria) 2) than in regard to the dead: it seems to me, however, always without prejudice to a better opinion, that this is not the infirmity of a good work, first, because the holy Concilium intends by indulgences to arouse people to good works; secondly, because, though it may be that they do or give something of the kind in order to obtain indulgences, yet these works are not corrupted by this purpose, because this purpose of indulgences is not different from the last purpose, so that the remission of penalties is appropriately assigned to GÖtte. Otherwise, if the subordination of the purposes were cut off, there would be very few or no good works.

About the fact that the contempt of indulgences was condemned by the Costnitz Concilium, the venerable father says that he did not despise them. I freely confess that if he had always used such moderation as he has declared today, perhaps one would agree with his statement, even in conscience, without any in restriction, but his written German Sermon 3) offers the layman a different view. But that is none of my business.

With regard to Gerson, he answered in a permissive manner, but he thinks that Gerson is against me, since he considers indulgences to be useful when they are received in faith, hope and love, because otherwise I would have held that repentance can happen in a mortal sin. I say that even the most Christian chancellor holds that someone in a mortal sin can do enough in terms of penance, otherwise those who hear confessions would be acting extremely unwise if they impose a continuing penance. But whether someone in mortal sin obtains indulgence is not the point. The reason for the difference is clear, because only those who have repented and confessed tend to be granted indulgences. Therefore, it is not surprising if sinners are not able to obtain it, because the indulgence is valid only as much as it says. The venerable father added that the Our Father of a layman is worth as much as the canonical prayers of a priest; if all else is equal, I will not allow it.

About St. Gregory, he says that he has not yet seen an authenticated history. But the very constant rumor, as St. Augustine says in the book "Of the Trinity" of Alexandria, does not allow to deny this. However, he denies that the indulgence is sufficient, but it is only a remission of good works. I believe that we disagree on this main point, and that a large part of the dispute has its basis here. But before I reminded you that indulgence is not a remission of good works, as the venerable father believes, but a remission of the punishments due to sins. Therefore, a true Christian who receives the indulgence does not less but more good works than if he did not receive the indulgence. I understand it, however, that the indulgence is sufficient, as Pope Sixtus IV, Clement VI and the present pope have declared, not that he who has obtained the indulgence is sufficient, but because no evil remains unpunished and no sin unavenged (cān. sicut primi, de peni. dist. prima), the governor of Christ, the steward of this treasure, where man does not pay for the punishment of sin, pays for it himself out of the abundant treasure ordered to him with the merit of Christ, and does enough for him.

2) Compare Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIX, 1053, § 40.

Therefore I have admitted in the foregoing that indulgences do not in themselves cancel guilt, but punishment; and that such a cancellation of punishments is in indulgences, and not the cancellation of good works, is evident from the words of Isaiah ^Cap. 61, 1.]: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, therefore he hath anointed me. He hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, and to preach an indulgence 1) to the captives, and an opening to them that are shut up." Since Christ applies the same words to himself, he used the term remissionem [discharge] instead of the word indulgentias. Thus says Theophilus, as St. Thomas recounts to him: For before the souls of all were kept from hell, until he came who preached remission to the captives.

After that, the venerable father claims that the merits are increased if mdn keeps the indulgences pending. I do not see this, because, as I have said, those who do not buy the indulgence or leave it pending, sometimes wanting to consume this money in good banquets, do not increase their merits. I admit that someone could sometimes do a greater meritorious work with this money than if he bought indulgences. The case need not be applied to each individual. 2)

With regard to the celebration of the Jubilee, he does not want to admit that it was done with the agreement of the faithful, and the suspicious life of Boniface could also make his Jubilee suspicious. I say that the unity of the people is very great, and that at a Jubilee the faithful of Christ from the whole Christian world come together. How he could prove the unity of the believers in any other way, I do not see.

That I said that with the unanimity of the princes for the holy voyage and the crusades indulgences had been given by the pope, to this he replies that it matters little if they were mistaken here in this insignificant matter, as if it were nothing to deceive the believers in Christ, and that the unanimous unanimity of the Christian princes and kings should stoop to such a deceitful deception of the faithful!

Moreover, he says that there is no explicit and clear decree on indulgences. I counter him with the declaration of Sixtus and the now recently issued declaration of the oppo-

He says that the Roman Church, which the others are obliged to follow as their mother, has delivered that the Roman Pontiff, Peter's successor in the office of the keys and JEsu Christ's governor on earth, by virtue of the keys, to whom it belongs to open, by removing the obstacles in his Christ-believers, namely, the guilt and punishment that one owes for the real sins, namely, the guilt through the mediation of the sacrament of penance, but the divine punishment, which, according to divine justice, one owes for real sins, by means of the indulgence of the Church, for important reasons, can grant indulgences from the abundance of the merits of Christ and the saints to these same believers in Christ, who are members through the bond of Christ's love, whether they are still alive or in purgatory, and have also been accustomed to distribute the treasure of the merits of Christ and the saints by granting indulgences by apostolic power, both for the living and for the dead 2c. He then clearly states that indulgences are not a remission of good works, but a remission of punishments, which takes place through the payment with the merits of Christ.

And when I gave the reason that the church had not erred for so many years, he replied that not the whole church had erred, because in the meantime there had always been people who were suspicious of this trade, hence the common saying that indulgences are a pious fraud for the faithful. To this I say: If one wants to judge any matter, one must listen not to what anyone says, but to what pious, learned, honorable and the best people teach. For how many very proven and honest men have been in the whole Christian world in three hundred years, and of whom some have been placed in the register of the saints, who nevertheless have not disapproved of indulgences in such a way, 3) even though, as in all things, the abuse displeased them. Thomas is a saint, Bonaventure, Albertus the Carmelite, Bernhardinus and other great men, Hales (Ales), Gerson, Capistranus 2c., who nevertheless did not reject the granting of indulgences. Therefore, there is nothing in the fact that Johann Wiklef and Ulrich Kalteisen in England, the Lord Johann von Wesel (^688a1ia), who, however, took this back at Mainz, did not ask the Bohemians to like the granting of the indulgence.

1) In the Vulgate: inānīmīārn. Inūlssntīae -- indulgence.
2) Bet Löscher speiūcārī, in the other editions: spseivoenri.

3) In Löscher: irnprokAvsrun, in the other editions: xrodaverunt. We have assumed the former.

"Therefore, let us conclude that the indulgence given in a reasonable manner for the glory of God and increase of faith is not useless to the devout believers in Christ, not to the presumptuous, but to those who receive it with humility and thanksgiving, with abstinence and defense against abuses, that we thus rather want to thank God for such a great gift than to despise it in hope, always having in our hearts that the best indulgence is true repentance. But to speak of the matter in general, I would rather have wished, if the opinion presented today had been the mind of the venerable Father, that he had said this clearly and had not given the simple a cause to think otherwise, because there is no one among all the listeners who would have understood the meaning given today in the eleventh thesis: "To say that indulgences are a good for the Christian is to be nonsensical, for they are properly infirmities of a good work." But I am well satisfied with his interpretation, as far as I am concerned.

Martin.

Against my answers, the excellent doctor counters, first of all, that indulgences are not a remission of good works, and he has not seen anyone who claims this; it also follows from this that indulgences are truly dangerous, harmful, and damning; rather, according to the unanimous opinion of those who give and permit them, they are the remission of the punishments due for sins. I answer: I wonder very much what these words of the doctor mean, since by the punishments due for sins, all undoubtedly understand the difficulties of atonement, which is the third part of penance, to which certainly also belong the good works of almsgiving, prayers, fasting, vigils, and the like. With regard to this, there is an explicit text lib. 5. o. Cum ex eo, where the pope says that by improper indulgences the penitential satisfactions are invalidated. And all indulgences in general have this clause: We release from the imposed penances. But now, granted that they were penalties and not works, I say that it is worse that penalties should be remitted than works, since a life of suffering and punishment promotes or benefits more than a merely active life, as the apostle says in 2 Cor. 12:10: "When I am weak, then am I strong." For it is a purer work, which is accomplished by God's action alone when we suffer, than that which is accomplished with our cooperation, according to the words of Deut. 32:39: "I can strike and I can heal, I can kill and I can make alive. Therefore, there are more inconsistencies in the opinion of the excellent doctor about indulgences than in my opinion, and I really do not know whether I am speaking quite right.

Secondly, he cannot make it up that I said that indulgences are given only to lazy people and that the canons are also given only to the lazy. I say: I do not remember that I said that the canons are given to the lazy. But if I have said it, then my opinion is that the brave and the ardent or penitent do more than the canons require.

Third, he argues that indulgences are necessary for salvation because it is useful to know whether they promote salvation or not. Although he does not exactly say that it is necessary for salvation, it is useful to know whether it promotes salvation or not. I answer: This, too, is not necessary to know, but whether he may be harmful to salvation. For it is not necessary to know things that are not necessary to salvation.

Likewise, that it was important whether the pope could remit through the merits of Christ. I do not know if this is the case.

Of the merits of Christ hereafter.

Then he says that my opinion destroys the pronouncements of the conciliar authorities and the granting of indulgences, which according to the common form grant [indulgences] to those who have repented and confessed. I answer: Therefore my opinion does not destroy the pronouncements of the conciliar, because those have repented and confessed who are lazy in making amends. The Scripture also calls these weak, and for their sake indulgences are not to be condemned.

He also rebukes me for using Seneca's saying, "not who, but what is said," because in matters concerning faith, one must also consider who says it. I answer: This does not serve here, because the matter of indulgences is not a matter of faith. Furthermore, in matters of faith it is exceedingly more of-.

It is necessary to pay attention not to who is speaking, but to what is being said. For one does not have to consider the persons, as the Lord clearly says Matth. 7,15. and 24,5.: "Beware of false prophets who come to you in sheep's clothing" 2c., likewise: "Many will come under my name and say: I am Christ"; and Joh. 10,27.: "My sheep hear my voice". Accordingly, one must not believe the Pope at random, so that the rule of the apostle John [1. Ep. 4, 1.] may stand: "Beloved, test the spirits, whether they are of God."

Then he says that there is danger in error about indulgences, because the error of those who disparaged the orders of mendicant monks from the beginning was considered dangerous. Whatever may be the case with the disparagers, this does not prove that an error in indulgences is dangerous, and it is not immediately an error what the orders of mendicants or the priests of the churches have considered an error.

In the same way, I add to what he says that a concilium does not err because it is governed by the Holy Spirit: namely, in the things in which it is governed by the Holy Spirit, that is, in matters of faith. And that I finally say it once: I have not said that a concilium has erred in giving indulgences. But of that hereafter.

I pass over the fact that he understands the remission of sins as the remission of punishments, since sin is often taken for punishment, 2 Maccabees 12:46. I do not often find that sin is taken for punishment, unless, for instance, it is written of Christ that he himself bore our sins, of which I do not dare to say that it is simply taken for punishment. But these are external things.

Since he wants to refute that I said that the indulgence is an affliction of the work, he says that it is a subordination of the purposes in the works, therefore the indulgence does not spoil the work if one refers it to God. I answer: give an example to prove it! For I have said today that such people are seldom found, who

They give for free and only for the sake of God as much as they give for indulgences. Therefore you shall know them by their fruits. Yes, if they hear that they can do something better than buying indulgences, it is likely that they will not buy indulgences.

About the contempt of indulgences he says: if I had used such moderation, "one would have to agree with his explanation, but his German sermon [on indulgences and grace] indicates to the laity a different conception". I answer: the excellent Doctor will look at this sermon more carefully, and he will find that I have said in explicit words that indulgences are not to be despised, but to be left free; no one is to be deterred, just as no one is to be urged to do so, for it is a consolation for the lazy. Therefore, it is not my fault that they do not understand this explanation and even moderate opinion.

I pass over that of Gerson, where he says that it is something else to be sufficient in sins and to release indulgences in sins, because in it the form of granting is opposed, which only allows indulgences to those who have confessed and repented. Johann Gerson also agrees with him on this point. I say: I leave this as something that goes beyond the capacity of my understanding. For indeed I do not understand how a sinner can do enough in sins and also receive permission not to do enough, since more seems to be required for the performance of works than for their omission.

He says of Gregorius that even if one does not have an authenticated history, he does not allow the rumor to be denied. I say: no one should believe a rumor lightly, and I pass over it.

Finally I come back to that, that the indulgence should be sufficient, and not a remission of good works, but of punishments. Perhaps we are arguing about something that is ambiguous, for the Doctor calls it sufficient, since by the power of the indulgence one is permitted not to do enough, and this permission not to do enough is taken for a satisfaction. But I call "doing enough" that which fulfills the satisfaction, not refrains from it.

He also quoted the saying Is. 61, 1. where Christ Luc. 4, 17. ff., reading from Isaiah, says: "The Spirit of the Lord is with me, because he hath anointed me to preach the remission to the captives", where Christ said "the remission". He added Theophilus, who interpreted that the souls were kept 2c. until he came who preached salvation to the captives. That this saying does not serve the cause is shown by the words themselves and the context of the text, because Christ says there [v. 21.], "Today this scripture is fulfilled in your ears," then because he speaks of the right jubilee, that is, of the fullness of time, of the crown of the year of grace, and not of the remission of sins, but of the forgiveness of sins, of which all Scripture speaks, while the jubilee of Boniface began so long after.

Likewise, I pass over the fact that he denies that the merits are increased by keeping the indulgences pending, because this is not refuted by the fact that they sometimes want to consume this very money in banquets.

About the celebration of the Jubilee years he says that there is a great unity of the people, because the faithful in the whole world come together for indulgences, but with the exception of Italy and Rome, and he does not see how I can prove the unity of the faithful in any other way. I answer: I would prove that this is a consensus of the faithful, which, after the matter had been made known and the truth of indulgences had been explained, moved the faithful to flock together: but now those flock together who do not know what and why, since the greater part believe that they are doing something necessary and meritorious.

After that, the excellent Doctor, referring to the holy journeys and the crusades, says that it is not a minor matter that so many are deceived, especially the great ones. I answer: It is also not a matter of great concern, since St. Jerome also says of the blood of the prophet Zechariah, Matt. 23:35, "We condemn the blood of the prophet Zechariah.

If the people do not commit the error that comes from the godliness of faith, this error is also without harm to the soul, even without a gain in money, which they hand over to the leaders of the churches in honor of the holy church.

Since I have said that there is no decree on indulgences, he has held up to me the declaration of Sixtus and the recently issued one of Leo, in which the power of indulgences is explained. I say: This is another question. I have said that there is no decree requiring the purchase of indulgences, therefore they are not necessary.

At the end he says to the saying "Indulgences are a pious deception of the faithful", by which I wanted to say that not the whole church has erred: one should not listen to what each one says, but to what pious and righteous men teach, but now also some do not approve of indulgences, who have been placed in the register of the saints. I answer: Neither do I, of course. But I add that the Church, when she accepts opinions, does not therefore make truths out of opinions. Therefore I say to this declaration of Leo X, as I said in the [Augsburg] "Acta"): it is not proved by mere words, especially words of men, that indulgences are taken from the treasury of Christ and pay the penalties required by divine justice, though I do not condemn opinion. For, to say what I mean, since Christ's merits, whether they be taken as a help or in any way and under any name, are nevertheless Christ's merits, and suffer no change by use or application. But if they are Christ's merits, they are grace and truth, according to the words of Ps. 25:10: "The ways of the Lord are goodness and truth;" and John 1:17: "Grace and truth were made by Jesus Christ;" and there [v. 14]: "We have seen him full of grace and truth." Therefore, even if an angel from heaven teaches otherwise

I will not believe that it is in the hands of any man to give grace and truth, that is, to distribute the merits of Christ. But I do not resist the pope, but refer to my explanation in the "Acta".

Corner.

Because, as I have said, a great part of the disagreement lies in whether indulgences are the remission of good works or of penalties, where I have said that the teachers of the Church and the Roman 1) popes who have hitherto written about indulgences take my side, but this the venerable father refutes in a perceptive and learned manner, because to remit the penalty would be to remit the burdens of satisfaction, among which are good works, contrary to the decree of Innocentius in the Canon Cum ex eo, of penance, that the satisfaction of penance should not be invalidated. I say that the burdens of penance are indeed remitted, but for this reason not the good works. For although prayer, fasting, 2c. For although prayer, fasting, and other penances are atonements, they are still good works, even if we do not do enough with them. In addition, repentance is not only the work (labors) of good works, but also of repentance. Therefore, many do not want a confessor to be forced to take the penance upon himself, according to the common saying: "It is better that a confessor send a confessor to purgatory with a small penance than to hell with a large one. And it is no wonder that the pope has limited the plenary indulgence to the redemption of penances, if it is given everywhere by the prelates. So the piece of the bull says about the imposed penances, that is, which should be imposed according to the divine justice, as the teachers of the Church, who write about the indulgences, declare.

Furthermore, that he claims that it is worse to impose punishments than works, I do not accept, because the punishments are useful only in so far as man is instructed to do good, and thus the power becomes powerful in weakness. But* I refer this to the judges. And because it would be dangerous for souls to err in indulgences, as I have stated today, therefore the churches do not err when they want only the indolent who have repented to receive indulgences.

1) Instead of Romani in the Weimar edition, Romanos should probably be read. In the other editions: Rom.

Certainly to the Carthäuser one does not have to come.

In matters of faith, he says, one must pay special attention to what is said. I consider auctoritatem in theology to be the greatest thing, and that we are commanded to listen to those who sit on Moses' chair [Matth. 23,2. f.]. Therefore, we must be careful who speaks, so that, according to the commandment of the apostle [2 Cor. 10:5], we may take our reason captive to the obedience of faith. For this reason also the conciliar churches were kept, so that through their reputation the errors would be eradicated.

I'll pass over the one about the mendicant monks.

To the fact that he says that a concilium does not err in those things in which it is governed by the Holy Spirit, I say, following the opinion of the older Fathers, that it must always be assumed that a concilium is governed by the Holy Spirit, as long as the opposite is not established, namely that it has not been lawfully assembled.

But the venerable father still stands firm regarding the infirmity of the good work, that he who gives money because of indulgences would not otherwise give it, as if that were an infirmity in a good work! I would like to ask the venerable father: if he holds the anniversary of some prince or nobleman with his brothers with thirty masses, because good gifts are given, otherwise they would not hold the anniversary: whether that would be an infirmity of the good work? 2)

Those who have read the German Sermon [on indulgences and grace] may judge whether he did not despise indulgences.

Furthermore, the venerable father, having become my interpreter, says that indulgences have perhaps become sufficient in this way because someone is not required to do enough for the sake of it. This is not my opinion, but because man should do enough of his own sins, even those that are repented of, and through indulgences he does enough of others, because the pope gives him from the treasury of the church what he can pay with, so that, according to the common opinion of the fathers, even with indulgences sin does not remain unpunished, with the reservation that he could not do enough of his own if the merits of Christ were not added.

2) In the margin: Martin doubts. Eck: And so no flesh will be just, neither in the cap nor out of it.

From the consensus of the faithful I believe that no one is so foolish as to believe that the indulgence in a jubilee year is a necessary thing; and if he believes that the journey to Rome is meritorious, he is not mistaken in this either. For it is certain that a work by which one obtains indulgences is meritorious, and yet indulgences themselves are not meritorious.

Furthermore, I do not do violence to the words of Sixtus and the present pope, because I follow the chair of Peter and his opinion, who sits on the same, as long as he should not (that be far!) have fallen into a heresy. I know that he does not prove, but decides, whom I consider as Christ's governor, whose faith does not cease in the moment of a decision.

But all this I order to the judgment of those to whom it is incumbent, and I am ready to let go of errors if any are proven to me.

Martin prompted [the Notares to add: Me too.

Of repentance.

Corner.

In your name, sweet JEsus.

Against the thesis of the venerable father and a part of his sermon on repentance 1) I intend to prove, in defense of the pious fathers, the preacher monks, that true repentance begins with the fear of punishment, and that someone can well prepare himself by deliberation, doubts 2c.

First, because the Lord Jesus and his forerunner, Saint John, observed such a way of preaching. For Luc. 15, 11. ff. the prodigal son gives an example of a penitent, according to Augustine "on evangelical questions", according to Ambrose lib.2.de penit. 6.3., according to Chrysostom, Jerome and others. But Christ presents Him to us in such a way that He went into Himself and said [v. 17. f. Vulg.]: "How many peons in my Father's house have bread in abundance, but I perish here in hunger. I will turn myself out, and go to my father, and say unto him, Father, I have sinned in the heavens and before you" 2c. By describing here the way of a penitent, the Lord Christ first shows that the penitent is moved by the greatness of the rewards, namely "they have bread in abundance", and by the fear of the punishment, namely "I perish here in hunger". Encouraged by these stages, he began to be intent on true repentance, namely, "and will say, Father, I have sinned." And Basil interprets this in this way: There are three stages of repentance: the hope of reward, the fear of punishment, and the sincere love of paternal kindness, and so he who was an enemy first becomes a servant before he becomes a friend of GOD. This is how John started with fear [Matth. 3, 7.]: You generation or breed of vipers, who showed you that you will escape? 2c.

So it happened also in the whole old testaments that the people were drawn by the fear of the punishments to the obedience to the commandments, as one finds this in the law books, histories and prophets everywhere. Let it be enough. To cite one passage, Ps. 89:31 ff: "But if his children forsake my law, and walk not in my statutes, if they profane my ordinances, and keep not my commandments, I will punish their sin with a rod, and their iniquity with plagues," and other things that agree with this.

Therefore, the preacher monks who followed the holy Scriptures have so far observed the good way of preparing repentance by considering the gravity of the sins, the eternal punishment 2c.

In addition, there is the reason of Dionysius, because God governs things in such a way that He leads the lowest to the highest through the middle. Therefore, since the sinner is in the lowest, because he is not worthy of the bread he eats, and wants to ascend to the highest, the grace, he must do this through the middle, the fear. It would be a good thing for perfection if someone who has sunk into the mud of sin could raise himself up to the grasp of grace through the mere contemplation of God's love and through the love of righteousness; but who is he? and we want to praise him. Rather, St. Augustine praises the way of our time in preaching by expressly teaching that no one attains to love and true grace unless fear precedes it, not filial fear, but even servile fear. Augustine says in the 9th Tractate: 2) Therefore fear makes the

2) The Interpretation of the Epistle of John (Weim, ed.).

Beginning, because the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom [Ps. 111, 10]. But when love has begun to make its dwelling place, the fear which prepared the place for it is cast out. For as much as the latter increases, the latter decreases, and as much as the former becomes more inward, fear is driven outward; the greater the love, the smaller the fear; the smaller the love, the greater the fear. But if there is no fear, there is no way for love to enter. (He gives a similitude:) Thus we see that through the bristle the thread is led in with which one sews; the bristle first goes in, but if it does not go out, the thread does not follow: thus fear first takes the heart, 1) because it went in for the sake that love led it in. He cites the word of the Psalm [Ps. 30:12.]: Thou hast turned my mourning into joy. And after that: The judgment is pronounced according to the Scriptures: for he who is without fear cannot be justified. Therefore it is necessary that fear come in first, through which love comes; fear is the medicine, love the health. From this it is quite clear that repentance serves as a medicine, and fear is the remedy according to Augustine, and love enters in no other way than through fear.

Therefore, it is well preached that repentance begins from fear, and I do not accept that the venerable father tells at the beginning of his explanations 2) that the voice of the venerable father Staupitz was sent down from heaven, as it were, that repentance begins from love and esteem [of God] (dilectione). For St. Ambrose, the good physician of souls, expressly contradicts this in his letter to Studius: "Where punishment is decreed, there must be repentance for sins; where forgiveness is given, there is grace. Repentance precedes, grace follows. Therefore repentance is not without grace, nor grace without repentance, for repentance must first condemn sin, so that grace may put it away. For the same thing Chrysostom testifies in the whole book "of the contrition of the heart" and in the 80th homily "of repentance" and in the 29th sermon. I also add Isidore in the 2nd book "Of the Supreme Good", Cap. 12: The contrition of the heart is the humility of mind, which begins with tears through the remembrance of sin and fear.

1) According to Augustine here would still be: but the fear does not remain there (Weim. Ausg.).

2) In his letter to the resolutions, in this volume No. 132, Col. 414 ff.

before the judgment; and in the whole book "of the repentance of the heart". And in the "Mirror of Sins" Augustine does nothing else, indeed, he admonishes the sinner who wants to repent that he should remember three abysses, namely his sins, the punishments and the judgments of God. St. Bernard also teaches "on the high song" in the 16th Sermon and in many other places, Gregory in moralibus lib. 2. and 5. and likewise on the 29th chapter of Job, also in the 2nd book on Ezekiel, where he says in the 19th homily: It is written [Ps. 111, 10.]: "The beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord." There is no doubt that one ascends from fear to the Lord, but does not return from wisdom to fear. The prophet, therefore, speaking from heavenly things [descending] to the lowest, he 3) began from wisdom and descended to fear. But we, who strive from the earthly to the heavenly, count the same steps ascending, so that we may be able to go from fear to wisdom. He said the same thing in the first book of Ezekiel: there are two wings, fear and repentance, which are said to cover the body, that is, the sins.

From all this, I want to conclude with regard to the one piece of fear, that in our time and in earlier times, preachers have preached that repentance begins with fear, and that they strive to sow the fear of God in the people through their preaching, so that the seed of the devil is eradicated, according to the words of Origen in the 3rd book of Job: "The fear of punishment and judgments is good; if the devil has not cast it out, he cannot sow the seed of sins. The fear of punishment and judgments is good; if the devil has not cast it out, he cannot sow the seed of sins. It follows, then, that repentance does not begin with love and the desire for righteousness; although I confess that if it began in this way, it would be more praiseworthy and perfect than if it began with the fear of punishment. But our infirmity does not suffer that to which the Lord Jesus and the preachers condescend, preaching fear as a stage by which we attain the true love of righteousness.

Martin.

This is not a way to understand or interpret the divine Scriptures profitably, when sayings are picked out of various passages without taking into consideration

3) Here we have left magis untranslated because it did not seem to fit in the context.

It is a very common way (canon) to err in the holy scriptures. Therefore, if a theologian does not want to err, he must have the whole Scripture before his eyes, and compare what seems to be contrary to another with it, and, like the two cherubim, standing face to face, find the correspondence of the difference of both in the middle of the mercy seat; otherwise the face of each of the cherubim will turn his following eye far away from the mercy seat, that is, from the true understanding of Christ.

Therefore, the excellent Doctor has never seemed to me more distant from the Holy Scriptures than he does today, and all the more so since he confesses at the end that repentance, if it starts from the love of righteousness, is more praiseworthy and more perfect than if it starts with the fear of punishment, as if we do not have to make an effort to bring forth righteous fruits of repentance in a praiseworthy manner, as John says [Matth. 3, 8]. For this I do not at all suppose that he says our infirmity stands in the way, that we cannot begin repentance from love of righteousness. If we had to act according to our infirmities and interpret the Scriptures, we would never repent, but would grow angrier day by day. Therefore, before I answer his objections, I will first explain myself:

All good life must be established according to some law. Therefore, the law is the basis (principium) for repentance, for every good work. Therefore, in the case of a penitent, first of all the law must be revealed or given to the hand, against which he has done, and according to which he must do. But as soon as the law is made known or remembered, the increase of sin follows immediately, if grace is lacking. Therefore the will of Natnr hates the law, as the explicit testimonies of Paul to the Romans and the Galatians state. Rom. 5, 20. "The law came in next to it, so that sin might become more powerful." Gal. 3, 19. [Vulg.]: "The law was given for the sake of transgressions". Therefore St. Augustine says

"Of the Spirit and the Letter," Cap. 3: For free will, before grace, can do nothing but sin, but not repent, as the Doctor says, "for that is Pelagian. Augustine follows: "And if we have begun to realize that we know what to do, yet, unless the Holy Spirit pours love into our hearts, we do not love, we do not undertake, we do not live well. 1) Augustine clearly says that the law of God cannot be loved except by the grace of the Holy Spirit. But if the law is not loved, its antithesis, sin, is not hated. Therefore, it is impossible to repent before the love of the law. This is what the apostle Rom. 4, 15. wants: "The law only causes wrath", that is, it shows sin, but does not give grace for sin to be hated. Therefore, the hatred of the law and the love of sin remain, no matter how much man is shaken by rebuke from without or inwardly by servile fear. For even though he abstains from the work of sin, he cannot abstain from the love of sin. This is also taught by Christ John 6:44, where he says: "No one can come to me unless the Father draws him." Therefore, I admit that the law, the remembrance of sins, the view of punishments can frighten the sinner, but never make him repentant.

I therefore answer the first objection of the prodigal son Luc. 15, 11. ff. that he began repentance with the remembrance of the greatness of the reward, since he says: "The day laborers have bread in abundance" 2c. I. say that this prodigal son in truth began with the love of righteousness, because he struck within himself and first recognized the good, and from the recognized good he understood his evil. But this beating in himself he did not have out of his own

1) The whole passage is in Augustinus III. opp. sä. karis. 1541. p. 182^o: And if that which is to be done and towards which one must strive has not begun to be hidden, then, if there is not also desire and love for it, it will not be done, it will not be undertaken, it will not be lived well. But in order for it to be loved, the love of God is poured into our hearts, not through free will, which comes from us, but through the Holy Spirit, which is given to us.

n infirmity, or from fear of punishment, as the Lord Doctor says, that he considered the fear of punishment according to the greatness of the rewards, therefore it did not begin with punishment and fear, but he had it, since the father drew him inwardly and instilled in him love for his father's house, saying, "How many peons in my father's house!" For since he had lived in sins before, he neither recognized nor loved the good, nor hated sin, although sin could not be unconscious to him. Therefore, a different attitude was necessary, that is, the love of good.

Secondly, he cited John the Baptist, Luc. 3:7, as having begun with fear, saying, "Who then hath shewed you that ye shall escape the wrath to come?" 2c. I answer, It is something else to preach repentance than to begin repentance; something else to preach a good work than to begin a good work. The preacher reminds, frightens, entices 2c., but nothing follows unless grace moves the will.

The same I say to Ps. 89, 33: "I will punish their sin with the rod" 2c. The sinner can be beaten, but if grace does not cooperate, nothing is accomplished, as it is said in Jer. 5:3: "You beat them, but they do not feel it," and Isa. 1:5, 6: "From the sole of his foot to the head there is nothing healthy in him; what else is there to beat in you?" For he has done nothing with the smiting.

And I am very surprised at the excellent doctor that he has forgotten the light of nature, of Aristotle, and that he presumes to place the beginning of any virtue in the urging of fear, while the latter, with so many extremely well-known words, endeavors in the third book of ethics to teach that a good work must be willing and must be done of free will. But the will is certainly love or the sister of love. Therefore, it is also said that a good work must be done by free will.

I add also this, that Christ never forced sinners to repentance by fear, but kindly attracted all those whom He called, as, Zacchaeus, Magdalene, the apostles, and all, as He also in Jeremiah Cap. 31, 3. says: "I have always loved you, therefore I have drawn you to myself out of goodness. I say, therefore, that the fear of the Lord is necessary, but a childlike fear, because without love it is impossible to endure His smiting, in which the sinner is terrified, contrite and humiliated, according to the words of 1 Sam. 2:6: "The Lord leadeth into hell, and out again." I believe, however, that the opinion of even the excellent doctor and all scholastic teachers is with me and against his objections, since they all agree that repentance must be done in love if repentance is to be good and meritorious, which I certainly understand to mean that repentance is done on the impulse and command of love, so that repentance in such a way is willing, joyful and loving. Therefore, although John scolded and terrified the Jews, it does not follow that the penitent also begin from terror, or if they begin from terror, they are hypocrites rather than penitents, unless grace is added.

The Lord Doctor added the reason that God governs things in such a way that He leads the lowest through the middle to the highest. He applied this to fear, wanting sin to be the lowest, fear to be the middle, love to be the highest. I pass over this and do not accept it.

He also says it would be a perfection if man could raise himself up to the grasp of grace by the mere beholding of GOD and by the love of righteousness, "but who is he? and let us praise him." I answer: Neither by fear nor by love can man raise himself to the grasping of grace, but grace precedes him and moves him to the mere beholding of GOD and to the love of righteousness.

To Augustine, who is said to teach that fear precedes grace, and that when love enters, fear is driven out, I say: If it be rightly understood, I allow it, that is, that repentance is not yet begun when fear precedes love, but when love enters, repentance is begun, that is, love of righteousness and hatred of sin. But if love did not enter, fear would be only cause greater sins. Therefore, the simile of the bristle and the thread is approved by me, if only it is not understood to mean that fear leads love in, which I take from the words of the doctor, that if the bristle does not go out, the thread does not follow, that is, if fear, which hinders true repentance, is not driven out by love going in, then atonement will never be rightly made, (penitetur,) that I say so.

Ambrose, who is quoted in the letter to Studius, that repentance precedes and grace and other things follow, likewise Isidore "of the highest good", likewise the three abysses of sins to be remembered, Bernard on the Song of Songs, Gregorius in moralibus, and other fathers who teach that one must ascend from fear to wisdom, and begin repentance with fear, I readily admit, but do not understand them against the apostle Paul, who teaches of the law and the fear of the law. I also say that when one has love, at the same time man is moved to the fear of God, and so repentance begins with fear in love. Otherwise, the saying stands firm [1 John 4:18] that fear has pain, does not work good, but hates the law.

Therefore, the excellent Doctor does not prove (non concludit) that repentance does not begin with the love of righteousness, however good the fear of punishment may be according to Origen 1); for it is not with the fear of punishment, but with the fear of God that one must repent, because the latter is a maidservant who will not remain in the house, but the latter is a child and heir. Therefore, I do not allow the word Proverbs 1:7, "The beginning of wisdom is the fear of the Lord," to be understood as the fear of punishment, which before grace torments man without fruit, since it expressly says, "the fear of the Lord," not the fear of punishment. The fear of the punishment is rather the beginning of the un-

Wisdom. Therefore, the excellent doctor should see to it that he does not throw servile fear and childish fear together in one desolate heap, lest he himself close off the understanding of the Scriptures and the Fathers.

Corner.

The venerable father is trying to wiggle out of the so clear testimonies of the holy scriptures and the holy fathers with apparent words, and in order to convince you of this, he has taken the liberty to say that I was far away from the understanding of the holy scriptures, looking for a side way through the cherubim looking at each other. But those to whom it is incumbent may judge which of us has a more correct opinion concerning the holy scriptures. But to remove his quite improper answers: he frequently mentions two things, which I have not thought of when preaching a sermon in the common way, and which none of the preachers, as far as I can remember, has denied, that this fear, too, if it prepares for true repentance, is worked beforehand by divine inspiration. For it is beyond doubt for a Christian against the false teaching of Pelagius that we have the beginning of our salvation through God's action. Therefore, it was not necessary to mention this, and because of it to blame the way of preaching. But in the one piece he seems to me to be deceived by an ambiguity, that he believes that this grace by which God advances in moving the hearts of men is love, while it is another gracious gift of God, and by this the opinion of St. Augustine in his book "Of the Spirit and the Letter" against the godless Pelagians is sufficiently explained. The other, that he says that fear is unfruitful unless grace is added, - who of the scholastics or the preachers has ever denied this, who all follow the opinion of the apostle Paul in the letter to the Corinthians [1 Cor. 13] about love?

Furthermore, when I said that repentance beginning from love is more praiseworthy, he assumed that we must do it according to the words of John [Matt. 3:8]: "Do righteous fruits of repentance," because if we had to act according to our infirmity, we would never repent. I say that we can also do righteous fruits of repentance, even if we start from fear and come to love. And I marvel that the Lord Father wants to make us angels, and to take away our infirmities.

1) Only the Wittenberg edition has the correct reading: ex OriZene. The Jena, Löscher and Erlangen editions have: ex OriYine; the Weimar edition: exoriMne; the old translator: "zuallererst". Compare the conclusion of Eck's previous speech.

He has forgotten that the prophet descended from wisdom to fear, since St. Gregory, in the second book of Ezekiel, expressly declared that we, climbing the same steps, descend from fear to love, just as many other things are attributed to our frailty. Since he wants to explain his opinion, he shows how the love of the law must precede repentance, because [Rom. 5, 20.] through the law sin became more powerful, and in the Epistle to the Galatians, Cap. 3,19., 2c. I say: It is true, as St. Augustine testifies in the 22nd book against Faustus, a sin is done or spoken against the law, therefore it would not be sin if the forbidding law were not there. But just as sin becomes powerful through the transgression of the law, so merit is increased through the observance of the law. Therefore these byways are not at all helpful to the matter, and that the answers given are contrary to the right understanding of the Scriptures, we shall show after lunch.

At two o'clock, Eck continued his unfinished speech.

We want to follow up on what we started today.

The venerable father answered to that of the prodigal son [Luc. 15,11. ff-1 that the love for righteousness had preceded, after the word: "he struck within himself", because he had his fatherly house in his memory. But this does not cancel out the objection that this beating in himself was done through the contemplation of punishment, since he had no one to fill him with tears. For as long as the money lasted, he did not beat within himself, but since he suffered hunger, he beat within himself. In addition, St. Augustine says that his words were those of a man who was intent on repentance, but did not yet do it. If he had been smitten with love for righteousness, he would have already begun repentance, against Augustine. Therefore, his answer does not invalidate my assertion and clearly contradicts Basil.

To John [Matth. 3, 7. f. Luc. 3, 7. f.] he answers that it is to start something else and to preach something else, and elsewhere he said that the preachers frighten but do not make repentant by the torment of the punishments. Again, a powerless answer. For since John preached in this way, he certainly intended a fruit of his preaching, and since he struck fear into them, this is a sign that repentance begins in this way.

And our preachers preach: how they may begin, God knows.

Further, that he attributes the beginning of repentance to grace, and our preachers and teachers have never denied that GOD precedes by His giving.

Moreover, he does not want to accept Aristotle in the theological schools, and yet he dares to oppose him to me. But I say that it is the constant opinion of the pagans that if one stops at the fear of punishment, there is no perfect virtue according to the words: 1) The wicked hate to sin for fear of punishment; the good hate to sin for love of virtue 2c., and the work of virtue must not be forced but free. But it is another thing for free will to be induced, and another thing for free will to be compelled. I confess that Christ called the apostles, Zacchaeus, Magdalene with kind words, but that he sometimes calls in a harsher way gives us to understand the story of Paul, of whom Augustine says, 23. quaest. 4. can. quis: To whom Christ did violence, whom he compelled, 2) and in the Gospel of the calling to the Lord's Supper [Luc. 14, 23.] he says: "Compel them to come in." St. Gregory continues this in many words in the Homily. Therefore, I beg to remain silent, the venerable father, who claims only a kind calling.

Furthermore, he thinks that only a childlike fear is necessary for a penitent, which I am very surprised about, since he has admonished me today to the right understanding of the Scriptures, because he has not corrected himself first. For St. Augustine, too, in the passage on John cited today [1 John 4:18], speaks of the servile fear that drives out love, and of this, he says, the wise man speaks [Proverbs 1:7]: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom," and so the gloss on the Psalm [Ps. 111:10: "The fear of the Lord" 2c., understood it from the servile fear: the fear of judgment is the door to conversion to God; and it is the gloss of Cassiodorus. So the gloss says about the word of the apostle Rom.

1) Horace Lpist. Ud. I, XVI, 52. f. somewhat different (Weim. ed.).

8,15: "For you have not received a servant spirit, so that you should fear again", the servant fear is good and from God. Paul testifies that it is good, 1 Tim. 5:20: "Let them that sin be punished above all, that they also may fear others." Thus Augustine says about the Psalms and Lombardus cites him in 3, [Buche]: Servile fear is when man restrains himself from sin for fear of hell, by which he fears the presence of the judge and the punishments. And afterwards: This fear is good and useful, although insufficient, by which a habit of righteousness is gradually formed. Beda also interprets this as follows: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom", namely the servant fear.

Therefore, he seeks another protection and gives another answer, because it does not agree with the holy fathers. If he does not want to stand by the sayings of the saints, he will have the passages of the holy scriptures against him. For while the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, yet love casteth out fear; but filial fear, according to David [Ps. 19:10.], abideth for ever and ever. Therefore it is another fear by which wisdom is begun, another which abides with the increased wisdom. Therefore, since the venerable father denies that fear introduces love, he expressly contradicts St. Augustine, who says all this in the passage cited, namely, that servile fear is the beginning of wisdom, and that it is in turn cast out by love. The opinion of Augustine is subscribed to by the sweetly speaking Bernard in the 52nd Sermon on the Song of Songs, which I do not mention for the sake of brevity. But I say even more: that love does not cast out fear as one thing that is incompatible with another, but gradually, with the increase of grace, the servile fear is diminished, and through the increased grace fear is completely taken away.

There is nothing wrong with the fact that the Lord Father today emphasized that "the fear of the Lord", not the fear of punishment, "is the beginning of wisdom", because both the fear of punishment and the fear of reverence are of the Lord and by the Lord. Only the means of fear are different, as Beda and others, whom Lombardus cites, testify, except Augustine, who is cited above, and it is sufficiently clear from the words of Christ, if we had nothing else, Matth. 10, 28: "Do not fear those who kill the body and do not kill the soul.

may kill, but rather fear him who may destroy body and soul into hell." For if servile fear were damnable, as the venerable Father says, why should Christ call us to it? And that Augustine and others understood it in this way, I leave to the judgment of those to whom it will be incumbent.

Moreover, he says that all scholastics agree that repentance is of no use if it is not done in love. This is true, of course, but according to Augustine, one cannot arrive at love in any other way than through fear. Fear is the medicine, love is the health. Therefore, if love is not added, all know very well that fear is insufficient; therefore they put it on the way, not at the goal.

He went to the reason taken from St. Dionysius, but the Father did not reveal that sin is the lowest and love is the highest, which is the middle, by which one can go from sin to love. And truly! he cannot specify any other than Basil, Beda, Augustine and Bernard, namely fear.

Then he assumes that grace precedes fear and love. If he speaks of the grace of divine inspiration, through which God precedes us by inspiration, then I freely admit it; but if he speaks of the grace of love, I do not accept it, because the beginning of what is rightly called wisdom in Scripture is the fear of the Lord, although this fear is unfruitful without love.

Furthermore, that he admits Ambrose, Gregory and other teachers, but not against the apostle of the fear of the law, I do not know what kind of fog he is protecting here. He clearly states whether these holy fathers, whom I have quoted, contradict the sayings of the apostle or not. If they contradict the words of the apostle, let him prove it, which, I believe, can never happen, since they were well versed in the Scriptures and full of the Holy Spirit, and understood the apostle Paul as well as we do; If they do not contradict Paul's sayings, he agrees with their opinion, and does not disapprove of preachers who teach the aforementioned way of repentance and penance, and does not take away from sinful people such servile fear, which is a useful and, as it were, necessary means. It does not help him that he thinks that if one has love, the mind will be moved to fear, because that would mean going the way of the crab, against the opinion of St. Gregory, in the 2nd book in the 19th homily on Ezekiel. There is no doubt that one ascends from fear to wisdom, but does not return from wisdom to fear. Therefore, fear has pain, which is diminished and completely consumed by increased love.

For the sake of brevity, I will pass over other things contained in the same sermon 1) which should certainly be discussed if today were not intended to conclude this subject, such as the point about the confession of all individual sins in hope, as Chrysostom thinks about the 12th chapter of Matthew. The point that the scholastics put three parts of penance, namely, contrition, confession, and satisfaction, which Chrysostom first set forth in the 29th Sermon on Penance; the twofold way of confessing, the great and the other sins to the priest, with other points, all of which could be widely treated and examined. But now that the foundation has been laid, I at the same time leave the whole sermon and what I have stated for my part to the judgment of the judges to be chosen.

Martin:

I hoped that the excellent doctor would refute my answers, especially what I had quoted as a basis from St. Paul about the law, which only works wrath and increases sin before love. I am silent that it may prepare for grace; just as servile fear, the fruit of the law, works wrath and increases sin. But he has bravely leaped over these things, and has sung the same little song again, and seeks to impress this upon us, not as a sap, but as the marrow of Scripture. I will go through it one by one.

First, he says that it would not have been necessary to state that the beginning of our salvation is through God's action. There he also expresses the opinion that a preparatory fear is given. I answer: This is all quite erroneous because of the word of Paul [Rom. 8:3 ff.], who says that it is impossible for the law to be fulfilled, indeed for sins not to be increased, unless the Holy Spirit pours out love into our hearts. This

He would have had to refute such explicit testimonies and that of St. Augustine Cap. 3 "of the spirit and the letter": If one has begun to know how to live, this is not undertaken, it is not lived well if grace is not given. Therefore, let him take hold of his servile fear, which only works hatred against the law and against God and is wrongly called preparatory to grace.

He also invents an ambiguity of grace: another is love, another is the gift by which we are first moved. Away with it! This distinction does not serve the cause, it is a mockery in Paul's words. Paul's text is quite clear: if grace and love do not make us love the law, then the law always causes only wrath. But this gift, by which we are first moved, will not love the law, but the love of the Spirit.

Thirdly, he has admitted that fear without love is unfruitful, and that no one has denied this. I answer: Why then do they teach the unfruitful penances and resist me who teach the fruitful? I allow that this [unfruitful penance] is completely overthrown with so many writings of Augustine, and if Augustine did not do it with so many thunderbolts, Paul alone gives the irrefutable proof that any works are sins and damnable before love and do not prepare for grace. And with these sayings almost all his rejoinders can be answered. It is true that, as is his way, he adapts the sayings of the holy Scriptures to the "sayings" of the Fathers, yes, he draws them to his conception, which he has in the Fathers, while, on the contrary, the writings of the Fathers must be held to the sayings of the Scriptures and judged according to them.

Fourth, he does not suppose that I have assumed that we must do the more praiseworthy penance, but says that we can also do righteous fruits of penance if we start from fear. I interpret this according to St. Augustine: when we heap sin upon sin. For, as has often been said, everything that is done is becomes, before the will has been made healthy through grace, the fruit of an evil tree that cannot bear good fruit; therefore, one can never attain love through servile fear.

Fifthly, he relies on Gregory about Ezekiel, who descends from wisdom to fear, but we, so he [Gregory] teaches, ascend from fear to love. To this I answer thus: that St. Gregory does not have to exclude love, nor did he exclude repentance from incipient fear, as the Doctor understands it, just as not all servile fear is excluded from love, especially in this life, since the office of love is to cast out servile fear, and that throughout life, and to bring in filial fear.

Sixth. Regarding the sayings of Paul [Gal. 3, 19], that the law is given for the sake of transgressions and increases sin, he says that this does not serve the purpose and that I would have sought side paths by citing Augustine against Faustus in the 22nd book, sin is a speech or deed against the law of God. I do not know what the doctor wants. Here is not a disputation about what sin is, therefore this time is wasted with the superfluous words. It is about this subject (scopus), that according to the sayings of Paul, servile fear can be nothing but sin, and that it increases sin by the power of the law when grace is lacking. And so Paul's sayings are not byways, but thunderbolts that crush the opinion of the doctor to dust. Therefore, I do not make angels out of men by forgetting their frailty, but I teach that sinners should not be made gods by forgetting their frailty, according to which they can do nothing but evil before grace.

That he says that the beating of the prodigal son [Luc. 15, 11. ff.] happened through the contemplation of punishment, I deny. As for the evidence that he had no one to fill him with drink, I say that if he had not been drawn inwardly and beaten within himself, he would rather have died, than that he had returned, so that the saying may be established [John 6:44], "No one can come to me unless my Father draws him." What Augustine says, that his words were those of a man who was intent on repentance but did not yet do it, I hope will serve for me, since "being intent on repentance," especially for reasons of the heart, is certainly to begin repentance, therefore the "who does not yet do it" must be referred to the completion outwardly.

The same may be said of Basil.

In reference to John the Baptist's word [Matth. 3. Luc. 3], he says it is an invalid answer that I said it is something different to teach repentance than to begin. I answer: With permission, the excellent doctor does not seem to understand Paul, nor to know the power of the law. For the law teaches what is holy, just, and good, but grace alone begins it, does it, and completes it. Therefore, even if John had taught that fear was the beginning of repentance, it would not follow that repentance begins from fear, just as when I do any good work with terrors and threats, the good work does not begin from terrors and threats, but from love.

He is unwilling that I have held Aristotle against him in the theological schools, which I do not accept. I admit that he is too small to be valid in a theological school, since he was the seducer of the scholastic teachers. But I wanted to do enough with my thesis, "that those against their holy Aristotle are nonsensical" who begin repentance from fear and not from free will. For I pass over the distinction between forced and induced free will. For it is not true that the free will is ever compelled to do good, nor that it can be compelled; but when it is compelled, it is carried away to the opposite, and hates the compulsion against it. But by grace alone it is drawn, that is, made truly free, as Augustine says against Julian in the 2nd book and in many places.

Since I have said that Christ has the Apo-

He counters that Paul was called in a harder way, and that in the Gospel the servant was told to compel him to come in [Luc. 14:23]. First of all, I am very surprised that while we use Paul's example to defend grace, they slip away from us and say that this is a miraculous event and does not make any rule. Here, however, the excellent doctor introduces it as a rule, as if he did not consider it a miracle. But this I leave aside. I say that Paul could not have been converted inwardly from the heart if grace had not drawn him, as St. Augustine teaches against the letters of the Pelagians, that the grace of God makes willing and obedient ones out of the unwilling and reluctant. This is also answered in the Gospel [Luc. 14, 23], that the servant can compel by the word, but if the Lord does not hiss [as Isaiah (Cap. 7, 18) speaks], 1) nothing follows.

To that in Augustine, who understands the servant fear in the word of Solomon [Proverbs 1, 7]: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom", and that in the gloss to the 111th Psalm, v. 10: "The fear of judgment is the door to conversion to God", I answer: if grace is present; otherwise the servant fear without grace (because Augustine does not exclude it either) works nothing but anger. For it is not necessary for Augustine to dispute with Paul, - as in truth he does not dispute against him, - who condemns everything that is apart from grace. The gloss on the word Rom. 8, 15: "Ye have not received a servant spirit, that ye should fear again," which says that servant fear is good, I would rather reject, since it expressly speaks against the text (for the apostle says [Vulg.]: "Ye have not received the spirit of bondage in fear," condemning it); or I say that the gloss does not interpret the text.

The word of the apostle to Timothy [1 Tim. 5, 20.]: "Punish them in the sight of all, that the rest also may fear", the Lord

Doctor referred to the servile fear. I leave that aside; I take it from filial fear until he proves it otherwise. But that Augustine, as the Magister sSententiarum] tells us in the 3rd book, says: Servile fear is when a man, out of fear of hell, restrains himself from sin, by which he fears the presence of the judge, by which he fears the punishments 2c.: then I say that he only restrains himself from outward sin, but inwardly he increases the hatred against justice, which threatens hell. And afterwards: Fear is good and useful, though insufficient, by which a habit of righteousness gradually arises, that is, in my opinion, the habit of despairing and hating God when grace is excluded; but it is true when grace is included.

Therefore, it is not necessary for me to give another answer, if the excellent doctor has not first proved that the holy fathers speak of servile fear to the exclusion of grace, or that love has nothing to do with the expulsion of servile fear. Therefore, what he has subsequently said about the casting out of fear, about the beginning of wisdom, and how love gradually casts out fear through the increase of grace, is sufficiently understood from what has gone before.

There is still the strongest testimony left, Matth. 10,28., which alone is sufficient, as he thinks: "Do not be afraid of them" 2c., "rather be afraid of Him" 2c., therefore the servile fear is not condemnable, to which Christ calls us. I answer, first of all, that if the Lord Doctor wills it, then the preceding is contradicted, where servile fear is called insufficient. Therefore, it is equally inconsistent to say that Christ has taught us something insufficient. But I say that there is not the servile fear of the Lord, because the filial fear also fears to offend God and to be separated from Him. And even if he spoke of the mere servile fear, it must not yet be understood with the exclusion of grace, but rather with the inclusion of it, since according to the testimony of the apostle and the Augustinus all law and doctrine is the letter that requires the spirit.

He also agreed that the scholastics say with truth that repentance is not good apart from love, but he did not refute it. So now their own testimony stands against them, unless he refutes that repentance in love is what begins to happen from love.

I like the word of Augustine that fear is the medicine, love is the health, namely fear in imperfect love, and perfect love.

He says that I have taken the reason, which is taken from Dionysius, from the lowest, middle and highest, transitions and have not made it clear what the middle is between the lowest sin and the highest love. I confess that I gladly passed over this, since I believed that the doctor himself was quite clear that this reason had nothing to do with the matter. For Dionysius speaks of the lowest, middle, and highest ranks (ordinibus); but I have no middle at all between sin and grace, just as Christ does not either, since he says [Matth. 12, 30.]: "He who is not with me is against me," and again [v. 33.]: "Either plant a good tree, or plant a rotten tree." But I believe that the Lord Doctor also teaches the same, because among the scholastics grace and sin are directly opposed to each other.

The Doctor does not suppose that I have said that grace precedes love and fear, if I do not speak of the grace of the first suggestion. I answer: I hold with the Apostle and Augustine that if the Law is not loved (which is a matter of love and not of first suggestion), it is not lived well, therefore neither is God feared nor revered.

At the end he makes a cuckolded final speech against me: 1) either Ambrosius, Gregorius and others contradict the sayings of the apostle, or not; if so, I shall prove it; if not, I shall join their opinion. I answer and go in the middle-by: They do not contradict the sayings of the apostle, and I stand by their opinion, but not by Eck's opinion or rather error. For they do not exclude love from fear, be it servile or filial.

The doctor says that it is called going the way of the crab, that I said that when one has love, the mind is moved to fear. I am very angry about this scorpion or crab, since the pagan poet [Ovid] also said: Love is a thing full of anxious fear. As if we did not know that love is the source and head of all the movements of the heart. For this is why punishment and hell are feared in a servant-like manner, because life and air are loved in a childish and servant-like manner. To eradicate this fear and love, the love of God is poured out, with which we love another life and fear another death, that is, separation from God.

The doctor has gone over the points indicated in my sermon 2), and has also taken upon himself the refutation of the whole sermon. I say briefly: He has pen and paper, let him attack it confidently; one will see whether he will refute it or make a mockery of himself. I leave this to the judgment of those who will be appointed to do so.

Because of the shortness of time I cannot answer what the venerable father has said, but I appeal to the judges that I have not skipped anything, nor has it been the opinion of preachers or teachers that the law is fulfilled without love, that also not some have taught an unfruitful repentance, but how to arrive at a fruitful one through servile fear, and that he has departed from his answer today with splendid verbiage, 3) since he had said that the wise man [Proverbs. 1, 7.] speaks of filial fear, but now allows that he speaks of servile fear, but not to the exclusion of grace, which neither the text nor the holy teachers suffer.

2) "Predigt von der Buße," Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. X, 1220 fs.

3) As an aside, Martin replied: I have not departed from it.

For by wisdom he understands love, and so the beginning would be before the beginning. Also, the whole of Augustine does not have to do with how servile fear with love is the beginning of love, but how servile fear first takes over the mind and first enters and thus leads love in, which is also the opinion of Gregory, who rejects going back in the manner of a crab, where the venerable father brings me a scorpion instead of Gregory: Love is a thing that is full of anxious fear. Therefore, all the holy teachers who have been cited today want servile fear to be the beginning of love, according to the view that has often been given, and which the preachers tend to give; for this I refer to the judges.

About the content of the fourth and fifth thesis. 1)

Corner.

Venerable Father, since the time allotted to us is too short, let us, while going to the root of the matter, touch upon a few things in passing, namely, that every priest must absolve from punishment and from guilt contrary to the common custom of the whole Church, and that you say in the German Sermon 2) and in the thesis that it cannot be proved from any Scripture that divine justice demands any chastisement or satisfaction from the sinner. And I base myself on the fact that in sacramental absolution the guilt is remitted immediately, but the eternal punishment due to sin is transformed into a temporal one. This is clear from the tradition of sacred Scripture and the custom of the holy fathers, and to be brief, it was expressly intended by Ambrose in Lucas, Jerome in the first book against Jovinianus, Augustine in the first question of the eight questions of Dulcitius, and Ambrose even appropriately testifies in Luc. 5 that the punishment of sin is paid by the atonement.

The Scriptures also show this, for Adam's sin, even since the guilt is remitted, is punished on the whole posterity; therefore, the punishment remains while the guilt passes.

Augustine touches on this reason in the 124th treatise on Matthew, and the gloss 2 Sam. 12, 1. ff.; similarly it is said of David 2 Sam. 24, 10. when David had repented, and his heart beat, he said, I have sinned greatly that I have done this, but I pray that thou take away the iniquity of thy servant. But the sin is not taken away according to the guilt, because, as the prophet says [Ezek. 18, 20.], the soul itself, which has sinned, shall die of death; so it only remains that the sin is taken away according to the punishment. 3) Thus it is said by the prophet Nathan to David [2 Sam. 12, 13.]: God has taken away your sin, where the gloss says: God blots out the sin, but does not leave it unavenged. For either the penitent sinner punishes it on himself, or God strikes as an avenger together with man.

And now let us come to the holy fathers, from whom the custom and usage of the church is mainly taken from the apostles. For first of all, no sin goes unpunished, and punishment is that which sets the fault right (ordinativa). Augustine touches on these reasons and Gratianus cites them (sicut, primi de poenitentia dist 1.). For God would not suffer evil to happen unless, by setting it right through justice, he caused it to stand better in the world. Therefore, Augustine says in the book "On the Remedy of Repentance": It is not enough that one improves one's life and departs from evil deeds, if God is not also satisfied for those that have happened, through the pain of repentance, through the groaning of humility, through the sacrifice of a bruised heart, through the cooperation of almsgiving 2c. For it is not said that you should abstain only from sins, but it is said [Sir. 21, 1.] also of past ones, "Ask the Lord that they may be forgiven you" 2c.

But if the venerable Father, as in the "Explanations" and elsewhere, seeks to prove, at least in my opinion, that this satisfaction is done for the Church, but that God does not demand such a punishment, and that man should not take away those that God demands, I counter: First, that Augustine says in the Enchiridion Cap. 71 (he is speaking of the Lord's Prayer): This prayer completely wipes out the small and

3) The old translator remarks here: "This is a very dark passage." It seems to us that what is said here could be understood to some extent by the second following paragraph. But Eck is unclear, as Luther's answer also proves.

It cancels the daily sins, but it also cancels the sins from which the believers' lives, which have been ungodly but have been changed for the better through repentance, depart. It is obvious that the prayer of the Lord cancels the venial and also the mortal sins, not according to the guilt, but according to the punishment, because the same [punishment] has been changed through repentance. This change in Augustine cannot be understood otherwise than from the change of the eternal punishment into a temporal one.

I do not mention those who have been there for four hundred years; among them are William of Paris, William Altisiodorensis, who affirm it with a full mouth. In addition, Cyprianus, in his letter to Fidus, says: "We have read your letter, dearest brother, in which you have informed us, with regard to a certain presbyter Victor, that before he had fully repented and made satisfaction to God, the Lord, against whom he had sinned, his colleague Therapius had sacrilegiously and rashly given him peace. Here St. Cyprianus does not say that Victor had not done enough for the church, but for God, the Lord.

The same Cyprian says to Pope Cornelius about the heretics: "They strive to accomplish their work through the devil's malice, so that the grace of God in His Church does not heal the wounded. They spoil the repentance of the wretched, so that the wrathful God is not satisfied. Obviously, the holy martyr scolded the heretics who thought that the penance imposed by the Church was not satisfaction against God.

Although the venerable father quite immodestly often reproaches me as if I do not treat the understanding of the holy scripture in an appropriate manner (the judges appointed today 1) may judge which of them has a more correct opinion of the faith and the meaning of the scripture), as far as I can see, all who treat the holy scripture agree with this opinion. For why should the Church impose such a heavy burden on penitents if the Lord and Head of the Church did not require it? I have touched on this reason in my notes 2), but it was not mine, but that of Chrysostom, as Gratianus reports 26. quaest. 7. can. alligant: 3) The man to whom you have given a heavy

If you impose a burden of penance, either he will reject the penance, or, not being able to bear it, he will be angry and sin even more. Then, even if we err in imposing a moderate penance, is it not better to give account for the sake of mercy than for the sake of cruelty? For where the householder is bountiful, the steward need not be meager. If GOD is kind, why does the priest want to be severe? This is for the confessors.

The same says in the 31st Homily on the Letter to the Hebrews: "Sin is diminished by confession. But it is not diminished as far as guilt is concerned, for it is ungodly, as Jerome says, to expect half a remission from God: therefore it is diminished as far as punishment is concerned.

I add to Gregory, 4. moralium cap. 49 After many things he says thus: But because God leaves no sin unscented (for either we pursue it with weeping, or He with judgment), it only remains that the mind always diligently seeks its correction.

This was also the opinion of St. Jerome. His words are transcribed in the Canon mensuram, de poenitentia dist. 1: The measure of time for doing penance, therefore, the canons do not precisely determine for each offense that they should say about each one in what way each one must be corrected, but rather determine that this is to be left to the discretion of the priest who discerns it, because with God both the measure of time and of pain do not apply.

Augustine also says in Canon Nullus: No one receives the remission of the more severe punishment due him unless he has paid some punishment, though far less than is due him. For in this way, God distributes His abundant mercy, so that the discipline of justice may not be abandoned. Here, the excellent Doctor Carlstadt has cited Augustine in my defense, whose opinion it is not our intention to pursue further.

In addition, Isidore in the 2nd book "of the highest good", Cap. 13. Although there is a reconciliation of sins through the penance, this must not be done without fear, because the satisfaction of the penitent is only paid to the divine court, not to the human one. Therefore, repentance is not imposed because it is sufficient only for the church, but also because it is sufficient for God. For even with God the punishment is longer.

than guilt, as Augustine testifies in the 124th Tractate on John.

From all this, which is undoubtedly true, it is easy to see my rejection of the fifth thesis, where the venerable father says that every priest must absolve the penitent from punishment and guilt, and thus every village priest would be bishop, archbishop and pope in his parish. That this is obviously false, contrary to the custom of the whole Church, and not only of the flatterers, is proved first of all by what has been said, because by priestly absolution the guilt is cancelled, the punishment remains, although it is changed; secondly, because the Sacrament of Penance is judicial, as St. Augustine Cap. 2 "On the Medicine of Penance" describes the form of this judgment, and jurisdiction belongs to the making of a judgment, if he does not want to create an Anaxagorean chaos 1) and the greatest confusion in the Church of God. And since jurisdiction extends from two essential things that one has in this sacrament (for both the penitent sinner and the sins themselves belong to the essence of penance, and no one denies that jurisdiction was limited in the lower prelates to avoid disorder, with respect to the piece that concerns the sinner; Because a judgment that is not passed by the proper (suo) judge is void, therefore he who absolves one who is not subject to him judges nothing. In the same way, for the same reason, in regard to sins, the jurisdiction can also be limited to the abhorrence 2) of offenses. That he cannot absolve his priests in full (plenarie), even those who are under his orders, is evident from the fact that such great power, if it is not justified by a testimony (auctoritate), must not be attributed to him contrary to the consensus of the whole church, whose custom must serve as a rule for a Christian man. But in the foregoing it has been shown by the higher ecclesiastics Cyprian, Chrysostom and Augustine that the obligation (debitum) of the punishment remains after the guilt (culpam). Therefore, the reverend father must give way to the prestige of the holy fathers and obey the custom of the whole church, or he must explain by the testimony of the holy scriptures, the concilia, or the holy fathers why this should not be done.

Martin.

I allow the Doctor to have the last word, because he wants it that way. 3) But the excellent Doctor concludes against my thesis by wanting to prove that punishment is required by God, and first of all cites the scripture Genesis 3, where Adam's sin is punished even after the guilt of his offspring is forgiven, thus the punishment remains while the guilt passes. I want to have the Lord Doctor captivated by this example, and he may give no reply, unless he confirms it or renounces his opinion. If this punishment is required for sin, and must be held in the same way of any punishment, as he concludes, then I have what I have asserted (propositum), that the punishment cannot be remitted by the pope or any priest, because no one has yet remitted death, the innumerable kinds of punishments, diseases, and similar miseries, all of which have been imposed for the first sin, and so the Doctor's proof has proved my thesis against himself.

Secondly, that from David, after the sin was taken away, yet the punishment was not taken away, serves also for me, as I have also said in the same German sermon following; 4) for it was a punishment which God required, therefore no one could take it away. If the Herr Doctor has not understood me, let him read more carefully; for I have said and say that God does not require this punishment, which the pope or a man can remove; but which He Himself requires (namely He speaks directly), 5) man cannot remove.

Third, he cited the gloss: GOD blots out sin, but does not leave it unavenged. This does not argue against me, because he avenges either through man himself, by crushing him through repentance, or through the church, by chastising him, or through himself, inwhich he judges. And this last and the first kind of punishment is not at the will of any man, as the apostle says in 1 Cor. 11:31 ff: "If we judged ourselves, we would not be judged by the Lord. But if we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, lest we be condemned with the world." It is clear how God requires and does not require punishment.

3) In passing: However, he added that he would like to give a reply (rsxliaars) if Doctor Eck would answer more than is fair.

5) To these words the old translator remarks: "Is dark." But they refer to the citation Ps. 89,31-34, in the just mentioned passage of the sermon.

Fourth, he brings in Augustine, whom Gratianus cited, that God would not allow evil to happen unless, by setting it right through justice, he caused it to be better. I am astonished at the Doctor for patching up these and similar testimonies, since no one denies them or holds the opposite, for I have always disputed only that they boast that by the power of the keys the punishments required by divine justice are abrogated. For I do not believe that this is true, nor will it be proved. For he said not unto Peter [Matt. 16:19], What I bind, that thou shalt loose; but, All that thou shalt loose, that shall be loosed."

Fifth, the "remedy of repentance": It is not enough that one's life is better if one does not also get enough of what has happened through the pain of repentance, through the groaning of humility, through the sacrifice of a shattered heart. I have always wanted all this in the highest way. Why then does one boast that these things are remitted through indulgences, when it is not enough that one mends one's life, and divine justice requires these satisfactions? Therefore, the Doctor boasts in vain that it is not said that you abstain only from sins, but: Ask the Lord for the past ones. And so it is evident that no scripture has yet been cited against me; but I could cite many stronger ones in my favor.

Then he cites Augustine in the Enchiridion: This prayer wholly blots out the small and daily sins; it also blots out those from which the life of the faithful, which has been ungodly led but has been changed for the better by repentance [, departs] 2c. This is what I have said, that the sinner should be repentant after

I am convinced that I am held to the cross and the sufferings of life after my conversion, according to the interpretation of God. A human being cannot annul these, and this testimony again serves for me.

Those who have been for four hundred years, he does not lead, and I like it.

To Cyprianus in the letter to Fidus, where he condemns Therapins for having prematurely given peace to Victor before he had fully repented and made satisfaction to the Lord, he says: "Behold, he says that Victor did not give peace to the church, but to the Lord. I answer: "The Doctor should read and compare Cyprianus well, and he will find that even those whom they had given to peace were given to peace for this reason, even in an early way, so that they might more easily take upon themselves the cross and the martyr's sufferings, which he declares in many letters to be the punishments and scourges for the sins that God has laid upon them. Therefore, Victor has not yet done enough for God in this way, and yet he has done enough, because he has done enough for the Church, which God wants us to hear. For this is contained in the words of Christ, that the church should inflict punishment, since he says [Matt. 16:19.], "All that thou shalt bind." And in this way I could allow that GOD requires punishments which the Church can abrogate because He has made a covenant with her.

The other testimony is that of Cyprian to Cornelius, in which he again writes that the heretics hindered the sinners, so that they would not be enough for the angry God. Although Cyprianus does not speak of penitents there, but of heretics who, as if they were righteous and as if they had done well, excused themselves and defended themselves in their sins, I nevertheless reply to it as to the previous.

Then he added the reason why the church should want to impose a burden on the penitent, if the Lord does not require it? and a long testimony from the Canon alligant. What he states, I pass over everything and say that it is commanded to the church that it should chastise and judge sinners; if it does not do this, God will do it in such a way that he will not remit anything, according to the saying of Paul, which is quoted above from your First Epistle to the Corinthians, Cap. 11, 31. f., and so it cannot be abrogated.

Similarly, in the 31st homily on the Epistle to the Hebrews, he says: Sin is diminished by confession. From this word, the Doctor concludes in this way: it is not diminished as far as guilt is concerned, because it would be ungodly to expect half a remission from God, therefore it is diminished] as far as punishment is concerned. I allow the whole, in accordance with what has been said before.

Now the testimony of Gregorius 4. moralium: Either we pursue them with weeping, or He with judging: hardly anything else, which would be more suitable, could be quoted for me. Likewise also the word of Jerome in the Canon mensurum, of which, however, I doubt that it is that of Jerome. I allow the whole that the Canons do not establish it precisely, therefore I leave it to the discretion of the priest, and I add: much more to the good pleasure of God, who alone is an investigator of spirits and does not judge in ignorance nor with injustice.

I also like the testimony of Augustine c. nullus: In such a way is God's rich mercy distributed that the discipline of justice is not abandoned. This can apply to me and to the Lord Doctor. I pass over it.

Isidore, too, although not a weighty authority in these matters, nevertheless pleases me because he says that the satisfaction of the penitent is paid only to the divine court, not to the human court. Therefore, much less can be remitted by human judgment, since the key of force cannot be effective if there is not first the key of knowledge, who knows what and how much he is remitting.

That with God the punishment is longer than the guilt, according to Augustine, I admit, but without prejudice to the testimony of Paul, Rom. 7,18, who says: "I find in myself, that is in my flesh, nothing good", whose opinion is that the punishment and the sin end at the same time.

So much about the first thesis. 1)

1) This is the fourth of Luther's theses; the fifth follows immediately.

But against the other he says that it is quite obviously wrong and contrary to the custom of the whole church that every priest must absolve the penitent from punishment and from guilt. And this he proves, first, from what he has said, 2) that is, from nothing; second, by the reason that the sacrament of penance is something judicial, and jurisdiction belongs to the passing of a sentence. The jurisdiction, however, is limited to the lower prelates, in order to prevent disorder both in the sinners and in the sinners; secondly, for the abhorrence of offenses, otherwise any village priest would be bishop, archbishop and pope. I answer and say two things: first, that I do not know to this day whether the limitation of this jurisdiction has accomplished what is pretended, namely, the abhorrence of offenses and the taking away of disorder. That is certain, that it has come to be quite otherwise. For the grossest sins are laughed at even in the greatest courts, which could very well be punished in one's own parishes, if the manner had been maintained which the apostles had instituted, and the holy fathers kept, until after the Nicene Concilium. There it was established, and for a long time thereafter kept, that the ecclesiastical districts should not be mixed, and that each one should do penance in his own district. The excellent third letter of Cyprian to Cornelius, the Roman pope, is available on this subject, along with others: For since it is established by all of us, and it is equally fair and just, that every man's cause should be heard where the offense has been committed, and each individual shepherd is assigned a portion of the flock, which each one is to govern and lead, and he must give account to the Lord for his actions, so those whom we preside over must not run about nor break the firm concord of the bishops by their treacherous and deceitful iniquity, but act their things where they can have both accusers and witnesses for their offence 2c. For he speaks of those who had sinned in Africa and had run to the Roman pope Cornelius.

2) 6x (Ziottl has given the old translator: "from sayings". Eck had said: sx iis, yua "äiota sunt.

And such is the custom of the early church in binding and loosing sinners by day.

But since, as the apostle Apost. 20, 17. 28. shows, a bishop and a presbyter are the same thing, and according to Tit. 1, 5. every city should have its own bishop according to divine right, it would be a far more useful way to punish sins if every priest in his parish bound and loosed the penitent, which example the apostle 1 Cor. 5, 3. ff. where he and the Corinthians, present in spirit, handed over the fornicator to Satan and scolded him for not doing it themselves.

But with what right, or with what blessing for the church, this way prescribed by divine right, which has also been in force for such a long time, has been abolished, others may see. Of course, I cannot deny, because we see it before our eyes, that it is done this way, that it is kept this way, that both the sinner and the sins are reserved, and to one soul six or seven shepherds are put on the side, below and above. But whether it should be done this way or whether it is useful, I do not decide. I know that an inferior is obliged to obey the one who restricts and plagues him, though according to no divine right. But the superior, as my thesis says, sins very gravely, if he reserves secret sins without the most well-founded cause. Yes, I still doubt, and, as far as I can conceive, believe that no hidden sin should or could be reserved without sacrilege, and desire to hear the proof to the contrary. Secondly, I say that the church would not perish if the same village priest were bishop, archbishop, and pope, and they alone were bound together by firm concord, as Cyprian says, and as was the custom of the first church. Therefore, I do not care much that it is said that the article was also condemned at the Concilium of Costnitz because of these reservations. This I know, that the custom 1) was approved, and this reservation rejected in the first church and by the disposition of the apostles, and even now, as the quite miserable experience of the church teaches, it would be very useful and salutary to keep sins in check and the

to remove the abominable confusion of all bishoprics that we see today. But for what cause it was changed in its time, I pass over; I find it changeable. I leave this to the discretion of the judges. The hour has passed.

On the fourteenth day of July, early at seven o'clock, Eck continued against the agreement.

Corner.

From the very beginning, the venerable father has boastfully disregarded what I have mentioned, as if what is most against him is least opposed to him. For in the German sermon 2) he wanted to say that there is no transformation of the eternal punishment into a temporal punishment and contradicts the common opinion, as if it could not be proved that God demands any satisfaction except the carrying of the cross, and in the Latin sermon 3) he praises the common saying above all the teaching that has been presented by the scholastic teachers about repentance: "Never do the highest penance," the best penance is a new life, according to his gloss. He himself and his champion added this reason [Ezek. 18:21. f.]: because when the wicked turns away from his iniquity 2c. If He imputes it to a new punishment, how then is it said [his unrighteousness 5) is not remembered? and it is evident that his thesis clearly says that the priest sins who does not absolve from guilt and punishment. I have contradicted this error with the testimonies of the holy fathers, which he wanted to escape and to charm the listeners, as if he alone had the power to interpret the holy scriptures.

For this reason, I have well attracted Augustine against him: It is not enough that one should improve one's life and depart from evil deeds 2c.

3) Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. X, 1224, § 7, add.

4) Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 271, § 6. - The "champion" is Carlstadt.

5) Here the text is not in order. Instead of a sustitia Sua in all editions, the Weimar and the old translator rightly assumed ab iusuKtiuita 8ua. The connection with the following is recognizable from what Eck says in his concluding speech: he has cited the passage in order to show that if the wicked had turned away from his unrighteousness, God still remembers it, not according to guilt, but according to punishment. Therefore, quoruoco ïioitur non reeorOari must be taken as an interrogative sentence directed against Luther. The following then gives the proof that Luther really says so in his thesis.

It is quite clear that the teaching given in the sermon is false, because a new life is not the best penance, since, as Augustine says, it is not enough, and this teaching is also rejected by St. Ambrose in the 2nd book "On Penance", Cap. 5: The apostles taught penance according to Christ's command (magisterium); and afterwards: For he who repents must not only wash away his sin with tears, but also cover and cover his sins with better deeds. The words of the Holy Father are abundantly clear that by doing penance we must cover our sins with better deeds.

But since the testimonies were abundantly clear that GOD does not remit sin unpunished, he took refuge in a whimsical distinction of punishments, whereas he is wont to reject the scholastics for the use of distinctions, and said: the punishment with which GOD wants to punish sin cannot be taken away by a man or by the pope. This is the most false thing and something that destroys the power of the keys (anullativum); for after the transformation of the punishment has taken place in repentance, a man can certainly remove this punishment, according to the very apostle whom the venerable Father quoted, 1 Cor. 11, 31: "If we judged ourselves, we would not be judged by the Lord." Therefore, if we do enough for this punishment, God does not demand another one from us for the sin; otherwise, if God wanted to punish what we punished, then He would punish the same thing twice, which is against the prophet [Ezek. 18, 20].

Moreover, the words of Cyprian, Chrysostom, Gregory, and Jerome were clear that the punishment imposed by the priest for atonement is a punishment owed to GOTte, and so about Victor, because he had not yet fulfilled the imposed penance, it is said by Cyprian that he had not yet done enough to GOTte. Theodorus also testifies to this in his penitential book (penitentiali), which Beda follows almost from word to word, although perhaps these sources are not sufficient for him either, just as little as Isidorus. Therefore, whatever he may say with his mouth that all testimonies serve him, he must necessarily disagree in his heart, since these testimonies overturn his teaching and his thesis. For if a priest sins by not absolving himself from punishment and guilt, then the bishops would also have sinned, since they did not absolve the Victor from punishment and guilt, and all the priests in of the whole Christian world who do not absolve 1) except the indulgence.

And it does not help him that one must carry the cross and that God demands this punishment. For this carrying of the cross is nothing other than the Christian life, as the venerable father himself has explained in a learned way. But in addition to this, one must also do enough for the past and ask the Lord for the past.

My thesis contains nothing about the reservation of cases, but I believe that moderate reservations are useful, which is also experienced by the prelates in the monasteries. I freely confess that I share the wish of Gerson, who at the Concilium of Costnitz advocated the abolition of the excessive reservation of cases, and I especially dislike, as does the Father, such a reservation that has greed as its companion, that is, with which a fine is connected. He says that the Church will not perish if a priest is bishop and pope in his parish. It seems certain to me that if such a corruption of the extremely beautiful ecclesiastical order were to occur, it would also be the overthrow of the Church.

But I want to stay with the main thing that sin does not remain unpunished according to Augustine and Gregory. Therefore, repentance is rightly taught as the third part of repentance, and Augustine has completely proven in the Enchiridion that we do enough through the Lord's Prayer for what we have done ungodly. And, as the venerable Father quite rightly said yesterday, God has made a covenant with the Church; if the Church does not do it, God does. Therefore, I have this doctrine of the scholastics and the preachers, that either we must do enough, or God will require it. Now, if we do enough through our prayers or good works, why could this not also happen when the power of the keys is added, which God has given to His bride, the Church, not in vain? And since according to the opinion of Gregory can. decreto, 2. quaest. 6. the other bishops are called to participate in the care, the pope has the fullness of power, so by the indulgence given by him for the punishment due to sins, enough is done by the payment made from the treasury of the Church, as according to Sixtus the present pope has declared, commanding under the penalty of excommunication that one should teach, hold and preach in this way. Therefore, if the venerable father teaches, preaches or dishe is already banished. But I was pleased that yesterday, in addition to the key of force, he also mentioned the key of knowledge, even though, against the scholastic teachers, he denied in the 7th thesis of his "Explanations" 1) that there are several keys.

I wanted to add this so that future judges would see more clearly what our dispute would be on this point. For if the venerable father stands by the opinion of the teachers I have mentioned, he will not be opposed to the scholastics, the preachers, or me. Therefore, if he wants, he will also be able to state more clearly his opinion on the information for the lords judges.

Martin.

Yesterday I answered these postulations and inconsistencies of the doctor sufficiently, because he repeats the same and always plays the same string like a ridiculous fiddler.

Second, he has not touched the purpose (scopum) of the dispute. For this is not the question of whether God leaves sin unavenged, which I have amply proved, but whether the pope or the church remits the punishments that God demands. He has not proven anything about that; I leave that to the judgment of the judges and all listeners.

Thirdly, he has remained silent today of the holy scripture. Therefore I remain with his first proof of yesterday from I Moses in the 3rd Cap., where he proved that punishments are demanded by God, of which the Scripture shows there that they cannot be remitted. I am sorry that the Herr Doctor penetrates so deeply into the Scriptures as the wasting spider into the water; rather, he seems to flee from it as the devil from the cross. Therefore, with the permission of the venerable fathers, I prefer the prestige of the Scriptures, which I command the future judges to do.

Corner.

The impatient monk has added some buffoonery that goes against theological propriety, about which respectable men may judge; whether I have given the testimonies against him in the right way, the judges will decide.

ter judge. But that this was our object is evident from the 4th thesis: 2) To say that God, by remitting guilt, also remits punishment 2c. This was the stone we had to roll, and because he prefers the prestige of the holy Scriptures to the Fathers, as if he alone, as another oracle of Apollo, had the understanding of the holy Scriptures over the holy Fathers, and apparently cites the testimony which I cited for myself yesterday, I say two things: First, that I have quoted it in order to show that if the ungodly had turned away from his ungodliness, God nevertheless remembers it, not according to guilt, but according to punishment. This proves for the scholastics and the preachers. Secondly, since the venerable father turns this testimony against me, because these punishments imposed by God on Adam's sin could not be remitted by the pope and by a man, this is true, and I admit it, because these are punishments that not only affect the person, but also reach nature. And therefore it is not to be wondered at that these punishments cannot be remitted by a man. But this does not prove that the personal punishments due for sin cannot be remitted by the pope or a priest. But in this I appeal to the judges, and I am ready to change my mind if they can teach me otherwise.

This is finished on July 14 at eight o'clock in the presence of a large crowd of listeners.

To God alone be honor and glory. Anno 1519.

Second Disputation of Mr. D. Eck and Andreas Carlstadt.

Carlstadt started and added something so that one would know what was being particularly argued about.

On Thursday, July 14, Carlstadt began, and, as it were, concluded the previous, after Eck's and Martin's disputation had been finished at about 8 o'clock.

Before we enter into disputation for the second time, the theses 3) must be presented, which the doctor read out right at the beginning of our dispute, so that the judges chosen today will know that the doctor has brought up strange and improper things and has not hit any thesis correctly (vulnerasse), and will only judge that my theses are firm and in accordance with the rules of faith. But they are these: Free will before grace, which is infused through the Holy Spirit, is only able to sin 2c. This is the eleventh. The twelfth: Yes, our will, which is not governed by the divine will, approaches ungodliness the faster, the more eager it is to act. And the fourteenth: Since D. John does not see how a good work is entirely of God, and God's work 2c., in which thesis the monster is not set, which the Doctor has nourished, 1) namely, not entirely, but only entirely.

2) The 4th thesis of Eck, Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 712.

3) These theses are found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 714 ff.

The thirteenth thesis must still be disputed, which is this: that the Lord Doctor, according to his principle, which belongs to his disputators, can do what is in him, that is, take away the bar and that which hinders grace 2c. But I will prove and defend that doing as much as is in one is just as much as sinning, doing evil, displeasing God, lying, boasting 2c.

I wanted to remind our judges that this is why I read the testimonies of the saints from the books, so that they would see that if they were to pronounce against me, they would be judging against the church teachers.

Corner.

Eck thinks that the judges have also read the church teachers, but will have a different understanding from it than D. Carlstadt. For I have also quoted them. So it remains that the judges recognize who has understood them best.

Carlstadt.

The judges will recognize that D. Eck has understood the church teachers against himself. 2)

On the 14th at 2:3 a.m., Eck began to discuss the bolt.

Because we have come so far in the first disputation that the respectable Mr. D. Carl-stadt zugegeben hat, daß der freie Wille auch eine Thätigkeit bei einem guten Werke habe, obwohl er nur von GOtt und der Gnade bewegt worden sei, welche Meinung mit allen Schultheologen stimmt, wie bereits gezeigt und gehandelt worden ist, daher war es nothwendig, sie und mich selbst zu entschuldigen, sowohl in andern Thesen, die gar prahlerisch gesetzt worden find, als auch erstlich in der 13. These, da es heißt: D. Johann kann mit seinem Grundsatz, der seinen Disputatoren angehört, thun, so 2c. This thesis, too, as it is set, is either false, or imposes a different opinion on the school teachers 4) than if in the statement, 5) "what there is, do as much as there is in it" would be contrary to Ezekiel and Ambrose.

Against this I conclude thus: The free will, as it can, when it does what is in it, sin, lie, 2c. so it can, when it does as much as is in it, with the help of grace, do good, earn, avoid sin, according to the holy scriptures and the holy fathers. Therefore, if the schoolteachers say such things, the respectable doctor is putting something wrong on them or has not understood them well. I prove my subordination with the often cited testimony of Augustine: "The beginning of our blessedness is from giving in to God; that we now give room to the wholesome giving in is within our capacity. At least then one does as much as is in him, if he does what is in his power. Chrysostom agrees with this about the Epistle to the Hebrews Cap. 7: You see that we must first purify ourselves from ourselves, and then God purifies us. St. Chrysostom expressly wants us to first do as much as is in us, and then God cleanses us. He is of the same opinion in the 84th homily on Matthew: "Therefore, I ask and implore that you do not put everything to God in such a way that you think you must open your mouths and sleep; and again, that you do not think that your work is done when you are awake. For God does not want to make lazy or sluggish people out of us; therefore He desires something from us, to do what one can do in a good work. St. Bernard clearly testified to the same thing "about grace and free will," where he gives free will the right of attunement and calls it a meritorious means. It is said of someone that he does, as much as is in him, what is in him.

4) Where the word "schoolteacher" is found in this disputation, the school theologians or scholastics are to be understood.

5) Compare Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 708 the 38th sentence of Eck.

is in his power. And attunement is in the power of free will itself.

And furthermore, so that all may miss how improperly the Doctor has drawn me to the matter of free will, so I have put in my note 1) against the venerable Father Martin that the will is the master of his doing. Therefore, he has taken occasion, and has fallen in the most inconsistent way (impertinentissime) on the matter of free will and the choice of grace.

But that I have rightly said, at least without deserving a reprimand, that the will is master, 2) I prove from Gregorius of Nyssa, de lib. arb., where he states that man does and works something, because otherwise he would consult with himself in vain, if he were not master over his doing. He concludes thus: What we can be exhorted to do is within our power; but we are exhorted to good works, therefore good works are within our power. So again it is seen that man can do good if he does as much as is in him, but without ever excluding the help of grace. And so he concludes in 6. 2. that we are masters over our actions. Thus St. Bernard says de lib. arbitr. sol. 11: Free will should strive to control the body as wisdom controls the world. It should rule over all the senses so powerfully that it does not let sin get the upper hand. So also St. Augustine says L. 1. c. 8. de lib. arbitr. that reason rules over the movements of the soul. Therefore, because I first said, according to the opinion of the saints, that the will is master over actions, and in my defense I declared that the will is the master of actions, reckoned against the lower effects, but reckoned as a servant, against the Christ who rules in them, he still accuses me of Pelagius' disloyalty, from which I have always been far removed, only to accuse me of malice.

But he makes the principle of the disputators here one contrary to Ezekiel, although I have expressly declared in Chrysopassus Centur 4. no. 3. that free will does not primarily or first (principaliter) remove the bar or obstacle to grace, but only prepares it (dispositi- tive); and that this preparation is so much as leaving room for the salutary impulse or input.

1) In the 15th movement of Eck's Monomachy. Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 693.

2) voluntuttzin should read: ckomr'namr V0-luntatsna.

If he had not read with a censorious mind, he would have found Cent. 3. no. 60. that doing good in itself is never without a divine preceding impulse, as he expressly explains there about Ezekiel, whom he portrays as repugnant to us. For it is clear that he agrees with us: Take away the heart of stone, and give us a heart of flesh; because, as I have said above, the good will is prepared by the Lord, and is made beforehand, and grace makes the will to work aright: but still the will is required to give place or consent. And that means to do as much as is in him. Therefore God says: Make for yourselves a new heart. Therefore, as Origen concludes in L. 3. s. 1. äs principiis, we must put effort and work into our lives and show diligence; and below: For otherwise, if he requires no doing, the commands will certainly seem to be in vain. In vain also would Paul rebuke some for falling away from the truth, and praise others for standing firm in the truth of faith.

Afterwards, in the 15th conclusion, D. Andrew rebukes our watchfulness and endeavor, as I deal much with the election of grace in the Chrysopassus, and yet deny that the passages of the election of grace belong to the works that are to be crowned one day.

It is a very true saying: It is easier to reprove than to improve. For although I know how ill-equipped I am, my mind has always been ready, as it still is, to be instructed and taught by teachers in order to dispel the fog of ignorance. But one can easily see how unlearned he rebuked my sentence, since in the 16th sentence I chastised the Lord Andrew, that therefore, because I would have called the will lord over the actions, he would have drawn it by the hair on the question of the election of grace. 3) So I also said in the 18th sentence: I do not undertake here to defend one of the two parties, because the trade of the election of grace is a foreign matter, which does not belong here at all. Because I had now said that the matter of the election of grace (namely, whether it also depends on us) is something that does not belong to the matter and to our disputation, he has made a fine point of it and wants to accuse me of having denied the testimonies of the election of grace as if they could not at all belong to the works to be crowned.

It is an equally false blasphemy in the 10. 4) sentence,

3) Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XVIII, 694.

4) In Löscher incorrect: kroxos. 16 Cf. St. Louis edition, Vol. X VIII, 690 f.

since he says: I would have read in Bernhard: Put away free will, then there is nothing that can be saved; he reads "what" for "whereby," and puts many things under me falsely, and shows sufficiently with what kind of mind he goes through the church teachers, but makes himself a suspicious falsifier before all lovers of them.

In truth, I sincerely pray to the Most High that he never strike my mind with such blindness as to falsify anything in the holy fathers; as I do not believe that this has yet been proven to me by anyone. And the Herr Doctor say what he will, so I have read so, as I still read what St. Bernard has so. The most careful editions have it so, which the Doctor may look up, so that he does not falsify, since he is still quite new and inexperienced in reading the Church Fathers, as he testifies in his preface to the booklet "On the Justification of the Godless". Therefore, out of brotherly love, we should rather help and exhort each other to the holy study of theology than offend and grieve each other with such mockery and scornful speeches, insults and pointed words. This is said in defense of the school teachers and my words!

Carlstadt.

In the name of Christ, Amen! Although many of the reasons given by the doctor can be refuted by the fact that the school teachers, who do so much for us, are in complete disagreement with the church teachers, we will nevertheless look at the doctor's speeches one after the other in brief.

In the first place, since he says: I would have granted free will an efficacy, I do not deny such; but in the way as in the foregoing, namely by grace, an alien one, and which comes from God.

As for the other, since he blames me for having put something wrong on the school teachers, I answer that this is wrongly blamed on me, and that the excellent Doctor in his 38th sentence of the second note 1) has clearly described what it is to do as much as is in us, whose words are thus: Since "to do what is in him" is, according to the most established theologians' opinion, as much as to take away the bar and hindrance of grace, I will not concede that he who does as much as is in him does what displeases God 2c., from which words it clearly follows that the hindrance of grace is taken away by us; for otherwise he would have said that to do,

What is by grace is as much as taking away the hindrance of grace. And no church teacher doubts this opinion, namely that grace takes away evil merits, evil will and obstacles to grace. However, according to these same church teachers, it does not mean that we do as much as is in us when we work by grace. For Augustine "of true innocence" says Cap. 150: This means to live according to ourselves and to do what we do evil. His words are: If a man lives according to himself, and not according to God, he is like the devil; therefore also an angel must not live according to an angel, but according to God, in order that he may exist in the truth. Behold! the text is clear that he who lives after himself is like the devil and a liar, which Augustine also says from the articles wrongly applied to him, Cap. 7, of whom there is so much in him. Thus he also says principiis. 1. 26.: Everything good that we have, we have from our Creator; but if that is in us which we ourselves have done, we shall be condemned thereby; but if that which God has done, we shall be crowned. From this it follows that God gives condemnation to the man who does what is in him, but the crown to him who does what is of God. And if this was the opinion of the Lord Doctor, he should have added what Augustine was not ashamed to add, then I would know the dear Lord's gratitude that he thus held with me and talked with me. The same Augustine *de ver. inno-*cent. cap. 322. says: "No one has anything of his own but sin and lies; but if man has anything of truth and righteousness, he has it from the source, which is Christ. But what we have from God, the Giver, is based on God's power and not on our ability. This Augustine clearly wrote "of the merits of sin" lib. 2. cap. 5.

But the school teachers say that "doing as much as is in one" precedes the infusion of grace. But if anyone has said that grace alone takes away the hindrance of grace, he is not to be punished, but accepted. And this is the answer to the third and fourth points.

Of Chrysostom I say that he must be read with care; indeed, if he thinks that the beginning of purification before grace is in us, one must keep it not with him, but with Augustine, who has become more approved by the heretics' examination. Yes, the excellent Doctor called Augustine the prince of the theologians.

1) St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, '708.

To the sixth, of the attunement that Bernard attaches to free will, I say that the same Bernard writes expressly that such attunement is also from God, as is also the effort. And herewith I answer him also to the ninth, although Bernhardus' sayings are good, but do not rhyme with the present matter.

Seventhly, since the excellent Doctor accuses me of having drawn him to the matter of free will, since he has only set that the will is master over his actions, the answer is: I have nothing to do with his propositions, but if the gentleman finds himself complained of, he can write against it as soon as possible.

Eighth, that Gregory of Nyssa introduces man as doing and acting: I do not know whether his reputation is so great that I must be subject to it, whether he would be of a different opinion, because I know nothing about him. But I have said before that the free will does the deed, that is, acts, when it has previously received the divine deed or effect.

Tenthly, I say on Augustine of the free will that the same Augustine has clearly explained himself in the following books, namely "Of the merits of sins" lib. 2, where he speaks: that the free will, even if it has been renewed by grace, has no power over the members of the body, except that it does not surrender the members to the sin that is in man. So also in the book "Revocations".

Eleventh, because the excellent Doctor says that he wrote in his Chrysopassus, I do not know in which Centuria, that free will does not mainly or primarily take away the bar, but grace itself: so I request to be instructed by the Doctor what it is, to primarily take away or to take away the whole bar. I say that what is chiefly of grace is not to be ascribed to us, but to God, as appears from the sayings of Augustine lib. de ver. innocent, which have been quoted.

Twelfth, the Doctor said that the divine impulse comes before the disposition to grace. I fear that if this divine instinct is distinguished from the grace that makes the wicked righteous, the excellent doctor will defend the cloak in which the Pelagians wrap themselves, who come in sheep's clothing and are inwardly ravening wolves.

Thirteenth, that he says Ezekiel is not repugnant to him, pleases me well, if it is true what he says. I wanted us to agree on the truth; but in his drawn conclusion he does not say that this is by grace, namely, to remove the obstacle of grace. If, therefore, he means this, he adds this little bell, and destroys or affirms his conclusion. I will gladly speak to the excellent Doctor as the Scripture speaks, which says: And I will, says God, take away the stony heart from your flesh. He does not say: You will take away; but: I will take away, Ezek. 36.

And do not let him draw Ezekiel from another place, where we are commanded: Make for yourselves a new heart. For when the Scriptures exhort us, remind us, command us, and command us, they show what we should ask, and what we should desire that he would give. Therefore we pray: Thy will be done; likewise: Do in us what you rightly require: Make us obey your reminders and commands.

Fourteenthly, I do not accept what is quoted from Origen, and answer as to Chrysostom. For Origen in the book Peri Archon seems to give our will much that Augustine denies.

Fifteenth, when the excellent Doctor says: I would have blamed his effort and diligence, because I would have denied that the testimonies, which belong to the works, belonged to the election of grace 2c., I answer: This does not belong to our intention, which, according to the comparison made, is set in its bounds and limits.

To the saying, where he says: Reproving is easier than making better, I answer: it is a common plague, against which the excellent doctor also needs medicine and a remedy, and it would be desirable that he does not let it affect him. For he says that I have rebuked him in an unlearned way, which still depends on a judicial pronouncement.

For everything else, which has not yet been answered by what has just been said, I refer the reader to the protective speech 1) of the excellent doctor and to my own.

Finally, that he advances (obtrudes) my booklet "On the Justification of the Wicked" to me, I do not greatly respect. For he does not do it for the better, but perhaps only to spoil the time.

Corner.

I believe that the most proven school teachers do not disagree with the Holy [Church] Fathers.

1) Both Eck's and Carlstadt's writing can be found in Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 632 ff.

That he opposes the 38th proposition to me, he does not see what I have begun to argue about. For the will can do as much as is in it for evil; and this it has primarily from itself. And so Augustine speaks. But another is to do what is in him for good; and of this I have said in the sentence that both good and evil are in our power, Ecclesiastes 15. But evil is more in our power, because we cannot do good without God's help. That is why Augustine says cap. 150. de ver. inno- cent. not badly of life after us, but in a unified way, and not after God. Therefore one must take the understanding of the sayings according to the thing, of which is spoken. Therefore, since we have spoken of merits, he should understand the conclusion of doing as much as is in us for good, which we have taught from Augustine, on which the Lord Doctor has said nothing.

Here you can see his opinion about Chrysostom, and in what honor he holds not only the scholastics, but also the church fathers. Chrysostom, he says, must be read carefully; Nyssenus, he says, is not so great to him that he must bend his neck under him. Perhaps because he has a hard neck. Chrysostom does not contradict Augustine, who teaches the same thing de perf. just. There he asks for just the 2c. Since he holds Augustine higher than Chrysostom because he was trained by the heretics, I oppose him to Jerome against Pelagius, who attributes to us the beginning of the good work, but to God the completion, and that in the very Scripture, since he refuted the Pelagians. What, then, can he say against Jerome, who crushes the heretics, who is much clearer than Chrysostom? And Bernhardus de grat. et lib. arb. talks about keeping the commandments in the same way as Chrysostom.

On St. Bernard he has also attracted him that such attunement is also from God. I confess it, but partly.

With regard to the sentence, he asked me to write against it. I am now discussing it for the purpose of putting an end to the defamatory letter, as can be seen from the defense and the letters written to the most illustrious prince and the university.

To Augustine de lib. arb. he says nothing right, but only so much that he [Augustine] had declared himself in the book of forgiveness of sins; since Augustine also after this book de peccator, meritis wrote the books of recantation, and did not recant the saying which I attracted; therefore he should have answered it.

After that he wants to be instructed what that is: to push away the bar in the first place. I have said that whoever does not know what is the principal and what is the incidental, what is the less principal and what is the directing, I do not know what else he can know. The most important thing in actions, which directs something else, either gives the efficacy, or enters in as a further acting cause. Therefore, grace primarily and powerfully does away with sin in the third degree taught by Augustine, but free will does away with it in the other degree, Augustine unanimously preparatory (dispositive).

That he praises me that I now keep it with the church, one sees from it that it has happened all the time in the Chrysopassus. But I should have added a gloss to it. If he had read our defense in theological love, he would have found the gloss with the text in the 23rd sentence 1) ad not. 2. For I freely confess that no meritorious good work 2) is ever done without the special assistance of divine grace and mercy.

That he fears that I would walk under Pelagius' dress, if the previous preparation should not be the grace that justifies it, he has not said anything about it. I therefore only excuse myself with the fact that I am a little sheep at the moment and do not know of any wolves.

However, I think that this is according to Augustine's meaning, that the beginning of salvation is the grace and the drive of grace, which justifies; only in the third degree, which Augustine has set, grace is given, which is the right love; so that the first grace is the preceding, the other the cooperating.

From Ezekiel I have always said, and the school teachers admit it, that all good works are attributed to God: What do you have that you have not received? but this does not cancel the participation of the free will that receives help from grace.

It is true of Origen that in the book ās princip. [or Peri Archon] he has put some erroneous things, therefore St. Jerome has sifted these books; but he has left the attracted passage untouched as catholic. Therefore, the respectable doctor sees that my opinion has always been that the free will has for itself only the capacity for evil, and can never of itself do anything good, if grace does not help it, awaken it, pull and drive it. Therefore, we are with regard to the dignity of grace, against the nefarious Pelagians, have never been at odds with each other. And by this I want to have explained my opinion, and at the same time to have excused the school teachers in the matter of the bar.

Carlstadt.

On the first point, namely, what opinion the school teachers have, I refer the reader to the questions dealing with the effectiveness of free will and with imperfect and right repentance (de attritione et contritione).

On the other hand, and on the fourteenth, I like what was also the last speech of the doctor, that the free will of itself is not able to do anything good, if grace does not raise it, pull it and drive it. That is a beautiful and true statement. God be praised for it!

I also like the fact that the preceding inclination is also from justifying grace. However, I would like us to do away with this name and use instead a word that the Holy Spirit speaks to us in Scripture.

For the third, I also like the fact that doing as much as is in one, in and of itself, if one does not look to God, is nothing other than sinning.

To Jerome I say, as in the previous disputation, that he uses the apostle's passage Phil. 2: It is God who works in us both willing and doing. Willing, however, is the first and the beginning of good works, so that the church teachers say that God works in us without us.

To Bernhardus of the consent, because he says it is partly from God 2c., I answer that he is wrongly attracted; he speaks rather that the whole consent is from God and entirely in the free will.

To the twelfth, that mainly to take away the bolt is as much as to give effectiveness to the free will. It is not such a great inconvenience to speak in this way, if it were only common in Scripture. Of other things you will interpret it for the best.

In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ! The second thesis of the excellent Doctor, which is proud, ungodly, blasphemous and heretical, since he does not follow the revealed passages of the Scriptures and the

If the prayer of the church is repugnant to him, I want to attack him in order to destroy him, not with cunning or false presentation of testimonies, nor with deceitful insolence, or gossipy whispering, as the excellent doctor is wont to do.

Against his second thesis, 1) which begins thus: Although venial sins are daily, we deny that the righteous man always sins in a good work, even though he may well die 2c. I oppose this with the passage from Ecclesiastes Cap. 7, where it says: There is no righteous man on earth who does good and does not sin. The text is clear that he who does good sins. But the thesis of the Doctor is contrary to this passage; therefore it is heretical. Therefore, the Doctor answers.

Corner.

In your name, sweet Jesus, amen! Against my entirely Christian proposition, the audacious Father, who has forgotten theological propriety and follows only his head, has cited a passage from Ecclesiastes 7, and says that my thesis is contrary to it.

I answer: my conclusion is so founded in truth that he who strives against it must necessarily be suspected of falsehood. And the quoted text is not at all contrary to my conclusion, if one takes it in the wrong sense. Therefore I confess that there is no man who does good, because such a man also sins, but then he does not always sin when he does a good work; which he will find nowhere, neither in the holy Scriptures nor in the holy Fathers. And that this is the opinion of Scripture, and that it has reason, for this I cite St. Jerome lib. I. contra Jovinian. sol. 14: Not that they sinned at all times, but only at times. Jerome proves it there with this, because man is subject to vices in this life. And the gloss between the lines cites as a passage consistent with this: For they have all sinned and lack the glory of God. Therefore the wise man thinks that the man who does something good also sins from time to time. And that this is the true and catholic understanding of Scripture, but not the one that D. Andreas, after his audacity, drew from it, for this I attribute to him Augustine, who steps on his neck, lib. 2. de peccator. remiss. cap. 20 From this it can be seen that, although there could have been one in this life who would have increased so much in virtue, and come to such fullness of righteousness, that he would have been able to live through-

If he had no sin, there could be no doubt that he had been a sinner before he was converted to this new life. Therefore, this is the unanimous opinion of the holy Scriptures and the first saints, that no one is so righteous who does good that he does not also sin or have sinned at times; for he wants to say and blaspheme quite ungodly that St. Lawrence was on the grate, and St. Andrew and St. Peter on the cross. Peter sinned on the cross, when the church sings the word of the Psalm of St. Lawrence, Ps. 17:3 [Vulg.]: 1) Thou hast purified me in the fire, and there is no unrighteousness found in me 2c. Therefore let D. Therefore let D. Andrew cease from his insolent blasphemy, and seek the truth, as befits a righteous theologian, with honorable argument in words in such a way that he may find it.

Carlstadt.

Since the doctor confesses: it is not a man who does good that he does not sin, but then does not sin all the time when he does a good work: so I oppose him about the very scripture passage with Ambrose's words de poenit: that the scripture, which speaks generally, must not be limited by human wit, but must be understood generally. The above-mentioned text Ecclesiastes 7 speaks generally, without any limitation: There is no righteous man who does good and does not sin; it does not say: sometimes, 2) it does not say: afterwards, but par excellence: who does good and does not sin; therefore, it must also be understood in a general way by everyone who does good.

And it does not hinder what has been quoted from Augustine, for for Augustine's understanding I refer the judges to the preceding and following chapters in lib. 2. de peccatorum meritis, likewise also to cap. 6. de spiritu et litera; to the book de perfectione justi, it will be easy to see from this that the excellent doctor either attracts Augustine wrongly or does not understand him.

Whether Jerome was rightly attracted, I will look into it. This much I know that Jerome in the book "Against Pelagius" took this passage without restriction and added some others, from which it can be concluded that man sins when he does well. For he uses David's testimony Ps. 143, 2, where we read thus: And enter not into judgment with thy Servant, for before you no living person is righteous; or as it reads according to the Hebrew, Let me not come into judgment; because the word xxxxx 3) according to some Hebrews is a verbum transitivum Of the other or third order; that is, Make me not come into judgment, because before you no one will be justified 2c. Behold! the text is clear that David, who has the testimony of holiness, nevertheless does not want to come into the divine judgment, because before him no living person will be justified. But if the Doctor's gloss were correct, it would follow that the righteous could and would go to the judgment of God without fear and trembling, namely when he does a good work and does not sin. But what an impudent speech this is, that the righteous want to go before God's judgment and be judged, is known to all who understand the Holy Scriptures.

Afterwards, what the doctor has concluded about Laurentius, Andrew and Peter, will then get its justification, when one will deal with the death of the saints. But this I add, what is the voice of the martyrs, as Augustine says Ps. 116,11: All men are liars. This voice the holy martyrs bring forward, if not with the mouth, nevertheless with the heart. Therefore Christ, when he was about to go to his death, said, "Lord, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; yet not as I will, but as thou wilt." He took upon Himself this defect of the reluctant will of nature in the martyrs who die for Christ, and, as Augustine says, erased it, so that God does not impute this unwillingness to the holy martyrs, even though it is in them.

And is it not contrary to what is written in the Psalm: "There is no injustice found in me"; because the fire of tribulation and persecution wipes out sin. However, injustice can be taken for a gross crime, as Augustine says Ps. 119, 69 [Vulg.]. And if someone wanted to, he could reply to the psalmist's passage: that the righteous, even in good works, sin at the same time, and at the same time, and in the same deed, when they do good. This is clear from the words of Asaph, Ps. 80:5: "O Lord, God of hosts, how long are you angry with the prayer of your servant? Behold, the servant of the LORD, who is righteous, says that God is angry with his prayer. But since the prayer of the righteous, such a valid and holy work, which Christ has so often commanded, is nevertheless subject to God's wrath, who is to say that in other good works the Lord is not angry?

or some of them, are not sins for which the Lord is angry? And does not prevent that in Hebrew it says: time, because he can avoid sin for a while. And since How long wilt thou smoke? because it is an obscure he introduces the Psalmist with splendid words, how way of speaking, and the smoke of God in Hebrew he does not dare to go into judgment before God, the signifies wrath, as the Septuagint has given it. new interpreter of the Scriptures can see Jerome Likewise Cassianus, of the will to do good and evil, drawing on St. David lib. 2. contra Jovin, since he has cited this in a previous passage.

Corner.

Having heard my refutation, D. Andrew turns to the mendicimony, that is, to the general rule, as philosophers, when they cannot go further, turn to the first principal cause, and cites Ambrose de posnit. that the Scriptures, when they speak in a general way, are also to be understood in a general way. I answer: It is true, and I also take the words of the preacher in a general way, that he speaks of all the righteous; but that he wants to transfer what is said of the totality of the assumed cases to the totality of the time, he does this as a sophist who does not have the understanding of Scripture and does not understand its way of speaking.

He directed the judges to the book de perfect. just. and to the 2nd book de inerit, peccator. I will not live if either in these books or in all the works of Augustine it is ever found in one place that the just man always sins in every good work.

That he says that I have misquoted Augustine, he does me an injustice, because neither he nor anyone else can present me with a testimony in this disputation that I cannot show in the original writings themselves; and so he did not answer Augustine, but sent us into April.

Furthermore, since he wants to think about Jerome, he cites another passage of Jerome against Pelagius, who refers to other passages, also to David himself, although of a saint, but who is not allowed to go into judgment, according to Ps. 143, 2: "Do not go into judgment with your servant"; from this he says that it is to be concluded that the righteous sins in every good work. I say that Jerome never thought of this, nor is it found anywhere in him, that the righteous sins in every good work, but it is drawn from his words by dreams. And that this is true, I cite Jerome in the very same second book contra Pelag. where he says: He who is careful and cautious can avoid sin for a time.

says: David, the chosen man after the heart of the Lord, who has done all his will, and who was allowed to say: Judge me, O God, because I walk in innocence; behold, David has desired judgment according to his innocence. Therefore, if I would insist on answering in the doctor's way, that is, by giving examples, the matter would already be done. But one must open the understanding of Scripture, which the Holy Spirit requires, and not get stuck on the outward bark of the words according to the letter after the Jewish manner under Christian skin, as he falsely interprets me in the first thesis 1). Accordingly, I say according to the holy fathers' opinion that these two passages of the psalmist are not disagreeable. For in one of them he asks to be called to judgment, according to a mild righteousness, of which the apostle 2 Tim. 4, 8. said:

"Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will give me at that day." And the same lenient righteousness is fitting for the householder Matt. 20:4: "Go ye also into my vineyard, and whatsoever shall be right, that will I give you." And to the Colossians 1:12:

"He hath made us fit (worthy) for the inheritance of the saints in light." Behold, this is the gracious righteousness after which the righteous cry unto the Lord: Judge me, O Lord.

But there is another, strict justice, according to which David, although just, did not want to be called to judgment, because after the same no living person will be justified before him. And so Augustine 9th Confessionum cap. ult. says: Neither is the life of men praiseworthy, if it be examined by thee without mercy. But because you do not so much seek iniquity, we confidently hope that with you there will be a place for forgiveness. Therefore, what has been mentioned does not help the Lord Andrew at all, and he will not show me any church teacher or scholastic who has ever understood it in this way, unless it is a Wittenberg church teacher.

Further, with regard to the saints, he invokes the point as he speaks of the death and decease of the

But say that all the martyrs cry out to God: "All men are liars. But I do not remember that the martyrs ever said it in martyrdom. But this does not serve the purpose, one may also interpret "all men are liars" from vanity and transitoriness, as St. Jerome does when he explains this beautiful saying; or, what agrees more with St. Augustine, by lie understand sin. I say that all martyrs, all saints have been sinners. But how can one conclude: Therefore they have sinned in every good work?

To the Psalm [Ps. 17, 3. Vulg.]: "There is no injustice found in me", he said: injustice sometimes means great crimes.

From Christ, who prayed to his Father: Father, where it is possible 2c., he has assumed that nature and will resist, but has also given us with it the sword to kill his assumption. For I suppose that it is wrong for the saints to sin before death because of such a show, or that because of such a show the love in them decreases, so that the punishment of the purgatory arises from it. And it is an insurmountable proof from this passage and deed of Christ that the righteous, who fears death and has not yet a right will to die, therefore does not sin. Love does not diminish in him because of this, and no shudder arises in him, which would be the punishment of the purgatory, as I could prove with more, but I pass over it.

Finally, at his discretion and with pompous words, he cites the clear text, Ps. 80:5: "O Lord God of hosts, how long wilt thou be angry at the prayer of thy servant?" I wanted D. I would like St. Andrew not to rely on his wisdom, according to the counsel of the wise, but to take the words of the Scriptures in the understanding that the Holy Spirit requires and that the holy fathers have taught, which not to believe, as Boethius says, is foolishness. Therefore, St. Jerome is obviously contrary to the mind of St. Andrew in that he wants God not to be angry when we ask for righteousness; but the man who prays fears from an evil conscience that God will also be angry at prayer. But if he wants an explanation more according to the letter, he takes Cassiodorus, who says that in the Psalm, as before, he asked for the promise of the Savior [Ps. 80, 3. 4.]: "Awaken thy power, and come, let thy face shine" 2c. But he calls him angry because he forgives. He did not say that God was angry at the prayer of the Ge right, because he sinned in good works, but because he delayed giving what he prayed for, and those who are angry tend to delay what they should give. Therefore, he said that God was angry at his prayer, and not according to the opinion that Andrew takes.

Carlstadt.

Because the excellent Mr. Schreier spoils my time with his digressions, so that I cannot get to more important and stronger passages, I do not want to refute his blasphemies because of the shortness of time, but only touch on and refute his useless stories in something.

First, since he says that I am following the useful rule 2c., I answer that this is not the rule of Aristotle or of any philosopher, but of Ambrose. And I confess that it is a benefit for the persons who do good, which also the Doctor has admitted; but he says nothing of the benefit of the works, although the text speaks just as usefully of the persons as of the works. He skips over the works, and speaks only of persons.

Secondly. Since he says: I do not want to live, if my mind 2c., I answer that he says this for the reason that he pulls the minds of the listeners, whether rightly or wrongly, from his side, and I point him to the previously mentioned passage.

Thirdly. Concerning Jerome, since he reproaches me for having first taken time to think things over, it would be nothing inconsistent if I were to act with good caution in such an important matter, which is so necessary for salvation. For we do not seek here to boast of a rich and capable memory or great wit, but to seek the truth.

Fourth. When he says about the Psalm [143, 2.] "Do not go into judgment": Jerome says that man can avoid sins for a while, then I refer again before the judges to the books of Jerome against Pelagius, because they will find what kind of sins Jerome is talking about, and how we are freed from sins or avoid misdeeds by grace, because grace and love cover the multitude of sins.

Fifth. When he cites Jerome contra Jovinianum and the testimony of the Psalm [Ps. 26, 1]: "Judge me, God, as I have walked in innocence," and blows noise, as it were, with this passage, I will first confirm such testimony to him, but not to his cause. And first of all, I am surprised that he has eaten up so many disputing laws, and yet he is not aware of them.

so that he forgets that he always gives examples (instantias) and yet does not refute what has been said. I will add Job's word to the first passage Cap. 13, 18: "When I am judged, I know that I will be found righteous", since Job explicitly says that he will be found righteous when he is judged. But I would that the Lord Doctor understood the innocence of David and the righteousness of Job, so he would soon interpret the testimony for me: "Judge me according to righteousness" 2c. For Job's righteousness is judgment, of which he said shortly before [Job 13:15. f.], "Yet will I punish my ways before him, and yet he shall be my Savior." For no hypocrite comes before him. According to this righteousness, since Job judges, recognizes, and condemns his sin, he wants to be judged, and even if he is already judged, he will be found righteous. This is what David says, that truth grows from the earth, and righteousness looks from heaven. When truth, that is, confession of sins, arises in a man, then righteousness, which makes a man righteous, looks from heaven. Which the apostle says Cor. 11, 31], "If we judge ourselves, we shall not be judged of the Lord." And John in his canonical epistle [1 Jn. 1, 9.], "If we confess our sin, he is just to remit it to us." Therefore, when man judges his sins, the justifying and merciful GOD remits iniquity. So also David had the innocence that his sin was always before him, and that he confessed his sins to GOD. And according to this innocence he wants to be judged in his righteousness. But what righteousness does he mean? The Psalmist may answer us [Ps. 94, 14. f.]: "The LORD will not forsake His people until justice returns to judgment", that is, if the people of GOD from long ages (a diu) submit their righteousnesses to the right judgment, they will not be forsaken; yes, they confidently ask that the LORD judge them! So the testimony given by the Lord is for me, namely, that David asks to be judged according to his righteousness, according to the innocence of his deeds. On the other hand, since he says Ps. 119:26: "I tell you my ways, and you have saved me," 2c., David's righteousnesses had sins for this very reason.

Sixth. Concerning the testimony 2 Tim. 4, 8: "The crown of righteousness is laid up for me" 2c., and the similitude [Matth. 20, 4]: "Go ye also into the vineyard" 2c., and the passage [Col. 1, 12]: "He hath made us proficient" 2c., I answer that the Lord Doctor has given this testimonies only to digress. For we do not ask how good works are rewarded, but this is what the matter is about, how sins are in good works? But if anyone nevertheless wants to see Augustine's meaning, let him read Augustine de grat. et lib. arb. cap.16., where he says that God crowns his gifts.

Seventh. If the Doctor invents a new justice, according to which he says that David does not want to be judged, then for the sake of brevity I refer the judges to the book de perfect. justit. where Augustine says enough about justice.

On Augustine's 9th Cofessionurn, in the last chapter, where he says: Where thou without mercy investigatest sins; so this passage of Augustine is against him who adduces it, and a Goliath's sword, because it expressly says: There are sins in works, and therefore he confidently hopes in the mercy of GOD; as also Christ says [Luc. 5, 31. f.]: "The healthy have no need of the physician, but the sick; I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners."

Eighthly, he says: that I could not show a church teacher who had ever understood it as I do, unless I spent a Wittenberg scholastic. I would answer the doctor enough if I did not spare the Ingolstadt University. But that my understanding is proven, I refer to the passages cited, and add what Augustine wrote about Jacob's saying to Jerome.

Ninth. Since he says that he does not remember that the martyrs say: All men are liars; so I say: This is a sign that he has not read Augustine diligently.

Tenth. Since he says: I would have brought the sword myself, so that he would tear off my head, that I have passed off the opposition of nature and will for sin, he shows sufficiently that he does not understand where the sins in good works come from. They do not arise from grace, but from sin, which is in man, and is called the law of the members. According to this law, says Christ, the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak; and Paul Rom. 7:23: "I see another law in my members, which opposeth the law of my mind, and taketh me captive in the law of sins, which law of sins is in my members." Because of this law, says Paul, he is led captive and torn to where he does not want to be; and further on....

V. 18 f.: "I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwells no good thing. I may will, but I do not find the doing of good. For I do not do the good that I will." See, here Paul expressly says that he wants the good, that he wants to keep the commandments of God, to die for Christ, as Augustine explains; but he does not find the accomplishment, because there is a reluctance of the will, which is opposed to the good will. From this it is clear that the saints, even if they will well, still do evil, that is, they feel evil desires in nature, which will not cease as long as mortality still covers us; but when death will be swallowed up in victory, then the good will be without evil desire, then there will be willing and accomplishing. This accomplishment we do not find now, nor has any saint found it, except Christ and His Mother.

Eleventh. Since he answers to the passage [Ps. 80, 5]: "How long are you angry" 2c., he has opposed Jerome, who says: that one is afraid of God because of an evil conscience. This passage is for us, because the conscience of guilt really presupposes guilt and wrongdoing, otherwise it would be a false conscience. But let the Lord Doctor and the chosen judges look up Augustine, since he wrote this verse: "over the prayer of thy servant" 2c., then they will easily have the understanding of it.

By the way, I cannot be surprised enough at the Doctor's cunning, who has the main thing here. I wanted to know the cause and the difference, why, since prayer is such a blessed and holy good, which Christ has so perfectly commanded, is God nevertheless angry with the prayer of the righteous? Why do we deny sin and injustice in such works?

But that the Lord Doctor may see that I also follow the church in this, I put on the church prayer, because it says: In our righteousness we do not trust. So this mistrust arises from evil, from error. These are words of the church: since we do not rely on our justice. There is more missing.

On that very day at 2 o'clock Carlstadt resumed the disputation.

For according to Augustine against Julianus lib. 4. cap. 3, what is good cannot displease a good man. Therefore, if the works of a saint are without sin, it is reasonable to have confidence in them. But that this is false is evident.

from another prayer of the church, where she says: God, who sees that we have no confidence in any work 2c. And elsewhere: that we sin without ceasing 2c. Therefore the members of the holy church sin all the time, even if they do good, otherwise it would be wrong what is said here, that we sin without ceasing, and that we 'have no confidence in any of our works. This is what Isaiah Cap. 64, 6. said, "And all our righteousnesses like an unclean garment," where the text is clear that all our righteousnesses, that is, all the works of our righteousness are like the garment of an unclean woman. Therefore they have uncleanness. And he says significantly "all our righteousnesses," and excludes no righteousnesses from it. Cassianus explained this very beautifully about wanting good and doing evil. Job Cap. 9:30. f. also says this: "Though I wash myself with snow-water, and my hands shine like pure [springs], yet thou wilt dip me in dung." Augustine reads: Hast thou yet dunked me 2c. As if he were saying: All works are dipped in filth. But what else can we understand by filth but sins? Therefore Job says very well in the 9th chapter, v. 20: "If I want to justify myself, my mouth will condemn me. If I will show myself innocent, it will prove me ungodly." Behold! the holy, righteous, and patient Job, to whom God has given a testimony of His holiness, says, "If I will justify myself, my mouth will condemn me." Hence he says below, v.28. [Vulg.], "I shrink from all my works, knowing that if I sinned, thou wouldst not spare mine." What has the righteous to fear in good works, if there be no sin in them? Therefore Paul says Gal. 5:17: "The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, the Spirit against the flesh: for these are contrary one to another." Augustine in lid. hypogn. says: It is a constant and fierce war between the flesh and the spirit, as the wise man [Sir. 40, 1.] says: "A heavy yoke upon all the children of men from the day of their going forth until the day of their return to the mother of all." Here the text is clear that the spirit always fights against the flesh, and as often as the spirit works good, the flesh then resists, in such a way that under such struggle the spirit must inevitably become weak and thus defiled, as Augustine says against Julianus lib. 3. cap. 6. and from the words of the apostle serm. 3. a. c. d.. and serm. 10. shows. If therefore the righteous, in wanting to do good works, cannot come about as he should and wants to, as the apostle expressly says says [Gal. 5,17]: "That you do not do what you want" 2c., so the righteous must necessarily sin, if they do not do what they should and want. I ask the judges to judge according to what we have stated, and to look carefully at the intention of these attracted experts.

Corner.

1) In the reply, the respectable Doctor continued to defend his general rule, which is that of St. Ambrose, as I have known it for a long time. But he wanted to extend it, as well applied, to the generality of works. This extension, which is not approved by any holy teacher as far as the works are concerned, I do not allow, because the affirmations about the works are narrower, but the negations wider. Otherwise, the affirmative commandments would bind forever, which would be for the lazy peasants who like to celebrate the holidays . .

He apologized: it would be good for him to be prepared and armed. I did not reject this in a cautious man, but a good fighter also knows how to help himself immediately on the battlefield (in arena consilium accipit).

Because of Augustine he referred to the judges, but he did not bring forward a word of Augustine, that is why I pass it over.

Jerome, whom I dressed perfectly well, he refers to the judges, who would find it right.

Finally, since I had drawn two passages from David that seem to be in conflict with each other, he wants to show that the literal (grammaticus) mind is not enough to grasp the meaning of Scripture (I pass over his joke), and the respectable doctor puffs himself up enormously by explaining long and wide in an unseemly way what kind of righteousness David had, for the sake of which he had asked not to go into judgment before the Lord, but to judge himself and his sins himself. Thus he also spoke of the righteousness of Job and of the righteousness of David, and: my sin has always been before me, and: the truth comes up out of the earth.

I say: Although this explanation is true in itself, and that all schoolteachers and preachers from four hundred years ago have taught that if the sinful man in himself has righteousness 2) through repentance

1) In the manuscript it says: "Not without disgust and annoyance I repeat the things of D. Andreas and answer.

2) Instead of justitia, justitiam will be read.

and then God forgives the sins, yes, the school teachers and preachers have concluded with one mouth that repentance is a part of the avenging righteousness: I also say, secondly, that in such a statement of his there is even more contradiction to his conclusion, because he admits that David, when he judges himself, and so also others who judge themselves, are righteous, and therefore does not sin in this good work, because otherwise he would not yet be able to ask that God enter into judgment with him, because of the injustice involved in such his judgment.

Thirdly, because he thinks that what has been mentioned is for him, since in the whole explanation, where David asks in one passage that God judge him according to his righteousness, he still says, trembling before the strict righteousness: "Before you no living man will be righteous", he may extend his general rule here. But I do not want to hold out any longer.

Afterwards, since I had spoken of a double justice, which I also presented from the Holy Scriptures, I referred him to Augustine de perf. justit. because he does not want to accept the school teachers, while he clearly referred to it in 9 Confess. where he speaks of justice and mercy. And there Augustine is not at all at one with the highly respectable Doctor. Although Augustine admits that God does not look for our sins very closely, nowhere does he say that the righteous sin in a good work; although I freely confess that the righteous sometimes sins in a good and meritorious work, namely, that in one who devoutly says mass, or preaches, or gives alms, or bravely disputes, as the venerable doctor does, some conceit arises in the manner of a venial sin. And in this in particular I have never contradicted the doctor. For so says Gregorius lib. I. Moral. that our good works become impure by being stained with the least blemish. And Wilhelmus Parisiensis, that great bishop and beginner (inceptor), as the Chronicle of the Mendicant Hermits testifies, believes that Egyptian bugs and flies often fall into the ointment of prayer and the sacrifice of a contrite heart.

Furthermore, the respectable Doctor says: I would have fallen away from the sin of the good work to that, how the good works should be crowned. I say, with permission, that such was not my intention, but, since he mentioned righteousness, I have shown from the Scriptures that a twofold gift of good works is necessary.

The first chapter of Augustine de grat. et lib. arbitr. is not included here. Therefore, the 16th chapter of Augustine de grat. et lib. arbitr. does not belong here. Moreover, because I said I do not remember it in the legends of the martyrs, that they also cried out in their martyrdom: All men are liars, so he opposes me with Augustine, who is not a martyr but a confessor, who says that the martyrs say this. I say even more that every man must recognize the prophetic truth that all men are liars. If he does not want to believe the prophet, he will learn it once with his damage.

In the 80th Psalm [v. 5], he says, I bravely jumped over the right knot of his citation, because God was angry about prayer, which is so praised and commanded by Christ; thus much more about other good works. There was something special about the prayer because of the Savior's mission; it is also not true that God is angry in Himself, because He is free from these passions, but He only holds Himself as one who is angry. And that has been something special that he has been so long delayed.

Afterwards, since I have said that no church teacher or scholastic would have given this understanding that the righteous sin in all good works, except for the Wittenberg scholastics: I say that the Doctor has become unwilling about this, and has even added threats, which I, because they run contrary to the free conduct, refer to the gentlemen, and now declare myself to have meant by the scholastics in Wittenberg D. Andreas Bodenstein of Carlstadt and the father Martin Luther.

As for the law of the members, which he invoked and the apostle's help, I say that I easily believe everything that has been invoked from the apostle, and for the sake of brevity I pass over the various ways in which this chapter has been interpreted by Origen, Jerome, Augustine, Ambrose, Damascenus and Paulinus. However, I now adopt the latter opinion of Augustine, who has also at times been of the opinion of Pauline, and say that concupiscence, the law of the members, which was sin before baptism, is not sin after baptism, as Augustine lib. I. de nupt. et concupiscent., and especially lib. 16. cap. 5. contra Julian. shows. In short, I say that lust, as the weakness and sickly condition, the law of the members, the law of the flesh, is neither a mortal sin, nor even a venial sin, and is not sin after baptism.

the original sin. And if also, as the indented gloss in said place, in its explanation, sin makes of every desire, that is, as Augustine lib. 6. contra Julian. 5. explains, because it arises from sin and is a punishment of sin, as he states to this: Every one is tempted by his desire, when he is provoked and enticed; afterwards, when the desire has conceived, it gives birth to sin: so in these words birth is certainly distinguished from parturition; for parturition is desire, parturition is sin. But lust does not give birth if it has not conceived. Lust, and does not conceive if it has not provoked, that is, attained attunement to the commission of the evil of the will. And this is to answer what he said about the struggle that is between the flesh and the spirit, which we all experience. But it is not fitting to the matter. 1)

He then cites Job 9:20. ff. which does not presume to justify itself. I answer: Job speaks there of strict righteousness, and as a wise man, because no one knows whether he is worthy of love or hate, like Paul, who was not aware of anything, and yet says that he is not justified in it. Therefore the righteous do well to shun all their works. As Job and St. Gregory say, "It is the way of the pious soul to recognize guilt even where there is none. But he also takes this morsellum (morsellum) with him, that Job Cap. 27, 6. says: "My heart does not bite me for the sake of my whole life." How did he justify himself here?

Furthermore, I thought that he would not omit the passage of Isaiah: that all our righteousness is like that of a sitting woman, or, as another text has it, an unclean woman. I could present him with the interpretation of Jerome, who, as the greatest interpreter of the Bible, says that the prophet speaks of the comparison of the righteousness of the Law and the righteousness of the Gospel. However, I will only give the common one that it is true that when our righteousness is held against the divine righteousness, it becomes unrighteousness because it is imperfect, defective and mutilated, just as the created light, when held against the divine light, is darkness. And that this is true is evident from Luc. 18:19: "No one is good but the one God." Thus Augustine de perf. iust. concludes, and it agrees with Chrysostom and others. For all that is compared to the Creator is not good, nay, is as much as if it were not. Therefore, I take that,

1) Instead of xropositio, read proxostto.

What is said in one place about goodness, in the other place about justice.

Finally, let us conclude with his reproaching me with the little prayers of the church, that we should not have confidence in our good works; and in another collect, that we should not rely on any of our works. I say with my lectures today that by these words not hope, but presumption is taken away; because when we have done everything, we shall still recognize that we are useless servants. So the church constantly recognizes that her children sin, which is why she prays for them. But from no collection or other scripture is it proven that the righteous always sin in every good work, even St. Lawrence on the grate.

For the rest, if I have said or done something unjustly, or out of rashness of tongue, or through ignorance, or through the presumption of human weakness, I ask the most illustrious princes, noble and highly respectable lords, the venerable and highly honored fathers, lords of nobility and scholastics, to forgive me such things, and I also ask the judges to believe that I have done nothing out of an evil mind. I am willing and ready to be instructed and corrected, if I have not reached the true understanding and sense of the Scriptures somewhere. To God alone be the glory I Amen.

Carlstadt.

First, I like the excellent doctor's protestation, because I also testify and ask the same.

But since time is short, and I cannot make my objections to all the particulars, I will only touch upon that by which, as it seems, my friend, the excellent Herr Doctor, has been drawn to my opinion, namely, the answer which he gave to Isaiah, "all our righteousness is," 2c., since the excellent Herr Doctor said in his answer that all our righteousness, if it were held against God's righteousness, would be pure darkness and unrighteousness. This pleases me, and it follows that the righteous, when he does righteousness, always does unrighteousness when it is held against divine righteousness. Praise be to God!

But when he says that according to the church prayer hope is not taken away from good works, but presumption, I would easily agree with him if the church spoke thus: that we presume nothing on good works; but since she says: have no confidence in them, so also seems to have taken the hope away from it.

Finally, I ask the doctor to tell me whether Paul was baptized or not when he wrote the letter to the Romans. If he had been baptized, he does not call lust sin after baptism, since he says: "Now it is not I who do this, but sin that dwells in me. So it is an apostolic testimony that the apostle calls the lust in his flesh sin after baptism. Therefore, no one is to be blamed if he follows and uses the apostolic way of speaking. As far as the other things are concerned, since the masters do not like it, I cannot object to anything else. So let that be the end of it!

Corner.

Ignoring two things, because this has always been undoubted by the school teachers, I recently say three things in response to what one wants to know from me about Paul: first, that Origen, Jerome and Isidore lib. 2. de summ. bon. want the apostle to speak of the habit of sinning that he had under the law, which drove him to evil. Secondly, that Origen considers it probable, and it is also testified by St. Paul to Severus, that the apostle did not speak for himself, but in the person of the weak, which was also Augustine's opinion for some time lib. 16. coiitr. Jul. Cap. Thirdly, I say that it may be that sin is understood here as lust, but sin is taken there for the punishment of sin, as is clear from Augustine lib. 16. contra Julian. cap. 5, and we have said in the foregoing that sin sometimes means as much as the punishment of sin, as when we pray for the dead that they be freed from sin, as John Picus, Count of Mirandola, so learnedly argues in the second thesis of the Apology. Therefore the desire or lust for baptism is called sin, as someone's writing is sometimes called his hand. Therefore, if you consider desire to be sin in the manner now mentioned, I am quite satisfied; but if by sin you understand guilt and imputation, I strive tooth and nail against it.

However, I add this to the resolution: one should not always keep the way of speaking of the holy fathers, just as it has otherwise been extremely common to call Mary Christ's mother, but nevertheless the Concilium of its time decreed that she should no longer be called Christ-bearer, but God-bearer. I submit this again with all that has gone before-my superiors, and I am ready to be proven wrong.

Carlstadt said: I also submit it so.

The disputation was finished Anno 1519, July 15, which was a Friday, about 2 o'clock. After its completion, M. Johann Lange of Lemberg gave thanks in a farewell speech. It ended with the song: HErr GOtt, dich loben wir 2c., was concluded.

putation can be told. July 15, 1519.

This speech of M. Johann Lange, from Löwenberg in Silesia, who was then rector magnificus of the University of Leipzig, was immediately printed in quarto. Later, Löscher included it in his Reformation Acta, Vol. III, p. 580. Löscher gives the above date, according to others, the speech should have been held only on July 16. Luther had already departed before it. (Köstlin, Mart. Luther (3), Vol. I, p. 268.)

Translated into German.

In praise of theological disputation.

1. It is not because I have finally ascended this place elevated above all seats, which is called the chair of learning, most illustrious princes, and other gentlemen who are to be highly honored according to rank, nobility, godliness and scholarship, that I should, for instance, after having diligently listened to such great defenders of truth on this learned battlefield, as a judge of such a learned battle, pass judgment, or in such an important matter, which the most astute minds would find too difficult or very troublesome for themselves, make a pronouncement; and, even if I could, you, according to your great wisdom. did not ask that about

The judges would not easily take on such a heavy burden. For not even the most learned judges would easily take so great a burden upon themselves. For, as Cicero says, all presumption and error in applauding and judging is disgraceful in all other things, but most of all in such things where it must be decided how much to attribute to religion, how much to divine things. For we must be careful that, if we measure everything according to our weak human understanding and our ways, religion does not suffer a disadvantage, or that we do not fall into the superstitions of old women.

2 But that is why I have climbed up to this chair to speak, that I would like to praise this learned fight of highly talented men, and to thank both its commanders and all noble and honest spectators of it, no matter what class they may be. And rightly so. For since the Greeks, since the Romans consecrated images in book halls to Epicurus, who strove to free the minds of men from perverse superstitious fear, carried his likeness in precious stones, paintings and drinking cups buried in rings, and set them up in their rooms, who has so eradicated the superstitions of the ancients, that he has planted against them nefariousness through the doctrine of the monads, has taken away the providence of the holy God, and, so that he would not give his God too much to do, has left everything to blind luck: How much cheaper is it not to reward with honor and thanks those who are so eager to save us from error that the holy truth comes to light and triumphs, and the service of the most high God, who graciously helps all with his providence, is increased, and the dark sayings of the prophets are explained by the bright truth? In addition, there is the ancient decree of the Roman Emperor C. Caligula, who, during a famous battle in the liberal arts and Greek and Latin eloquence, held at the altar of Lugdunum, ordered that the conquered should thank the victors with a eulogy describing the battle.

Since on this disputation field, with such a doubtful dispute, the truth has been so eloquently defended that one does not know exactly in many things who has actually won: so, in order to maintain the example of gratitude ordered by C. Caligula, my most noble Prince George, Duke of Saxony, my most gracious lord, and the heads of this famous high school, have instructed me to that I should take the place of the conquered, i.e., first of all, duly praise the spiritual struggle held for the knowledge of truth, but afterwards, so that we would not leave a stain of ingratitude on us, I would like to pay tribute to the military leaders as well as spectators of the same, as honest men on all sides. Not as if I were such a one, who could flaunt before others with eloquence or delicately set words, but because under my [academic] office, which I administered in the past semester, at the most noble prince's behest and the entire university council, such great men have been given the freedom to debate in this learned arena, but to give you the opportunity to hear.

4 Therefore I will speak to you who give me such a favorable hearing, but I will use such moderation in praise that I will not appear to have spoken in someone's favor or to have praised something thoughtlessly.

5. Now as much as the body, the dark and muddy dungeon of the souls, and (as Plato says) Pluto's cave, is inferior to human minds and souls: so again the exercise of the spirits, which we call disputation, is much more glorious than all exercise of the body; For with this, if it is moderate, the health of the body is preserved intact and the limbs are strengthened, but by this the spirit is made strong, the sharpness of the mind is sharpened, the truth is revealed, and in the most excellent things science is attained, which in human things, as Plutarchus says, is alone an immortal and divine good peculiar to man, by which he surpasses the animals, which otherwise seem to surpass man in many other natural gifts. For the lion surpasses us in strength, the mole, although covered with a bad element of nature, in hearing, the vultures in smell, the eagles and lynxes in face. We, however, are only ahead of them in speech, which is the tool of disputation, and in erudition and sharpness of mind, whose hard whetstone and battlefield is disputation. Therefore, excellent men, it is no wonder that the great expectation of your battle has aroused such a desire and sensation among foreigners that even princes, dukes, abbots, counts, and doctors and masters of the laudable universities of Erfurt and Wittenberg have been summoned, and, despite all the danger and hardship of travel, have gone to this high school of disputation as a free place of good learning.

Arts, have gathered in droves. These have, although they have read the contents of this disputation in both parts protective writings, nevertheless not without reason believed that the oral fight of such sharp minds would have more emphasis. For, as Cicero says, it is certainly not the spirit in the books by which what is acted upon appears greater than when it is read. Pliny also agrees with this saying in these words: Much more is moved, as is commonly said, by the living voice. For although what one reads is still so perceptive, that which the pronunciation, the face, the bearing and position of the speaker at the same time forms in the mind penetrates more deeply. Hence Aeschines at the Rhodians, when he had read Demosthenes' speech for Thesiphon, and the others all became quite rigid and stiff at it, and cast down their eyes to the ground in amazement at the Attic daintiness of Demosthenes, said: Τί δε, εἰ αὐτοῦ του ἡπρίου ἀχηχόειτε; that is,

What would you have said if you had heard the animal itself? And the unknown teacher of the nedic arts from Cadix also drew at home from the lovely milk fountain of Livian eloquence, but came, in spite of this, from far Cadix to Rome, that he might hear the very purest stream of Livius' eloquence flowing and rushing from his own mouth, as from the right spring vein, softly, but nevertheless richly and mildly. Thus also the spectators who came from foreign places, apart from your erudition, which they read in writings, have made the certain hope that they would hear and see much more presently.

6 In my opinion, they did not deceive themselves in their hope, nor did they spend their time badly in this disputation, since in it that truth was eagerly investigated, apart from the knowledge of which nothing is more salutary and honest for Christians for eternal salvation, but nothing is more difficult for the pagans to invent, of which therefore Democritus said that it lies hidden in the deepest cave of the pit. Since Carneades could not dig it out and despaired of finding it, he doubted all judgments of human senses, disputed everything on both sides, and said nothing with certainty. Socrates was so annoyed by his burdensome nature that he exclaimed: "I know so much that I know nothing. That is why this word became common in almost all societies of academics: What is above us is none of our business. But the old philosophers are not alone in cognition.

has been fought. They also did not grant indulgences unduly, but duly considered what sins they would take away or atone for. However, this would perhaps have had even more emphasis if the preacher of the same had stood so bravely on this learned battlefield when he had stayed away from it due to illness. How edifyingly did they not also deal with repentance and the redemption of sins: whether a Christian priest, whoever he might be, could absolve the souls of men from punishment and guilt? and what kind of bar restrains the efficacy of grace in us? Finally, whether one sins in any good work, because one hardly reaches the shadow of divine justice? has been drawn into the important and learned struggle. On these matters, on which the salvation of souls rests, one has not dealt seriously with the captious and ambiguous questions of the sophists, but with the holy scriptures and the testimonies of the holy fathers, on both sides. Where it required a fierce fight, the dispute was finally overshadowed and quieted by the shield of truth, and the peaceable olive branch was held between the swords, and the one who taught softly was yielded to with litter. This is the Socratic modesty in debate, with which Socrates, gifted in Plato's Gorgias, prefers to be punished rather than to punish others, and to reject mocking speeches with a smiling face and a wrinkled nose rather than to revile them again in anger, and to bear patiently the defiant attacks of youth rather than to lash out again, which, as he said, befits asses. For nature has planted this modesty in our hearts, in that, as Plato reports in the Timaeus, she calls the other part of the soul, where the emotions dwell and which has its seat in the breast, the ancient Greeks, from which the violent movements, quarrels and disputes spring. The ancient Greeks called it the breast, from which the violent movements, quarrels and disputes originate, and therefore separated it from the rational soul, which dwells in the head as in the castle, by a small space, that only the neck is between them, and subjected it to reason in such a way that the inclination to quarrel and anger would be conquered by the rule of reason. And what is the use of quarreling with an angry face and fierce courage, with disregard for truth, merely for victory, as it were for house and court? Since victory in such a battle is merely a little glory, but being overcome, that is, by error and ignorance, is not a victory.

The fact that you will be saved is of much greater benefit.

(9) If you look at the place of this battle, it was quite well situated, namely at the far end of the city, completely secluded from all the tumult of the mob, which is hostile to the studies. In addition, you see the place excellently decorated and prepared, which nature has shaded with trees, but the strict Lord Caesar von Pflug with so many seats, with so many artfully embroidered curtains, on which true paintings and pictures are emblazoned, has made it so respectable by his care that it can be compared with the most magnificent show stages of the Roman aediles, M. Scaurus and Marcellus, if not in size, but in decoration.

(10) Since, by the way, all fights are generally made respectable by the bravery, courage and heartiness of the chief fighters, one may also mention the skill and virtues of the chief fencers with glory here. What was lacking in Eck that belongs to a brave defender of truth? How shrewdly he has acted from all objections! How learnedly he refuted many things! How cleverly he supported with his reasons what was refuted, and, as it were, pinned them to each other! One would think that he, like Carneades, could overturn everything and also prove it; he has poured out such a quantity of reasons, as it were, in passing, that Chrysippus would rather lack rows of conclusions heaped one upon the other (sortitarum acervus) than the Eck would lack a quantity of proofs.

The time would be too short for me if I wanted to go through the course of his studies through all the stages of his age, since he had already read all the biblical books, except the prophets, as he had hardly emerged from childhood. He spent his youth under the most excellent teachers of both laws and true theology in such a way that he was finally appointed Doctor of Divinity and Decretology as a young man, with immense applause from the teachers. If one looks at his natural gifts of eloquence, he received by nature everything that L. Crassus demands in an orator, namely the astuteness of the dialecticians, the sayings of the worldly wise, almost the words of the poets, the memory of the legal scholars, the voice of the tragedians, whose bright sound has resounded his words in such a way in our ears that one could have believed that a Pericles aroused a rolling thunder by the stream of his speech, and the orator Trachallus wanted four advocates between four benches of the

1) He means Tetzl, who was ill at the time.

He was only an orator according to his voice, however. What kind of memory he had can be seen from the fact that he was able to recite a large number of interjections almost from word to word with wonderful speed. Cyneas, Pyrrhus' envoy, is praised for being able to name the Roman councilors he had seen once when they appeared before Pyrrhus; Scävola, however, for being able to remember at the board game in which order each of them had moved the pieces in so many moves. But as much as words are more difficult to remember than things, so much richer is Eck in his memory treasure than those. Therefore, highly learned Eck, you have received special praise from those in Bologna that your adversary has not been able to overload your happy memory with a heap of reasons, although he has sought it with diligence.

But who would be so foolhardy as to prefer Johann Eck to the excellent doctor of both law and theology Andreas Carlstadt, or to place the latter above the former, before he understands everything that belongs to it from the bottom up? Carlstadt has done many things worth mentioning in this fight, in that he shoots the arrows of his reasons not so thickly, but all the more surely to the target. As his speech is not only clear and both spiced with wit and tempered by the wise seriousness of a Nestor, it is also completely removed from all make-up and verbosity, which is very annoying to hear. When one considers the variety of erudition in him, one must wonder that his age has sufficed for the learning of all of it. He is so experienced in both rights and so versed in both divine teachings that one must reasonably doubt what he has put the most effort into. This is also worthy of admiration, that since he has astutely kept the middle passages of the holy scriptures together with the front and back ones, he has thereby brought the ambiguous scriptural passages into harmony with each other.

13 But what a sin I would be committing if I were to ignore you, honest Martin! And with what honors shall I praise your erudition, your sharp mind, according to which you seem to understand more than you say, and your steadfastness in investigating the truth? which you, driven around by so many storms of ill-willed people, nevertheless did not want to give way to anyone who did not teach you better? The freedom of your speech is exceedingly sincere and admirable that it is very well suited to the truth. Because this, because it is painted naked, does not want to be shaded with any covers. Therefore the pagans sacrificed to Saturn, the god of time, with bare head, because truth, as a daughter of time, as Sophocles speaks, does not want to be shrouded with any cover, but, as Menander says: Ερχεται τό ἀληθείς εις φως,

Ενίοτε ου ζητουμενον, truth comes sometimes of yourself, unsought, to the day. This has also made known to us, by common rumor, your righteous walk, since you represent a true Augustinian both by scholarship and by your way of life.

14. But, dear sirs, since I cannot praise the intellect, virtues and gifts of such excellent men with my speech, let me be permitted to do the same as the painter Timanthes, who wanted to paint the bloody sacrifice of Jphigenia, and had painted Calchas, the soothsayer of the Trojan war, saddened, Ulysses even more saddened, and Menelaum quite sad, who covered Agamemnon's head with a curtain, because he was not able to express the highest sorrow of the father with the brush. So, since I am not able to express the praise of your virtue with my speech, and time does not permit me to tell everything individually, I will wrap the other in silence, and leave it to the honest listeners to judge with quiet reflection, and to imitate the same.

15 Having accomplished the first part of my intention to some extent, I see that there is nothing left but to thank you, the highborn, noble and highly learned spectators of this battle, for your special kindness, according to the decree of our most noble prince, George, Duke of Saxony 2c. and the superiors of the famous high school here. It is to be marveled at how this nobility looks so favorably upon the most noble prince; as he thinks so favorably of all favors, so must all other princes do the same. That is why the ancients engraved the image of a stork on the scepter of kings and princes, so that by such a symbol the princes would be reminded of both kindness and gratitude. For the storks warm, lift, and care for their old parents when they have grown weak and faint, and gratefully repay them for their sacrifice, hence also the Greeks ἀπό τοῦ πελάργου, that is, from the eyes. Did not the captured lion also prove this to Androclus, a fugitive slave, who pulled a thorn out of the lion's paw and squeezed out the clotted blood in the wound by gently touching it with his fingers and made the wound dry, since he hid it in his cave for three years and kept it from hunting? When he finally escaped from his hiding place, the Romans captured him again. Since he was to be thrown to the wild beasts, the lion gratefully recognized him on the scene in Rome and gave him life, as it were. Thus, in truth, we would be worse than lions and wild beasts if we, who have been edified by your learning and have enjoyed your quarrels, did not thank you sincerely for them.

But from whom shall I begin more cheaply or more blessedly than from the most high and most gracious God, whom the Brahmins, the Pythagoreans and the Academicians implored at the very beginning of their disputation, and also gave Him due thanks at the end? So that we may not be worse in godliness than the pagans, we give thanks to the almighty God, as the most wise master of this world, who, like Moses, fought for us against Amalek at the altar of the cross with outstretched hands, and brought us to freedom from the servitude of the devil. The triumph of this disputation must bring praise, honor and glory to this greatest conqueror of all.

But with what thanks and graceful words shall I praise and extol the most noble Prince and Lord, Duke of Saxony, Margrave of Meissen, Landgrave of Thuringia, the most gracious and mild patron of this high school, as well as his most noble son, the image of his father's high nobility, Johann, Duke of Saxony, whose memory is worthy of eternity? And the Magnificus, Mr. Arnold Wostenfelder, Rector of the noble Leipzig University. Likewise two other illustrious princes, who, although young in years, are already old in early wisdom and heroes in reputation, namely Mr. Barnim of Stettin, most gracious Duke of Pomerania, the Cassubians and the Wendish, and Prince of Rügen? as no less Mr. George, Prince of Anhalt, Count of Ascania, and most gracious Lord in Bernburg? whose frequent attendance sufficiently shows how great love they have for study, by which alone, to say nothing of the other, they have not only gratitude, but the greatest honor.

Since, as Pliny reports, countless kings of old were held in high honor because of scholarship, who, even if they were to be praised, emphasized it more than wealth, because they thought that they could gain immortality and everything enough through it; and after a prince has been learned, he has also always ruled well. In former times the Roman senate unanimously spoke the words in praise of the emperor Tacitus: Who governs better than a learned prince? So may I also, with the gracious permission of such great princes, exclaim in thanksgiving: O blessed people of Saxony, Pomerania and Anhalt, over whom so great disciples, indeed, protectors of the liberal arts rule!

18) Hereupon we give our most just thanks to the most reverend in Christ Fathers and gracious Lords, the Abbot of the Gate, Pegau and Bosau 1), who have adorned this disputation with their highly respectable presence and have obviously proven their grace.

19. And I would be accused of ingratitude if I did not testify to your and my most humble sentiments against the strict and noble Lord Caesar von Pflug, Knight of the Golden River, and the excellent Doctor of Both Rights, Johann Kuchel, the most illustrious Prince's highly trusted and eloquent Privy Councillor; as well as the strict and noble Mr. Georg von Widebach, to whom we are especially indebted that, since they represented the absent most noble prince, they kept this scholarly fight in the best order, that, if disputes arose among the disputants, they ended them with their wise and fine advice in such a way that peace was easily restored among the parties. Plato says in the 4th discussion of his laws that the community would be happy if people like Nestor, the Trojan orator, were in the regiment. But since the men mentioned are people like Nestor in moderation of life, in prudence of old age, and emphatic eloquence, why should I not consider our lands happy if they continue to be governed by their counsel?

20 No one would be less justified in accusing us of ingratitude if we did not want to show our benevolent attitude towards the guests and strangers by expressing our gratitude. We therefore offer our best thanks, and hold ourselves highly bound to the excellent gentlemen of the laudable Erfurt and Wittenberg

University, doctors, masters and students (scholasticis), as well as all others, whatever their rank and dignity, who are to be respected as strangers and guests, who have come here for the love of scholarship and truth, without shying away from the danger and discomfort of the way. As their arrival has been exceedingly pleasant to us, so we thank them also in the best way for it.

Finally, we owe no small debt of gratitude to the wise council in Leipzig for receiving our, indeed, his own guests so graciously and honestly, and for resisting all noise from so many armed men standing around us, thus ensuring that you, defenseless fighters, could fight with confidence, and that I, as it were in a Milonian court, surrounded by armed men, could speak to you safely.

But truly, your beautiful sight and the happy outcome of this dispute make it reasonable that the thanksgiving should also be followed by rejoicing and congratulations. For who is so uneducated that he does not have his heart's desire at such a learned battle and contest of the greatest scholars, and break out into exuberant merriment? Who is so iron and hard of wild pride and hopefulness that he does not take to heart the modesty of such great disputants, in which they have held to themselves as far as possible and have subdued their movements? Who is also so disfavored of other people's good fortune that he does not admire and revere in such great men the sharpness of mind, the strength of memory, and the immense erudition in the Scriptures and the honest conduct with cheerful eyes?

Therefore, all you musicians, wish these great men good luck, applaud them and play a joyful piece. And as you played sweetly in honor of the Holy Spirit at the beginning of the battle, so play again at the end to the praise of God, and thereby praise the Lord!

what kind of adversary he had to deal with, what had actually been argued about, and what outcome the disputation had achieved. August 15, 1519.

In the 18th volume of our edition, we have already included "Luther's explanations of his theses disputed in Leipzig" and mentioned this dedication to Spalatin in the first note, Col. 820. We do not consider it necessary to repeat the locations of our writing given there, and limit ourselves to mentioning that it has since been included in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. II, p. 102. We give here a new translation according to the Weimar edition, Vol. II, 391 ff.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Jesus.

To the pious and learned man, Mr. Georg Spalatin, of the most illustrious Prince Frederick of Saxony, Elector of the Empire and of the same Vicarius 2c, Librarian and Court Preacher, his dear friend Heil!

You desire, dear Spalatin, to know the history of this famous disputation, which we held in Leipzig, probably most of all because you have heard that our Eck and some people of Eck's party have long and surely been triumphant and singing songs of victory. I will certainly rejoice and give thanks if the victory is as true as their boast is great. For what is more to be desired by Christians, especially theologians, than that truth should triumph and error be put to shame? But again, when has it ever been heard from the beginning of the world that the glory is a true and lasting one, which praises itself and boasts before time? Are not the proverbs made on this: Singing songs of victory before the victory, much shouting and nothing behind it (Rumor ante salutem), then also the well-known word: Self-praise stinks, and sSprüchw. 27,2.]: "Let another praise you"? Then Christ says [John 8:54]: 1) "If I seek my own glory, my glory is nothing," and the author of Proverbs Solomon [Proverbs 20:21]: "The inheritance for which one first hastens will not be blessed in the end." For a righteous man is, as the Scripture sSprüchw. 18,17. Vulg.] says, not first a boaster, but an accuser of himself; but a Pharisee is first a boaster of himself, but at the same time an accuser of all others [Luc. 18,11.].

Of our Eck, however, I believe all the more easily that he has boasted of his victories, since I have known for a long time about the nature of this man, that he is a completely miserable slave of glory-seeking, and also because I have now learned even more that he tends to accuse more in the disputation than to dispute, and to spoil people's time in the manner of unlearned shouters with scurrilous words and vituperation. Therefore, it is not surprising if he seeks nothing but honor. But to me, who for two years now has had to suffer many such great braggers of victory and vain boasters and angry accusers, then also I do not know what punishments of hell (tartara) threatened me, it is quite a small thing to hear this their pretended boasting, since one must be more pityful than annoyed about them. For if their conscience could boast the same, do not doubt that they would neither boast outwardly nor be innocent. But to do you enough, I will briefly describe the matter itself according to the truth, and describe it in such a way that you can recognize that this disputation was a waste of time, not an investigation of the truth; then that Eck and Eck's followers are hypocritical in their boasting and feel something quite different in their conscience. For as much as Eck lay, almost no decisive point (scopus) has been touched. But if it has been touched, then it has been argued only with the best known and most hackneyed reasons of proof. For God knows that our Wittenbergers attacked this whole host of theses much more violently and vigorously for two years and tested them so that one could count their bones, while Eck barely touched them lightly on the top of the skin; only that he shouted more strongly in One Hour than we did in the whole two years, and seemed to want to overcome even himself as a shouter with immoderately hopeful and boastful gestures. For with these manners, which are admittedly quiet and calm, Eckish modesty has hitherto peaceful theology, hidden in silence and secrecy in the deepest and quietest way. As God may have mercy on me, I am compelled to confess that we are defeated by shouting and gestures, that is, by the corner modesty; for that is what he himself calls it.

But before I tell the matter myself, I must make a preface and ask for forgiveness, if I involve some people equally, whom I would have liked to have passed over, if they had not mixed themselves in without cause, and had, as one says, behaved neutrally and impartially on both sides. Therefore, they may not attribute it to me, but to themselves, if they are also hit, since a similar search for honor and a long ingrained spitefulness has driven them to put into action not exactly good plots for Eck against us. Of course, I do not say of all of them. For there are very sincere and pious people at this famous university who hold above the right science and for that very reason are a thorn in the eyes of the people of the other coinage (fermenti) and a scourge in their side, to use the words of Joshua [Cap. 23, 13.]. But even the very wise council and the excellent citizens are so far removed from this malicious disposition that no one detests more than they this perverse manner, which is hostile to the good sciences. Most of all, however, the most illustrious Prince Duke George is to be praised, who in true princely grace and clemency omitted nothing that could have served the most beneficial fruit of this disputation, if it had been such that the pure truth had been sought, with honor set aside; He also deigned to glorify this cause exceedingly by his high presence, preventing all things, and exhorting that modest action should be taken, and in the endeavor to seek the truth. I therefore confess that I have nothing but all honor and all service to thank this dear university for, only I confess that the spitefulness of some (as human things are nowhere without fault) has displeased me very much.

Now this is either the tragedy

or the air play of this disputation, - rather, one could call it a satire. First of all, the contract was broken, according to which the agreement was made between Eck and us that disputation should be free, and that what was transcribed by the notaries should be handed over to the public judgment of the whole world, as one can read in the letters that were issued on both sides. 1) Rather, our corner wanted the matter to be handled without notaries with a mere and free shout; the people of his party also agreed with this. When they could not achieve this, another way of circumventing the contract was considered, namely, that what had been transcribed by the notaries should not be published until they had received their opinion on what had been handed over to the judges who had been named and jointly elected. A little word has been added, with which this breach of contract has been adorned as a very honorable title among the unintelligent, namely that one must have certain judges. If we refused these, they would already have something with which they could make us hated by the common people and boast that we did not want to suffer judges. Thus the most solid truth of Eck and his followers fears the light and the public, for they are well aware that they are no match for the judgment of the whole world and of all good people, according to which so much that the holy fathers have said, written and discussed before them has been accepted. Thus they acted, perhaps because they hoped that those would become judges of whom they knew that they were against us here and there in the universities and were on their side, or, what I suspect more, because my corner, who was well aware that he did not understand the Scriptures, sought in this way a hiding place for this, of which he was aware. For even though he is a man who is variously and abundantly learned in human sciences and scholastic opinions, I have nevertheless found him to be an altogether unfit disputator in the hei-

He may forgive me according to his modesty, because I speak the truth and will prove it in his time, if the all too credible testimonies of this ignorance, which he himself has put on paper, should not suffice. Not as if I only attribute to myself the understanding of the Holy Scriptures (for he is in the habit of accusing me of this when he has nothing else at hand to say), but because I consider that I have occupied myself with the Holy Scriptures so much and am practiced in them that I can speak out without danger about the understanding of a scholastic theologian who has hardly greeted the Holy Scriptures on the threshold.

The other attack was this: Our Carlstadt had brought books with him. Although it is the most honest and safest way to argue, to show the passages from the present books and to either approve or refute the statements, our corner rejected this with great noise. For it seemed that, relying on the insight and work of a certain compiler (compilatoris), he had patched together many testimonies of the holy fathers and increased them by the efforts of his party; there was now danger that, as he had been convicted of this on several occasions, so now he would always be convicted that he had put on the all-sayings of the fathers in an evil way. For since he had not seen the preceding and the following (for, as I have said, truth was not sought), he brought those [censures] to the point in such a way that nothing less could serve the point, only that it delighted him to excite laughter at times even among the audience. Therefore, according to Eck's will, they determined that the books should be left at home, and that only the power of memory and tongue should be used for free disputation, that is, as some very good men said, that this disputation was not held for the sake of truth, but for the praise of memory and tongue. However, that Adam also presented a very beautiful fig leaf here, which, of course, no one would have missed.

1) These are the documents No. 361 and 362 in this volume.

2) Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 1402; then in this writing the third last paragraph.

It is childish and ridiculous when a theologian disputes from books or slips of paper. And it is to be marveled at what an applause they earned by this artifice among the great crowd that judges about these things as about school exercises of children, as if Augustine had not also argued against the Manichaeans and Donatists with the use of books; but he sought truth, not honor.

I pass over that it was necessary to leave the last word to the corner, may he oppose or respond, so that in such a way unanswered grounds of evidence the more easily aroused the appearance of victory. Then, if a certain day had been set for the completion of some matter, he was at liberty not to observe it; we had to conscientiously bind ourselves to it and keep it. In short, we who had come to fight against errors and heresies were forced to deal with spite and vain honor. For as for me, since in so many sermons he made me the talk and laughing stock of the people, because his lips wanted it that way, I gladly pass over it, since I wish nothing so much as that my name be forgotten.

But even so they have achieved nothing. For they may want to or not, they are forced to testify themselves that Carlstadt's theses have come home unharmed, not even refuted in one syllable, of which Eck had planned to devour them raw. Yes, this excellent protector of the scholastic teachers, in order to prevent him from being regarded as defeated, turned into a proteus during the disputing and suddenly admitted, yes, asserted everything at the end, what he had fought against with great vehemence at the beginning. Then he preceded and boasted that he had drawn Carlstadt over to his opinion, even daring to say that the scholastic teachers had never taught and held otherwise. Since he realized that this was too impudently spoken for anyone who had read the scholastics to hear, he softened it in such a way that he called Scotus with his Scotists and Capreo with his scholastics.

lus with his Thomists, and older ones, Altisiodorensis, 1) Bonaventure, and I don't know what other sources.

I believe, however, that this was a great cross for the people of his ilk, although they feigned a miserable laugh when they realized (if they realized otherwise) that their leader, who had gone so bravely into battle, had left the flags and had become a runaway from the army and a defector. For that was enough for Carl-, stadt that in one and the same hour the three most famous sects of the scholastic teachers had been denied by Eck; if he had not denied them, he would have had to return to Ingolstadt as a Pelagian. For it is certain that the moderns (modernos, as they are called) agree with the Scotists and Thomists in this matter (that is, free will and grace), with the exception of some Gregory of Arimini, whom all condemn, who also correctly and forcefully states that they are worse than the Pelagians. For he alone among all the scholastics agrees with Carlstadt, that is, with Augustine and the apostle Paul, against all the newer scholastics. For although the Pelagians asserted that a good work could be done without grace, they did not say that heaven could be attained without grace. The same is certainly said by the scholastics, since they teach that a good work is done without grace, but not a meritorious one. Then, going beyond the Pelagians, they add that man has the natural right guidance of sound reason, to which the will can naturally submit, where the Pelagians said that man is supported by the law of God.

And you don't have to believe that this transformation is far from Eck's nature; he is very quick with it. For on this day he held it with Gregorius (as I said) and with Carlstadt; again on the other day, when he fought with me, he denied me the same Gregorius even in the same doctrine (materia) for the sake of

for the sake of an article by Hus, who was condemned at the Costnitz Concilium. Thus, Eck is a truly whimsical disputator, the like of whom I have not seen, in whom there is no danger nor injustice in accepting for the scholastics the opinion of Gregory of Arimini, who disputes with Carlstadt against all scholastics, and in turn rejecting him for the very same scholastics in the same matter. Thus you have the victory of which Eck boasts, and his followers (fermentum) boast, that after denying almost all scholastic teachers whom they had taken upon themselves to protect, they agree with the church teachers.

But also we at Wittenberg knew that the scholastic teachers, if they would deny Aristotle with their darkness (that is, according to Eck, with the light of nature), can agree with the church teachers. But this way of denying and bringing into agreement by denial, which we do not know at Wittenberg, we learned at Leipzig, which we make common to you and to all who want it. First, that at the beginning of the disputation you bravely attack someone's statements and pray, even by public notes, that you will fight against the new doctrine for the truth of the faith and the honor of the holy church, so that one would think that the mountains are crying; then, during the discussion, you gradually and cunningly soften so that no one notices that you are defeated, constantly asserting the same and at the same time boasting that you have won. Then you must imagine with great confidence that none of those present has a memory or common sense, so that you can freely say that you have held this way from the beginning and that this is not a new but an old doctrine, and in the meantime you do not care if you have lost a whole army of teachers whom you had set yourself the task of defending. And this, of course, is the way and the outcome of the disputation between Carlstadt and Eck.

After that he fought with me about the primacy of the Roman pope, about purgatory, indulgences, penance, the power of any priest to absolve. What we have done in all these matters will be known as the see in his time. For I must speak more sparingly about this, lest I become my herald.

In the meantime, I say that I myself almost do not know how far we have diverged with regard to repentance and purgatory. For that repentance begins with love for righteousness, he commended, but did not want it to be necessary, which I maintain to this day as absolutely necessary, since no good work can be done before grace (which is love), as he himself admitted. The cause of this disagreement seemed to me to be that he claimed with many testimonies that repentance also begins with servile fear, either not knowing or pretending not to know that servile fear is not completely removed in this life. Therefore, the infused grace that begins repentance also stirs the servile fear by working the filial fear at the same time, since the works of God are terrifying in that He kills when He wants to make alive. 2c. But whether souls are certain of their blessedness and grace is increased in them, I have said that I do not know, according to my disputation in the "Explanations," 1) and he has not yet proved the opposite. Thus the matter is still undecided.

Regarding the indulgence we almost agree, which almost became a laughing matter, since he himself also preached publicly before the people that the same was not to be despised, but one should not trust in it. If he had been preached in this way by the indulgence-bearers, perhaps nowadays no one would know Martin's name, but the indulgence would have disintegrated into itself long ago, since the commissaries would have died of hunger if the people had known that one should not trust in it. Therefore, what I thought would be the main point of the disputation and the most dangerous matter, we have settled so easily that we have dealt with almost nothing more leisurely; indeed, there has never been a more unfortunate and miserable situation concerning the indulgence.

1) Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XVIII, 162 ff.

confessed. Therefore, my German sermon on indulgences 1) remained quite safe, together with what I wrote about this matter in the "Explanations" and against Silvester 2), although he could not leave it unchallenged either in his own way or at the behest of his group (fermenti), pretending that I was deceiving people with my words. And such a profound theologian did not realize that the new life and the cross, of which I had said that God required it of a sinner, included every kind of evil in the world, even death. And it is not to be wondered at, because he did not read the Scriptures nor their ways of speaking, but the light of nature, Aristotle, and only the teachers enlightened by this light. And yet, as an exceedingly presumptuous Moab, who presumed to be greater than he was capable of, he has presumed to blaspheme and go through everything I have ever said.

Therefore I wonder what those brothers will say and do now, who have blasphemed me here and there among the princes and everywhere as a heretic and I don't know with how many names for the sake of indulgences, then even large counter-disputation slips, which (as they say) have been prepared at great expense and by foreign labor, 3) published and deprived Christ's people of their goods, both in soul and body, by their impudent frauds, seeing that this matter has been so cold in this disputation, which they wanted to be hotter than hell. It is enough for me that the main part of this matter has fallen in the happy Leipzig, and that according to the judgment of all, the indulgence and its screamers have become ridiculous.

The primacy of the Roman Church has been the subject of much controversy. I have not denied the supreme place of the same according to honor, but also have not admitted the supreme power, at least not from divine right, have also not denied it, but rather have confessed it and have declared it to be true.

1) Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XVIII, 270: "A Sermon on Indulgences and Grace."

3) These are the two disputations of Tetzl, Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Col. 82 and 94, whose author was D. Conrad Wimpina at Frankfurt an der Oder. See there the introduction p. 12 f.

I do not want to deny that the Roman Church should have this supremacy in fact or by human right. For I seek nothing less than that anyone in any matter should depart from the supreme See of the holy [apostles] Peter and Paul, or withdraw from it the obedience due, only that I cannot admit that so many holy fathers, who are kings in heaven, who lived in the east and were not under the Roman See, have acted contrary to divine right. On the other hand, he made an effort to assert both according to divine right, since he gathered many testimonies of the fathers. But at last it was found that they were ambiguous and various, and at times seemed to incline to the other opinion, yet to me they testified more strongly and more abundantly, especially where they were heartily engaged in interpreting the gospel.

Since the word Matth. 16,18.: "You are Peter", likewise the word in John [Cap. 21, 17.]: "Feed my sheep", and v. 19.]: "Follow me", likewise [Luc. 22, 32.]: "Strengthen your brothers", and some less than these testimonies serving the cause did not penetrate, he finally took recourse to the Concilium at Constance, in full confidence, because there the opposite would have been established, and my opinion would have been condemned under the articles of Hus and Wiclef. Here he stood still and tried with all his might, as spitefully as he was able, to arouse hatred against me, because he had nothing else with which he could have more sweetly flattered his Gelichter (fermento). For since he lacked divine right, he ran to human right in order to prove divine right through it. But even so, one could not ridicule what such a great theologian undertook.

Against this one Concilium I opposed him two older and more famous ones, the Nicene and the African, then that even the Concilium at Constance was not rightly understood by him and his wicked mob (which he served at that time); for the Nicene Concilium decided that the Roman bishop should take care of the churches situated around the city, just as the one at Alexandria took care of those in Egypt; then that the bishop at Alexandria should take care of the churches in Egypt.

that the bishops should not be ordained as now by pallia and power bought from Rome, but by the neighboring bishops, as is written in the 10th book of church history. Here, however, this eel said that this could be done, had been omitted by the Roman popes, by inventing (as he is wont to do) new glosses from his own head, as if both the Roman popes and the Nicene Concilium had not acted quite ungodly and heretical, when they either decreed or omitted what was contrary to divine right. For if it is a divine right that the Roman Pontiff should be able to do everything in all the churches, it is not in his power to forbear that the contrary be done even for one hour, nor in the power of a council to decree the contrary over the Roman Pontiff as his subordinate, or to decree anything different or otherwise, certainly no more than it is in his power to forbear or decree that fornication and adultery be permitted. Thus it happened that this wretched protector and patron of Roman power could not protect this primacy unless he blasphemed both the Most Holy Nicene Concilium and even the popes, claiming that they had dissolved divine law. For what is heretical and blasphemous if this Eckish modesty is not heresy and blasphemy? But so must he speak who speaks to please men.

Now, since the African Concilium, as stated in the 99th dist. cap. Primas, had forbidden that the Roman pope should not be called a general bishop, speaking in this way: But even the Roman bishop should not be called a general bishop, so here, of course, he abstained from blasphemy, and did not say that, contrary to divine law, another one was allowed or decreed, but invented a gloss that is certainly worthy of such a great theologian, which I would not state if I did not know that it was sufficient for the exceedingly ambitious disputator and would bring him the most complete (absolute) honor. He said: 1) Although the Roman pope cannot be called the general bishop, he is not the general bishop.

he must be called the bishop of the general church. I beg you, dear friend, hold back the laughter; let his gang laugh, for no one can laugh more duly at such an excellent gloss. I boast that I have not stayed in Leipzig in vain at such great expense, and have at least learned this: He is not the general bishop, but he is the bishop of the general church; he may not be the bishop of Mainz, but he is the bishop of the Mainz church.

This he has opposed to my two conciliarities. For he has dissolved the Nicene by the word "left behind", the African by the word "church"; so easy is it for our excellent magisters to dissolve the questions and also to do harm to the reputation of the concilia, by which they, it is to be wondered at how quickly, tend to make others heretics.

Now see whether I have answered better or worse to his some [Concilium]. It is certain that not all the articles condemned at Constance are heretical, as Eck impudently barked. I prove this clearly: first of all from the words of the Concilium itself, which read thus: some of them are obviously heretical, some erroneous, others blasphemous, others bold and seditious, others offensive to godly ears. Thus it is said. Is it not clear that these are the words of those whom we call heretical judges, who, as is well known, have gained dominion in this Concilium (for they use almost no other words than these: This sentence is heretical, this vexatious, this seditious, this insolent), or that certainly the Holy Spirit was very much present and watching while they played or slept, so that they were forced to testify quite carelessly with their own words that they condemned some who are neither heretical nor erroneous, and therefore catholic, Christian, and true? For if they had said without distinction that all are heretical and at the same time erroneous, at the same time bold and at the same time insolent, there would be neither a place nor an escape for the truth. But now they themselves distinguish the heretical from the erroneous, and from both the reckless and insolent. Therefore I will say: What is it to me?

if I speak boldly and insultingly, if I speak only truthfully and catholically? I corner you with your own sword: you call some heretical because it is certain that they violate the faith, some erroneous, perhaps because they violate the customs and ordinances of men. Now we triumph with respect to the rest that they violate neither the faith nor the ordinances about morals, and if they perhaps offend too much delicate little obeisances, which cannot stand the truth, it is enough that they are true and in accordance with the faith. It has always been so that the truth must be bold, biting, offensive and insulting. So I believe that this is one of the offensive ones, that the Roman pope is not by divine right the lord over all, according to authority. For what could be more frightening? what could be said nowadays and for many years that is more perverse? Thus also that is offensive in the ears of the Thomists, of which I have said above that it is of Gregory of Arimini, nay, of Paul and Augustine, namely, that every action of man is either good or evil. I did ask that it be admitted to me that not all articles were condemned by the Concilium, but that some quite Christian ones were inserted by some Thomist, such as: Every action of man is either good or evil, as every tree is either good or evil according to the Gospel, but he would not. But what is it to me that the Thomists are vexed by the truth? it is enough that this article is neither heretical nor erroneous. Or if it is heretical and condemned, what will Eck do, who disputes against the laudable Concilium at Constance for the same laudable Concilium, and admits to Carlstadt that it is true and catholic, and also the scholastic teachers would not have held otherwise, as I said above? O a terrible disgrace, which must be intolerable to Eck, the patron of the holy church, that the patron of the Bohemians and heretics (to thunder with his words) holds it with the Concilium against the Concilium, and he [Eck], in order to be a Christian with his teachers, becomes a heretic.

But, as I have said, it is the prerogative of Eckish modesty to disagree quite freely with himself and to hold contradictory things in one and the same thing, as he testifies that he did also at Vienna and perhaps also at Bologna. Therefore, it is clear that the Concilium at Constance does not argue against me, and that I am proven by it neither heretical nor erroneous, but rather catholic and true, so that in this way the agreement with the Nicene and the African and the one at Constance exists. But that Eck and the people of his ilk, then also the heretical judges, did not see this, seems to be the reason that all of them are much quicker at hand with the vituperation of the accusation of heresy than it befits such teachers of the people. And being stricken with this blindness, they read, as the holy Scriptures and the holy Fathers, so also everything else, that is, they are not concerned how well and how carefully, but to how great hatred and abuse of others they may read it. Therefore, they immediately claim that everything they hear that is not in their opinion is heretical, thereby exposing both their drowsiness in reading and their insolence in judging to the washing of all.

Then, if this agreement of the conciliums is not arbitrary, and the one at Constance is stubbornly held up to me against the two, then it will not be difficult for me to determine which of the two sides must have the precedence in reputation. For since a concilium can err, I will sooner confess that the one at Constance has erred than the Nicene and African, because these have proceeded and acted far more happily than that one, and they have been compared to the holy gospels long before the other concilia, especially the Nicene. The one at Constance has not yet attained this honor, and in this I will follow the last Roman Council, at which the one at Basel was rejected and also the one at Costnitz suffered no small loss of prestige, in that it decreed that the pope was above the Council, the opposite of which was established at Constance. And since the conciliar mutually, meanwhile they make us quite safe and free to disagree with both. For since they disagree with themselves, for whom will they agree? And this, God willing, I will further elaborate when Eck will have publicly spoken.

But since, as I have said, in this disputation more time has been wasted than truth has been sought, I will give the explanations of my theses to the light, in the confidence that a better fruit of knowledge will come forth from it than if twenty times were disputed in this way. Therefore, if I seem to be wrong to someone, let him refute the error if he hates me, or teach me better if he loves me.

There you have, my dearest Spalatin, almost the whole story; for if I have not said some other things, I have not said them out of deference to the Leipzig University, which is very precious to me, lest I turn the bones of the king of Edom to ashes [Amos 2, 1]. However, if I did not know that this was due to my sins, I would bear it quite unwillingly, that I am occupied with such unfruitful dealings of indulgences, primacy, privileges, and other things quite unnecessary for blessedness, by which I am reluctantly kept away from the best studies of our time. For as the most illustrious Prince Duke George, in chastising us both, has wisely said: Be it by divine or human right, the Roman pope is and remains pope [nevertheless]. Thus he spoke quite rightly and with this excellent modesty rebuked this useless disputation of ours quite severely.

But I am convinced that as soon as my corner and Eck's party see this, they will immediately cry out that I have not kept the contract and have not obeyed the agreement, in which the provision is made that the disputation should not be published before the pronouncement of the judges; as if they themselves had ever kept any contract with us. But I answer: that I consented that the disputation, which was recorded by the hand of the notaries, should not be published by us; but the other copies, as each one was left free to make the same

Who will prevent them from being published? But nevertheless, they may not be published either. My notarial copy will not be published, as the contract is so beautifully kept. But I did not promise that I would not write in addition, rather I testified publicly, since they limited our freedom with extremely unfair conditions, that they would not want to take it into their mind that I would remain silent: and so I will not remain silent.

But if I had promised such, I ask: Which of the two broke the contract first? Is it not Eck, who, as I hear, in a pompous and exceedingly unreasonable letter 1) even tried to influence (corrumpere) our most illustrious prince and patron (of whom he dreams that he is similar to his exceedingly obtuse pack), by telling, as much as he could, the most ridiculous things about me, as if I had denied the sayings of all the holy fathers together, arrogated to myself alone the understanding of Scripture, denied the Conciliar, defended the heretics: for with these lies that pure man and holy theologian has dared to tempt this so holy and venerable head, and to praise me so gloriously before the exceedingly pious prince. What do you think he writes and speaks to others (without violating the contract, of course), since he writes these things to our patron? Or what truth does he speak to my envious ones, who is not ashamed to lie in front of such a wise prince, who has such an extraordinary power of judgment?

Yes, I hear that he has made some annotations to certain articles 2) which are imposed on me by the restless brethren seeking their ruin, and that he has described me again before the mighty ones with wonderful love as a Manichaeon, Hussite, Viklefite, and I do not know how manifold a heretic. Thus Eck's modesty is wont to hold a treaty; but it is easy for me to despise this nonsense of his, since I have heard almost the whole house-rath of this man. And when these products of his come to my hands, I hope that I will be able to treat my corner duly and splendidly, whether he will finally understand in some way what it is to vow many things and keep nothing, and yet demand of others that it be kept, and by all this seek nothing but that he harm and trample truth underfoot.

Meanwhile, it is enough for me that this tormentor of consciences, the falsely called theology (theologistria), to which I owe everything that my conscience suffers, has fallen in this disputation. For I had previously learned that merit according to equity (congrui) is different from merit according to law (condigni), that man can do as much as is in him to obtain grace, that he can remove the bar, that he is able not to put the bar in front of grace, that he can fulfill the commandments of God according to the essence of the deed (quo ad substantiam facti), but not according to the intent of the governor, that free will has a capacity on both sides in things that contradict each other, that the will can love God above all things by purely natural forces, that one can by nature have the exercise of love, of friendship, and such monstrous things, which are generally put forward as the first principles of scholastic theology, and with which they have filled the books and everyone's ears. But now all these errors have fallen bravely under Eck's protection and triumphant banners, almost without any struggle, frightened by the mere sight of two theses of Carlstadt, 1) the first of which is that of Augustine: Free will without grace is only capable of sinning; the other is that of Ambrose: Free will without grace approaches godlessness the faster it is eager to act.

Almost the same signs of victory and spoils were carried away by the indulgence from this fight, of which I admitted, not in a milder sense (as they gossip), that it was useful, but useful only for the lazy and snoring. By the way, I have defended, that it is nonsense for someone to say that he is good and useful for Christians. This, I say, is enough for me in the meantime that it took place at this disputation; I have told it for the sake that I might help the glorious boasting of Eck's heresy a little. If anyone among them should attack this, perhaps the Lord will grant that the other will come to light.

I believe you have seen Eck's apology against our Philip 2), which is quite worthy of Eck's manner, in which he imposes his status as a teacher of linguistics as a great fault on the man, who is also more learned in the holy scriptures than all people like Eck, and who is also not inexperienced in Eck's dirty theology. These excellent magistri nostri have such a correct judgment that they measure scholarship according to its dignities and empty titles. He has also tried to make him spiteful to me by attributing to me a good head and I do not know how great erudition. For, so that you also know this, that I too have gained some fame from this disputation, Eck ascribes erudition to me, and the Leipzigers ascribe it to me, to such a degree (as much as I have heard through rumor) that, if they had not supplied Eck with help, they confess that Eck would have been thrown down by me. And so the victory already begins to move from Eck to the Leipzigers. Again it is said that that boastful despiser had indeed considered the Leipzigers to be good people, but he had expected much more from them, and he alone had done everything. So you see that they sing a kind of new Jliad and Aeneid, and I at least am taken for a Hector and Turnus, so that they can make him Achilles and Aeneas, only that in this victory it is doubtful whether Eck accomplished this with his forces and troops, or with those of the Leipzigers. It is certain that he alone has always shouted, but they have always remained silent; don't you think that I owe them great thanks?

2) Excusatio Eckii ad ea quae falso sibi Philippus Melancthon, grammaticus Wittenbergensis, super theologica disputatione Lipsica adscripsit, in this volume No. 406.

But I return to Philip. There is so much missing that any Eck could make him hateful to me, that in my whole matter I respect nothing more than the judgment of Philip, whose unbiased judgment and reputation is worth more to me than that of many thousand dirty people like Eck. And I am not ashamed, although I am a master of liberal arts, of philosophy and of theology, and adorned with almost all the titles that Eck has, to depart from my mind when the opinion of this teacher of languages differs from mine, which I have often done and do daily, because of the divine gifts that God has poured into this earthen vessel (which is admittedly contemptible to Eck) with rich blessings. I do not praise Philip, he is a creature of God and nothing, but I honor in him the work of my God. Nor do I rebuke Eck, but these crude plots to sow discord and stir up hatred I hate and abhor with all my heart. Nowhere have I seen these more frequently or more maliciously than in Eck; with them he has also leavened almost the entire trade of our disputation. For almost alone in this one exceedingly wicked thing Eck is a mighty man, but in theology he is an ass on the lyre. 1)

But now I will proceed to the explanations. In the meantime, see to it that you recommend the corner to the most illustrious prince as he deserves to be recommended, although this service is not necessary for such a great prince. Farewell. Luther's detailed report to Spalatin of the Leipzig disputation and complaint about the hostile behavior of the Leipzigers against the Wittenbergers. July 20, 1519.

Luther wrote this letter from Wittenberg to Spalatin, who was probably in Altenburg at the time, where he had returned with the Elector after the imperial election held in Frankfurt. The original is found in the Oofi. dotd. X. 122. toi. 13, but in very faded, partly indissoluble writing. Latin in Aurifaber, vol. I, toi. 180; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. III, p. 233; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 284 and in the Erlangen Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 80. German in the Wittenberg edition⁵⁶⁹), vol. IX, p. 66; in the Jena edition (1564), vol. I, p. 144d; in the Altenburg edition, vol. I, p. 268; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVII, p. 245 and in Walch. We have retranslated according to the Erlangen correspondence.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To the very pious man Georg Spalatin, court preacher and librarian of the Serene Prince, Elector of Saxony, his [dear friend] in Christ.

Hail! We are glad that the most noble prince and all of you have returned safely, dear Spalatin. Christ accept Pfeffinger's soul 2) in grace, Amen. We would have written about this famous disputation of ours long ago, but it was not certain how far and in what way it would be written. It is so with it that some Leipzigers, namely those who are neither sincere nor righteous, triumph with Eck, and this is, as they gossip, the general speech (fama); by the way, the matter itself will reveal everything.

First, when we arrived, immediately at the same hour, before we got off the wagon, a prohibition of the bishop of Merseburg was posted on the church doors, that there should be no disputing, and for this also the new declaration [of the pope] 3) was drawn and added [to the prohibition]. This was disregarded, and the one who had posted it was thrown into prison by the council (because he had done it without its knowledge).

Since they did not achieve anything by this trick, they turned to another one. Carlstadt was specially summoned, and they negotiated with many words (since Eck wanted it that way) that the disputation should only take place orally and not be written out by notaries. For he hoped that he could gain the upper hand by shouting and gesturing (as he indeed did). Carlstadt opposed this, because it had been agreed that way, and one had to stick to the

He demanded, of course, that it be recorded by notaries. Finally, in order to obtain this, he was forced to admit at least this, that the disputation recorded by the notaries should not be published before they had heard the verdict of several [judges]. Here a new dispute arose about the judges to be chosen. Finally, they urged him to give his consent to this as well, that they wanted to agree on the judges after the disputation was finished, and they did not want to allow the disputation in any other way. And so they attacked us with a cuckolded final speech, that we would be disgraced on both sides, either that we had withdrawn from the disputation, or that the disputation would necessarily have to be subjected to unjust judges. So you see these crude tricks by which they deprived us of the agreed freedom. For we are certain that the universities and the Roman pope will either never, or against us, do what they alone desire.

The next day they summoned me especially and proposed the same to me. But I, since I feared the Roman pope and was also advised to do so by our people, rejected all these conditions; then they offered other universities, with the exception of the Roman pope. I requested that the agreed freedom be preserved; since they did not want it, I refused and rejected the disputation. Thereupon it was immediately on everyone's lips that I did not dare to accept the disputation and that it would be too unreasonable that I did not want to suffer any judges. All this was vilified and interpreted in the most spiteful and malicious way, so that even our best friends turned away, and now an eternal disgrace was in store for our university. Hereupon I joined the council of the friends and accepted the condition with unwillingness, but in such a way that my appeal would remain unharmed and my cause would not suffer any harm, even with the exclusion of the Roman court.

The first discussion was with Carlstadt about free will, during the week. From the books he had brought with him, Carlstadt revealed Eck's (illius) reasons for proof and (truly) gave his answers in an excellent and very rich manner.

After that, since Carlstadt had also been given permission to oppose, Eck refused, unless he left the books at home while leading the evidence, since Andreas did this for the sake of showing him to his face that he was leading the sayings of Scripture and the Fathers in the right way, and was not treating them violently, as Eck had been convicted of having treated them. Here again a noise arose; at last it was decided in favor of Eck that the books should be left at home; but who does not see that if there had been dispute for the sake of truth, it would have been desirable that all the books had been brought in. In no other matter did the spite and ambition show themselves in a more impudent manner.

In the end, the deceitful man admitted everything that Carlstadt had proved, which he had nevertheless vehemently contested, and agreed with him completely in all things, boasting that he had drawn Carlstadt over to his opinion. For he rejected Scotus with the Scotists and Capreolus with the Thomists, saying that the other scholastics had held and taught the same as Carlstadt. Thus, both Scotus and Capreolus, that is, the two most famous parties of the Scotists and the Thoniists, fell.

The next week he argued with me, first of all very vehemently about the primacy of the Roman pope. His strength consisted in the words [Matth. 16,18.]: "You are Peter", and [Joh. 21, 17.]: "Feed my sheep", and [V. 19.]: "Follow me", and [Luc. 22,32.]: "Strengthen your brothers", with the addition of many testimonies of the fathers. What I answered, you will see next. After that, in the end, he relied entirely on the Concilium of Constance, relying on it to condemn the article of Hus, who had said that the papacy was of the emperor, as if it were of divine right. Then, since he was on his battlefield, as it were, he bravely pushed for held the Bohemians against me and publicly accused me of being a heretic and patron of the heretical Bohemians. For he is a no less insolent than sacrilegious sophist. In a wonderful way these accusations tickled the Leipzigers, more than the disputation itself.

I have again opposed him to the Greeks of a thousand years and to the ancient Fathers, who would not have been under the power of the Roman Pontiff, although I do not deny him the primacy of honor. And finally, the prestige of the Concilium has also been disputed. I have publicly confessed that some articles were ungodly condemned, since they were those of Paul, Augustine, and even of Christ himself, taught in clear and plain words. Here, however, the viper swelled up, and made my misdeed great, and was almost nonsensical in flattering the Leipzigers. Finally, I proved from the words of the council itself that not all articles condemned there were heretical and erroneous, therefore he had achieved nothing with his proofs. And so this matter is still pending.

During the third week, we discussed penance, purgatory, indulgences, and the power of every priest to absolve. For he disputes with Carlstadt unwillingly, but sought only me. The indulgence indeed fell completely, and he agreed with me almost in everything, and the protection of the indulgence became laughter and mockery, while I had expected that this would be the epitome of the future disputation; yes, he also confessed it in public sermons, so that even the common people recognized that he considered the indulgence to be nothing.

It is also said that he confessed that if I had not disputed the authority of the pope, he would have agreed with me very easily in all things. Yes, to Carlstadt himself he said: If I were in agreement with Martin as I am with you, I would also go to him in his inn. Thus he is a fickle and deceitful man, ready to become anything. Yes, since he had admitted to Carlstadt that the scholastic teachers teach the same thing, he rejected to me the Gre gorius Ariminensis, 1) who alone holds with us against all scholastics, and so it is not wrong with him to assert and deny one and the same thing at different times. And even the Leipzigers do not recognize this, so great is their narrowness. And so that the monstrosity would be even greater: one opinion he admitted in the disputation (in schola - at the university), another he preached in the church. When Carlstadt asked him why he was so unstable, he answered without shame that it was not necessary to teach the people what was being discussed.

After my disputation was finished, he disputed with Carlstadt on the last three days, again admitting and agreeing to everything: that "doing as much as is in him" is sinning, and that free will without grace can do nothing but sin, and that in every good work there is sin, and that "doing as much as is in him" is grace itself in him who prepares himself for grace. All this the scholastics deny. And so almost nothing in this disputation is acted upon, at least duly, except my thirteenth thesis. But meanwhile the latter has the applause, he triumphs and rules, but only until we have published ours. Because there has been bad disputation, I want to publish the explanations 2) anew.

The Leipzigers, in fact, neither greeted nor visited us and held us as their most hated enemies; they accompanied him, attached themselves to him, gave him guest meals, invited him, yes, gave him a skirt and added the Camelot 3) to it, rode with him for a walk, in short, everything they could think of, they undertook to offend us.

Moreover, they persuaded Caesar Plough and the Prince that this pleased them. The one thing they have shown us is that (as is the custom) they have rewarded us with a gift of wine.

1) Gregory of Rimini taught in Paris, became general of the Augustinian Hermits in 1357, and died in Vienna in 1358 (Erl. Briefw.).

2) Luther had already sent out the explanation of his thirteenth thesis before June 27, and the second edition, which he had increased, appeared after August 18. Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 720 and the introduction there, p. 26 f.

and to refrain from doing so might not have been safe for them. But all those who were favorable to us came to us secretly, as it were. But D. Aurbach 1) invited us, a man of very correct judgment, and the Ordinary Pistor the Younger; 2) Duke George himself invited us all three [Luther, Carlstadt and Eck] at the same time.

The same most noble duke summoned me alone and discussed my books at length, especially the "Our Father", 3) claiming that the Bohemians were missing out on many things because of me; then that I had confused many consciences with the "Our Father", since they complained that they would not be able to pray One Our Father in four days if they had to hear me, and many other things. But I was not so limited that I could not have distinguished between the flute and the blowing, 4) and I was sorry that the good and very godly prince was so open to foreign influence and obeyed it, since I saw and experienced that he spoke quite princely when he spoke his own.

The last monstrosity of spite was this: since on the day of Peter and Paul [June 29] I had been called by our Rector [Barnim], Duke of Pomerania, to preach the Gospel to His Grace in the castle chapel, 5) the rumor suddenly filled

The city was so excited about my sermon that people of both sexes came in large numbers, so that I was forced to preach in the disputation hall. Magistri nostri were deputized and appointed for this purpose, as well as the most unrepentant Laurians. It is the Gospel, however, which comprehends the subject matter of both disputations in the clearest possible way; therefore, I have been compelled to present to everyone the brief summary of the entire disputation, but not to the credit of the Leipzigers.

Thereupon Eck, instigated against me, preached four times 6) in different churches and publicly belittled and challenged everything that was mine. For this is what the bad theologians (theologistae) ordered him to do. On the other hand, I was not allowed to preach, even though it was desired by many. I was only to be accused and blamed, not also cleansed. For they had also acted in this way in the disputation, that Eck, even though he was the opponent, still had the last word, which I could not answer.

Yes, even Caesar Pflug, having heard that I had preached (for he was absent), said: "I wish Doctor Martinus had saved his sermon for Wittenberg!" Summa Summarum: I have known spitefulness at times, but none more disrespectful and insolent.

Thus you have the whole tragedy; the other will be told to you by Johann von Planitz nitzer) 7), for he himself was present and contributed not a little to the fact that the disputation did not fall through. And because Eck and the Leipzigers sought their honor through this disputation, not the truth, it is not a tragedy.

4) With the "flute" here Duke Georg is meant, who let himself be influenced by Emser, who "blows" the flute, and obeyed him, as Luther says immediately in the following. Seidemann in his "Leipziger Disputation," p. 67, notes: "Obviously by these remarks Emser's letter to D. Zack gains its right light." This letter is found in the St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 1202.

5) This is "a sermon, preached at Leipzig in the castle, on the day of Petri and Pauli, in the year 1519, at the time of the disputation, with excuse of some articles, so him of his Abgünstigen are zugemessen", Walch, St. Louis edition, Vol. XI, 2306.

6) Eck says in his letter to Hoogstraten of July 24, 1519 (No. 395 in this volume) only of three sermons; two of them were held on July 2 and 3, and tomorrow, July 25, the third is to be held. Also in his letter to the Elector of November 8 (in this volume, no. 419, Z59), he says only of three sermons: "He also complains that I tore up a sermon, which he had delivered in Leipzig, in three sermons before all the people. I deny this" 2c. - From these statements of Eck's, however, it does not yet follow with certainty what the Erlangen correspondence notes: "Luther was not properly reported in this." It is noticeable, however, that Luther already here (on July 20) reports four sermons. Eck in the xspurutio mentions only two sermons held in the Nicolaikirche.

7) Saxon councillor and captain in Grimma.

It is a wonder that it began badly and ended worse. For since harmony could have been hoped for among the Wittenbergers and Leipzigers, they have, I fear, brought it about by this spitefulness that discord and displeasure now seem to have arisen. For this is the fruit of human honor. And though I restrain my impetuosity, yet I cannot put away all displeasure, for I have flesh, and the spitefulness and malicious inequity was all too impudent in this thing so holy and divine. Fare well and command me to the most illustrious prince. Wednesday after Alexius [July 20, 1519.

See Appendix, nv. 46, § 2.

Luther's letter to Johann Eck about Eck's purification writing (expurgatione). Completed at the end of October; sent out in the first days of November 1519.

Most of what can serve as an introduction to this writing, as, the reason for Eck's writing, the Latin title of it 2c., has already been given in the 18th volume of our edition, Introduction, p. 27 p f.. We therefore only add the following here. Indignant at Eck's falsehood and hypocrisy in the expurgatio, Luther gave expression to his sentiment in our writing in the form of a letter, which he sent to Spalatin on November 7 with the words: "I send you Eck's nonsense with my short letter of reply." The title of the single edition is X<1 ckoünnneru Deelium Martini Htüeri Dpistoin super expurMtione üeeiana. Four leaves in quarto. At the end: VuittenperAae. [nno, M.V.XIX. I, D. The printer is Johann Grünenberg. In Latin it is found in the Wittenberg edition (1550), torn. I, toi. 353 b; in the Jena one (1579), tönn I, 358 b; in the Erlanger, opp. vur. ur^., tönn IV, p. 47; in the Weimar one, vol. II, p. 700; in Löscher's Ref.Acta, vol. III, p. 805; in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 198; and in De Wette, vol. I, p. 354. We have retranslated according to the Weimarschen, which reproduces the original print; in the Wittenberg, but even more so in the Jena, the text is now and then arbitrarily changed.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Jesus.

Martin Luther wishes Johann Eck salvation.

You can hardly believe from how great a burden you have freed my heart, dear Eck, and from what a heavy care you have delivered me by your cleansing writing, in such a way that if you have only ever been of use, you have now been of most use to me, and I believe, that I have written nothing that has been more to my liking than the letter from the Leipzig disputation, 1) which you pursue with great waterfalls of accusations and, as it were, a constant flood of invective, while meanwhile, like Noah's ark, it seems to me to float above everything. He has accomplished what I have wanted, he has found what I have sought; you too have done what I have expected.

Do you wonder where this great rejoicing comes from? Listen! Until now I have been tormented by an evil and restless conscience, which was caught in God's commandment, according to which I was not free to hold and say freely of you what was forced upon me by so many reasons and confirmed by the testimony of so many righteous people: so much was I opposed, especially before the people, to your exceedingly apparent reputation and your hypocrisy, in which you pretended everywhere to be a friend of Luther, a sincere and open lover of truth. But it is true; your purification writing (expurgatio) has, as it were, as a means, as it occurs in the comedies, 2) driven away and quieted all these disturbances, by which you clearly show everyone who you were and still are. For the little that you tie like an apron, with which you also impute modesty and love to yourself with an oath, is such that it represents a ridiculous bouquet compared to the noise and the storms of your accusations. For it is said that this animal's foolishness is so great that it believes it is completely covered when it stretches out its neck.

1) This is the reply to Luther's explanations of his theses disputed at Leipzig, in this volume No. 380, not (as Walch states in the caption to No. 382) the subsequent document.

2) ruockiurn eomiurn is also found in the interpretation of the first book of Moses, Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. II, 1640, § 45.

covered only with a dwarf: so also you, who are entirely accusation and impatience, present yourself by one or two words as a pattern of the most complete modesty and love. But this may go wherever it goes.

Let us come to that which I detest more, namely your hypocrisy, so that it does not appear as if I had completely despised you, and setting aside the other things which you are ripping apart in my letter, I am at present only taking up the piece in which you also trouble yourself the most, and in which almost the epitome of the whole matter consists, namely that I have said that Carlstadt's theses, especially the first two, which were treated in the first disputation, 1) were admitted by you, and I have concluded what follows from this. In the meantime, you bravely prepare that with which you refute the articles of John Hus, which I have asserted, and that the Nicene Concilium has served for me. But listen! Be mindful that you will not be on the scene in Leipzig,' and that nothing follows the praise of the Leipzigers or your praise in good consequence even outside Leipzig. Also you should know that Luther, now not your prisoner nor in the country of his enemies, stands on his battlefield, and, as I hope you do, ask Christ above all things, so that he alone, who is the truth, may be victorious when we fight and destroy our glory. Amen.

Therefore, notice what I ask:

Did you not presume to reject these two theses of Carlstadt 2)? "Free will before grace is only capable of something to sin." "Free will without grace approaches ungodliness all the more quickly, the more eager it is to act."

Am I not telling the truth here? But what did you, as an extremely zealous and open friend of truth, come to dispute other than the errors? Thus you boast about yourself. Therefore you considered these theses to be false and wanted them to be so. For

If you thought they were true, why did you, the defender of truth, challenge them?

But in the middle of the disputation you admitted that they were true, saying freely that free will without grace could do nothing but evil. You added that even the scholastic teachers had never taught otherwise, and for this reason you denied that you defended Scotus and Capreolus. This I say, not fearing your Leipzigers, which you so often threaten me with in vain, for all these things are witnessed by the whole audience. Of course, when I heard this, I was pleased that you had returned to the right path so soon, and I already thought that the whole disputation was over, since almost everything depended on this main matter.

This is now the main thing we are dealing with now, therefore hear the cause of my letter. I judge that the disputator is defeated, who claims what he has contested before; so I have pronounced and still pronounce it that Eck is defeated, Carlstadt the victor. And this I wrote to the very noble man Pirckheymer in Nuremberg 3) that the victory would be on Carlstadt's side, and this word in the public disputation note, 4) that Carlstadt would not come as a fugitive soldier (as you had reviled him), but that he had long since been a conqueror of Eck's error. All of this is still true today, even if the judges should judge differently, which I do not hope.

From this I have deduced all that follows from this truth, though it seems to you very improper (at which I wonder), namely, that you have denied three distinguished parties 5) of the scholastic teachers, who have not denied free will before grace.

3) The Weimar edition notes: "Cf. Luther's letter to Wilibald Pirckheymer of July 5, 1519." The Erlangen Briefwechsel says: "We have not yet succeeded in finding this letter." - Eck mentions this letter in his expuratio, in the 25th part, but gives the wrong date "5. I.UKU8ti," while immediately adding: "since I had hardly disputirt with him for two days", i.e. on July 5. This letter is also referred to in the first part of the oxsurAutio.

4) No. 363 in this volume, Col. 821.

5) namely the Scotists, the Thomists and the Modernists.

1) Carlstadt's 11th and 12th theses for the Leipzig Disputation.

2) Carlstadt's 11th and 12th theses. - In the original: odtuli8ti; in the Wittenberg: obtulit. We have opted for the former reading with the Weimar one.

The same applies to the fact that I now think that Johann Hus' article (as I will show in his time) is entirely Christian and also yours. Likewise, that the article of John Hus (of whom I now hold many more articles than I held at Leipzig, 1) as I shall show in his time) is entirely Christian, and also yours, in which human actions are held to be either good or evil by direct distinction. For here it follows clearly: if before grace, free will can only sin; as it also follows that the sects of the scholastic teachers err in their action according to equity (de congruo). For the word stands firm: "Free will without grace can only do something sinful".

I have also quite rightly concluded that you would have returned to Ingolstadt as a Pelagian heretic if you had not conceded this opinion that it is in truth Pelagian to concede to free will before grace an action without sin, as the scholastics do. Not that they are therefore Pelagians, as you infer according to your usual dialectic, because they have not stubbornly erred, as you would have erred if you had remained a defender of error. Therefore, that Calendarium or Register of [scholastic] Teachers 2) is a reliable testimony of your exceedingly sharp dialectic, which always shouts further than it can see.

Moreover, I have concluded that the torturous bad theology (theologistram carnificem) has fallen from the merit according to equity (sonZrui), from which "do as much as is in him", and other things that are enumerated there, because it had been admitted, that before grace there is only sin, but sin can never be congruent (congruum) with grace (for Belial is not congruent with Christ, nor darkness with light), nay, rather sin contends against grace. All this is true, I say, if Carlstadt is right, as Eck admitted.

If you now, my dear Eck, have a different grammar, as you indeed always have a different dialectic, that conqueror, victor, truth, error, in short, the things and words must serve you as a new Mercurius at will, then you must be merciful to us and not resent if we use ours, since we allow you to use yours. So I have held so far and still hold.

But I know what you are thinking here. But in the meantime, my dear Eck, do not be dismayed: soon I will also come to your thoughts, after I have first sent this in advance, that the other matter of the activity of free will and some other things, with which you have wasted so much time, are too small to deserve a theological disputation, especially such and such a large one. It is enough that we have agreed on the main thing, that the good free will alone is indebted to God and to grace, without which it can do nothing but sin.

But since you deny what I have concluded and assert lies, I think two things: either that you have acted deceitfully in Leipzig and have been an exceedingly hateful hypocrite to the ruin of truth, or that you are dumber than any block. And here, perhaps, there will be a knot worth untying. I do not want to call you stupid, since I believe that you have enough sense that you can understand that sin and grace virtually fight against each other, like light and darkness. It only remains that by sin, evil, ungodliness you have not understood sin nor evil nor ungodliness, which the words say, but what you have invented, that is, "something not meritorious," namely, a new word, and that you have taken Augustine and Ambrose of Carlstadt 3) thus: "Free will before grace is only capable of something for sinning," that is, for not meriting; and, "Free will approaches ungodliness," that is, for not meriting, "the more zealously it is intent on action." If you do not so, I say, taking sin, evil, ungodliness, you will not escape what I have written in my letter.

Have I met your thoughts? How could I not meet them, since you yourself in this purification writing explain these words in such a way, under which you secretly wanted to be and let be understood something completely different at Leipzig, where you sought the truth as a sincere and open man? Hear, therefore, thou dearest protector of truth: Where hast thou ever read that sin, evil, ungodliness are taken for "not meritorious", except in thy Pelagian errors and falsifications of Scripture? On what scripture, on what reasonable ground do you base yourself? By what power will you be able to prevent a heretic, trusting in this right of meaning, from denying that "sin" is contained in Scripture, but claiming that it is all "not meritorious"? Dost thou not thus mock the words of the fathers, which thou also preferest to the Scriptures? Is this the marrow of which you boast that I do not see it in the sayings of the fathers? Have you so learned to dispute for the truth that you speak something else before men and understand something else in yourself? A truly open and sincere corner, as all know him, how he does not seek honor, how he honestly seeks the truth!

O cursed day in which I was born (that I speak with Jeremiah [Cap. 20, 14.]), that I have to see such shameless hypocrisy among theologians! Therefore, it is not to be wondered at if you are so anxious to be praised as an open and sincere man. For since you are open in this way, whom do you leave who would be more in need of this praise? I ask that the Leipzigers praise the open Eck; all those you praise may praise you, even with stentorian voices, and even so they will not praise you enough, so great is the necessity.

Yes, even I and the Wittenbergers praise and say: In everything you write and say the truth: Luther's letter is completely wrong; he has done you wrong, yes, he himself recants it. What more do you want? Now it is quite true that the merit is established in equity that the article

You have not denied the sects of the scholastic teachers, that servile fear (that is, sin and ungodliness) is the beginning of repentance, which otherwise must be done in grace, because it is through sinning (that is, through "not deserving") and through ungodliness (that is, through a work that is not pleasant) that we begin to deserve and do pleasant things. You have conquered, you have triumphed! Glory above all glory be to Eck, who has obtained that free will before grace is not attributed a merit by the scholastic teachers; but he has obtained it exceedingly easily, because no one has ever denied this.

And you believed or wanted to be believed, sincere man, that Carlstadt and Luther were so coarse that they would ever have imposed this monstrosity on the scholastic teachers or would have disputed about it, that it would have been necessary that you would have had to argue about this with such a big noise in such an excellent place? Why don't you write from Ingolstadt in the same way, with turned words, that by Purgatory you understood the belief in the Holy Trinity, so that we could boast that you had fought for it, that God is triune and one, which no one has ever denied, just as also not Purgatory, for which you have most laboriously disputed? But I praise you as an exceedingly clever disputator, who have invented for yourself the most certain way of disputing, and in seeking Christ follow the exceedingly shameful (Elenchistam) Aristotle, the sincere the sincere, the open the open, that you argue with words alienated from their proper meaning (that is his highest and only virtue) against imaginary enemies (Chimeras) who cannot strike back, meanwhile openly agreeing with the words of those with whom you dispute. What is in it? You can sit at home and shower yourself with triumphs and crowns because of the ghosts you have invented and overcome.

Rather, it was disputed whether free will not only did not deserve before grace, but also sinned, and approached godlessness by being intent on action, as Carlstadt's words clearly say.

If you did not want to challenge them, why did you offer to do so? Why did you admit them if they were false? Why didn't you at least make a mockery of your words of "non-denial", since that childish Carlstadt was present, whom you, since he is absent, from Ingolstadt, you heroic and open-minded man, despised so much? Only now has your gloss come into being, through which you want to escape, which you concealed at Leipzig, so that you would not be caught, you sincere and open man, as often as you were asked to do so.

I burn exceedingly on both sides, namely it laments me your, and I am unwilling about your cursed hypocrisy. You desist from seeking the truth of the theology. The trust (fides) in you is gone. Return to your impostor Aristotle, the most godless hypocrite among the philosophers, who never wanted to be respected for saying what he would have said. This one is your quite worthy teacher. O wretched man that it ever happened to me to have anything to do with you. "For the spirit of discipline fleeth deceitfulness," as Wisdom Cap. 1:5 [Vulg.] is written, and v. 1 it is said, "Seek him in simplicity of heart."

Why do you wonder that letters, rumors and all the monstrosities you accuse me of have followed this unfortunate disputation? It would be strange if something good followed this mockery of the Holy Spirit, the mockery of truth, the contempt of Christ. One thing I ask of you: that you henceforth (if it is possible) have nothing to do with Martin. I am more sorry for the books I have published against you than you may believe. The more I have taken you for an honest man, the more seriously I have been deceived and attacked.

For it is that you broke the agreement that it should be a free disputation, and did not want disputation to take place unless judges were appointed, and none other than scholastics of your ilk, whose cause you led, but secretly and with forged words, lest you disgrace yourself and them (if you had been open) in the most unfortunate way.

brought. It is that you refused that what was said should be recorded by notaries, or [wanted] that it should be recorded in such a way that the copies should neither be duplicated nor published, but suppressed until you could boast the judgment of your party, pretending that the judgment of the whole world does not please you, because the world is in trouble, as if you and your theologians were heaven, and one must believe that you are in a place before other people, where everything is well (in benigno). For in such a way you see through the core of the Scripture without hypocrisy. It is that you would not allow Carlstadt to have books or slips of paper, whom you should have urged and begged, if you had not pretended to investigate the truth, to have someone else read for him if he could not do it himself, even to give silent signs with his fingers. What does he do, what does he not suffer, who sincerely seeks the truth? Soon he is master, soon disciple, soon comrade, soon he becomes everything to everyone, so that the truth may come to light. Carlstadt presented himself to you as such, Luther presented himself to you as such. But you, who almost alone presume to love the truth, boast almost nothing else than that if this had been done, it would not have been a disputation, but I don't know what kind of childish thing, you would not have sought people like Thersites nor lesser people with whom you wanted to argue.

You, a theologian, dare to roll these words, brimming with the most abject honor, without shame into the midst of the praise of the honor you despise and the truth you love. If someone else had said this about you, you would have taken him for such a person, who tried to revile you as the worst hypocrite, as a nonsensical person, who would be worthy of you writing a cleansing pamphlet or something more annoying against him. Now you like to you, since you cackle this excellent praise with your own beak. Do you not believe, wretched man, that there are other people in the world than your Leipzigers, since one ass itches another (for not all itch you), who know what a sincere and open investigator of truth is, before whom this boasting of your sincerity is more stinking than any pestilential vapor? It is that you have suddenly turned the matter elsewhere, from free will to the activity of free will, - hui! how necessary a question to spoil the time.

Only now do I understand what the cause is that you have always detested the effort of writing, taking the most respectable hypocrisy as a pretext: you do not love the hurtful (aculeatum==stach light) way of writing. But you always challenge to a disputation, but to such a one, which, if it is written out, may not be published and submitted to the judgment of the whole world, unless it is judged by judges who please you and are extorted by force, of course ready, for this kind of disputation France, Italy, Germany, perhaps also the worlds of Democritus, if someone should reject this [world], [as a battlefield], namely because you know that in such disputations there is no place, neither for consideration nor for diligence, which you, an extremely sincere man, always consider suspicious, even harmful, in the investigation of truth, and that it is very easy to impute a foreign meaning to common words, which, since one may not compare the preceding and the following, then also the matter is suddenly turned to other things, can be very difficult to perceive, especially if it is intended to put on an appearance, so that no one should or could notice it, in that both the listeners and the judges are deceived by the boasting of universal truth. This danger for the truth and the annoyance of the most godless hypocrisy would not go very well in writing. You have therefore the some way to seek the truth, namely the confusion of the hasty disputation. Who would have ever understood also that that is the truth love and if you, new language teacher of words, did not teach like this with your party? so much are you entirely fiction and hypocrisy. Yes, in your entire purification writing there is almost nothing that you are not hypocritical, except in the angry accusation, although you also attach to this a little tail of feigned modesty. Before the disputation, men of good standing said to me: Beware, Martin; believe him who has experienced it. This man is nothing but pretense (fictio) and hypocrisy. I did not believe them, nor all my senses, although the letter of Erasmus 1) and the Apology of Udalricus Zasius also presented you to me as such: so constantly have I thought the best of you and would never have thought otherwise, if you had not publicly disgraced yourself before the world by this dunghill as the most hateful hypocrite.

Here belongs what you write in the disgusting and dirty letter 2) before other things to your highly famous Ingolstadters, although you (according to your quite obvious sincerity) bravely pretend that you did not boast of the victory, you had drawn Carlstadt over to your side to the activity of free will, and at the same time you are sorry that you had allowed him to make that excellent answer in the evening, by which, according to the judgment of all, he destroyed you, as you yourself confess. In one thing, you say, I was wrong; I made replies at night and gave him time to think. For you felt the mortal wound. What do you think would have happened if everything had been done with the same deliberation as it should have been? as the extremely praiseworthy prince, Duke George, had ordered, who wanted only the truth to be sought and everything that could be done to it to be done.

1) This is the letter of Erasmus to Eck of May 15, 1518, which appeared immediately after its appearance in the ^uctariurn sclcctururn aliquot epistolarnin aã cruãitos 6t boruna acl MuM in Basel with Johann Frobenius and caused much sensation. - With the same came out in March 1519 also 2a8ii ^poloZctica äckensio contra <1. Decium.

2) Eck's letter to the professors of law, Georg Hauer and Franz Burkhardt, from Leipzig, dated Misnias (Leipzig), July 1, 1519. Excerpted in Seckendorf, Hist. Uutb. I, x. 85b. In this volume, no. 396.

served best. You praise him, dear God, how sincerely! on your side, namely because you have been such executors of the will of the good prince.

What should you do sincerely for the truth, since you have not only made cunning plots with your own, so that the truth, which it was about, would not be sought with good consideration and carefully, but you also still boast in this wickedness, a mighty man in godlessness, and only lament that this your plot has failed to some extent? For this you also indicated by the public lamentation, since you almost wept that he had a copy of Notarius, while meanwhile you were praised by your Leipzigers that you, without caring about the copies, could also shout (I wanted to say disputing) well, nevertheless exceedingly victoriously. And how should you not have been able to do it, since you had taken the liberty to invent everything arbitrary? And yet you still impose yourself on us as an open and sincere corner, well known to all.

I pass over the other monstrosities with the rest in this letter, while I would like to describe you in a short epitome to the whole world what kind of man you are, if I were raging in vengeance (after your manner), since the other letter has also been published. But I spare the theological name, because it laments me your in truth. For the fact that you spout nothing but accusations against me throughout the whole purification letter, since you do it in the evil conscience of hypocrisy, hoping that in this way you will shut the mouth of the whole world and have them at your beck and call: 1) you should know that I am not moved by the accusations against me and by your and Leipzig's praise, but by your hypocrisies I am almost killed. This abomination Christ also bore with the utmost displeasure, while he otherwise received the public sinners and the publicans most meekly. And what would the sweetest truth have [more] 2) hated than the enemies of truth who sell themselves under the title of truth?

Furthermore, why do you exalt the judges so high? Is it because you have deceived their judgment, so that your ungodliness may be found and make you detestable? We have your cleansing scripture, which we can hold up to the whole world, and show that this disputation at Leipzig was a mockery of truth and Eck's hypocrisy, which I will open up further when your water bubble, 3) which you are now giving birth to, has come to light. In the meantime, I will not answer the other things of this pile of your dung; it is also not necessary, since this one piece in a short epitome shows enough who you are on the whole.

And to come back to you, I say and assert publicly before you and the whole world, by repeating and saying again that Carlstadt's theses are true, likewise also my letter. And in order to impress it strongly upon you, so that you do not fast other things into the eye and leave the present matter (as you are wont to do), I will indicate the summa to you in large letters:

If you admit that Carlstadt's theses are true, that the free will not only does not deserve before grace, but also sins damnably (you hear, you hear, Eck, do not hypocrite!) and does not approach only what is not deserving, but ungodliness to death by being intent on action,

So you are defeated and my letter is true; if you deny it, or pretend to admit it, you are a Pelagian. You are a man, and Carlstadt childish; we do not doubt that you will show your heroic bravery, but you should know that we will not believe you now as we did before; we will pay attention to the hypocrite whom we believed before, since he boasted sincerity. But you see to it that you read the Calendarium or Martyrs' Register or little-

3) Meant is the larger writing of Eck: ve kriiuatu ?etri ack versus I'u66erum lidri tres. InAosbadii 1520. folio. Erroneously, Löscher refers this to the papal bull to be obtained by Eck.

Meanwhile, at least, you diligently search the chronicle, from which you pile up many names on paper against us, but in such a way that you do not forget the dialectic, and do not make such a lame conclusion (as this one was).

But what you write of letters of the Bohemians, which, according to your sincerity, are fabricated or again hypocritical from your thoughts, and of my errors against the church, that pleases me, not because you speak the truth, but because your hopeless hypocrisy is so much abhorrent to me that even that pleases me, that you openly lie, judge, belittle. But it will be near the day that it will come to light whether you and yours have done more harm to the church of Christ through the prince of darkness, Aristotle, whom you yourselves (ipsum) do not understand, or whether I have done more harm. And to your conclusion, which is worthy of any stick-fool, that the Bohemians praise me, pray for me, is also answered to you in Emsers Bock 1).

Farewell, and may the Lord Jesus make your soul healthy for eternity. Amen.

1) Luther's addition to Emser's Bock. Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, 1212.

1st Happiness and Hail! It would be almost long and rambling to recount the order and proceedings of the Leipzig Disputation, but much more rambling and annoying to describe it. For as often as I think of this disputation, I am moved and inflamed; not out of love, as I know God is to Doctor Martinus, but because I carry the truth and have no doubt that it is certain, unchanging and eternally constant, but hateful to all great men. Although before this time I also considered it to be falsehood, as Eck together with his bunch considers it to be today.

2 It is no wonder, because Eck is completely unlearned in the holy scriptures. And, what is probably even more, he does not know as much about sophistry as befits and is due to such an excellent disputator, for whom he wants to be held; therefore he also boasts and claims to be a father and patron of sophistry. For I, too, have somewhat touched upon it, and if I understand the matter rightly (for I have no reason or discernment at all), Eck speaks everything that he thinks and has in mind without reason, judgment, and discernment, although he can almost pronounce the words that he has learned by heart and in memory with great splendor and respectable gift; not to seek the truth, but for a splendid presentation and display of his memory, and to defend the teachers of his sects. As is the habit and usage of all sophists or school teachers, who defend all their opinions and delusions with great boasting and clamor, and yet know not what they intend or say. I speak of this as one who has experienced the truth.

But so that you may believe me that it is true, listen to a saying from the Holy Scriptures, which Eck, among other sayings, with the advice of the most clumsy and dishonest sophists at Leipzig, has brought up and used to confirm the papal indulgence. It is written in Isaiah, chapter 61, v. 1: "The Spirit of the Lord is with me, therefore the Lord has anointed me. He sent me to preach to the wretched, that I might heal the contrite heart, and to preach indulgence, that is, forgiveness of sin, to the captives.

4 Behold, my dear Spalatin, for the sake of the word "indulgence," the sophists at Leipzig drew on a black tablet with chalk the saying they had found in the book called Concordantiae majoris Bibliae, so that the following day he could use it to obtain the papal indulgence, which he had recently asked for in order to win.

The prophet did not speak of the forgiveness of sins through indulgences, but of the incarnation of our dear Lord and Savior. Behold the wretched and grossly incomprehensible 1) sophists! But I am not surprised, because they know nothing. But I am very surprised that Eck has come to the disputation with the mentioned sentence, has led it in such a remarkable assembly, and has given it to the notaries in the feathers.

5 But that is true, Eck surpasses Doctor Carlstadt by far with his memory and pronouncement; so that I was sorry that the matter had begun; not that Eck had won, prevailed and triumphed, but that if the deal had not been given in the plumes, ours would have gone away with very great shame. For Eck argues and makes his case in the manner of the Welsh with nine or ten arguments, by which not truth, but vain honor of memory and intellect is sought; which is the Sophists, that is, all school teachers, of whom St. Paul says [2 Tim. 2, 16. 23. They are turned to useless talk, yet they want to be teachers of the Scriptures, and do not understand what they say or say; for they deal in foolish and foolish questions, which give birth to war, strife and dissension, of which St. Paul says [1 Tim. 6:20] that one should refrain from such talk. On this, the corner, together with his own, yes, together with all the sophists, gives himself first to the whales, who, if they are inclined to a teacher, refrain from defending his doctrine and opinion to the death, even though the greatest falsity and untruth is found in it. This cannot be done better than with great clamor, and with a great deal of argument and rebuttal. For the listeners consider only the one to be the victor who shouts the most and keeps the last word. Because Eck has always had the last word and shouted the most, he is therefore honored and considered the victor even today by the people of Leipzig. Truly, I would not have answered him more than on one and the first argument, and if I had misplaced it together with his rebuttal and rejoinder, I would have proceeded further.

purest gold. But in this alone Eck surpasses D. Martinum, that Eck cries out more than D. Martin. And so much of the disputators.

Therefore we have been in the most inconvenient and dangerous place, and with and among the worst enemies than I think we have on earth. But enough of that. But I will tell you more about our coming together.

Spalatin's Relation of the Disputation at Leipzig.

From Spalatin's "Yearbooks of Luther's Reformation," p. 30.

In the year after Christ's birth in 1519, Doctor Eck of Ingolstadt came to the conclusion that in Leyptzick, immediately under the reign of Charles the Fifth, 2) a dispute was held between him and Doctor Andreas Bodensteyn of Karlstadt. 2) a dispute between them and Doctor Andreas Bodensteyn of Karlstadt was held in the presence of the entire Vniuersitet, also Duke Georgen of Saxony; in which they caused Doctor Martinum to attack not only the indulgence, but also purgatory more harshly than had happened before. They also had the revised sentences printed along with their interpretation.

Since Duke George of Saxony, and only many secular princes, have gladly accepted many of the articles of this Christian religion, Doctor Martinus has taken the primacy of the bishop, and the bishop is not the supreme commanding bishop.

2) That is: election; the imperial election took place at Frankfurt.

of the whole of Christendom, in the same dispute has also attacked hard, caused among other things by the fact that Doctor Eck, and his group, against the understanding of the holy divine scripture, the rock, where Christ says Matthew on the sixteenth to Peter, you are Peter, and on this rock I want to build my kyrchen, or common, on Peter, and not on Christ; So Docter Eck and his like want to protect, preserve, and write the Babst, and his power against Christ himself, and his poor, clean little home, and make great, whole books, full of useful, antichristian talk and chatter. So that they not only, the longer they went on, corrupted many good-hearted people's consciences, but also corrupted the priesthood's business to the highest degree. That the Babst, and the whole Babstumb of such scribes and servants, could only well have dispensed with. And certainly their business, where such useless, unchristian, wicked writers, hearts, and books were not brought in, would not easily come to such waste.

388: Myconius' account of it.

From Friedrich Myconius Historia Reformationis, p. 34.

Hertzog Jörg of Saxony was not yet bitter at this time, but he did not like the fact that one should drive so swiftly with the scholars without recognition and without being overcome: however, he was annoyed that the high school in Wittenberg was held in such high esteem, and that Leipzig was held in low esteem. Doctor Eck of Ingolstadt came with great arrogance to subdue the Wittenbergers, Carlstadt and Lutherum. The debate was ordered in Leipzig, at the castle, in the large court room. There came learned people from all countries, to hear and to see how the matter would turn out. It was in the summer, in the month of July, that it was good to walk and many people could come. From both sides there was a very sharp dispute. Eccius led many patres, glosses, interpretations, and canons, but Luther brought the Scriptures and ancient obscenities. There were notaries who wrote everything down. And in sum: the act 1) went out by the pressure, who has desire, may read it.

Eccius was everywhere in the coming in splendidly held: But, do he herüm zohe, and the things had not better aligned, he becomes of the Ge

The gospel was also well defended, especially in Erfurt, with writings and other means. From that day on, Eccius remained an enemy and persecutor until this hour: and he incited against the Gospel the dukes of Beyern, King Ferdinand, the bishops, of whom he is a common idol; and whom he only controlled.

389 Des Johann Aurifaber Historie von der zu Leipzig Anno 1519 gehaltenen Disputation, an Georg Spalatini geschrieben [angeblich] im Juli 1519.

From the first Eisleben part, p. 8 printed in the Altenburg edition, Vol. I, p. 293; in the Leipzig edition, Vol. XVII, p. 249 and in Löscher, Ref.-Acta, Vol. III, p. 273. The superscription to this document, which we have taken from Walch's old edition, is in any case wrong. For Aurifaber was born only one year after the Leipzig Disputation, in 1520. He died at Erfurt in 1576 at the age of 56. This writing is to be regarded only as an abstract from the Leipzig acts, written after 1555. Compare the last note to this writing.

When Martin Luther's teachings, writings and books had spread to all countries and he had many opponents who opposed him, Duke George of Saxony scheduled a disputation and discussion in the city of Leipzig in the month of July. There came D. Luther, with D. Andreas Carlstadt, and M. Philippus Melanchthon, whom Duke Friedrich, Elector of Saxony, had appointed to the high school in Wittenberg as professor of the Greek language, only one year before. However, D. Johann Eck also came there to discuss with D. Carlstadt.

2 On the fourth day of July the disputation was begun by D. Johann Eck. He had prepared a number of articles for discussion, the last of which was that all those who taught that the Roman Church before the time of Pope Sylvester was not the first, foremost and highest above all others, were hardly mistaken. For all and at all times the Pope, who sat in the chair and faith of St. Peter (who was the highest among all the other apostles), was recognized and considered to be a descendant of Peter and the governor of the Lord Christ here on earth.

Luther opposed this article with another one, which he found quite repugnant, namely, that those who claim that the Roman church is the supreme one over all churches have only as a makeshift and a cap of some popes' decrees and statutes, which alone were written four hundred years ago; but it would be contrary to the Holy Scriptures, and to the glorious, excellent Council of Nicaea, as well as to all decrees and most credible histories, written a thousand years ago.

4 When D. Johann Eck began the reported disputation, and dealt with the Pope's primacy and supreme power in Rome for the first time, Luther replied that he would have preferred that this article, so otherwise much hated and not at all necessary, had been discontinued this time, in honor of the Pope. And it would hurt him that he would be driven to it by D. Ecken.

5 Against this, D. Eck said that D. Luther, and not he, had aroused such quarrels and unrest, because he had publicly disputed in the first interpretation of his articles that the Pope at Rome before the times of Pope Silvester was by no means above the others as far as sovereignty, dignity and order were concerned, and had freely confessed before Cardinal Cajetano that Pope Pelagius had interpreted and understood many sayings of the Holy Scriptures according to his liking. Since this is the case, one should not blame him, but Luther.

Thus the first dispute was about the monarchy and supreme power of the pope in Rome. Eck wanted this to be established and founded in God's Word, and called Luther, who did not believe this but held it against him, a Bohemian heretic, because Johann Hus, a hundred years ago, also contested this article of the Pope's sovereignty and authority, and was of the same opinion as Luther. Luther's opinion.

Luther answered for this blasphemy, pointing out that at the time of the apostles, the church of Christ was planted and spread far and wide in all lands, probably twenty years earlier, when the apostle Peter came to Rome and destroyed the same church. Therefore, the Roman church could not be the highest and most noble above all other churches.

After this, D. Eck also disputed Luther's other articles, which he had written on human free will, purgatory, papal indulgences, penance, remission of penance and guilt, and the power of priests. This disputation ended and was decided on the 14th day of July, and Luther 1) publicly published such disputation in print.

as then in the first German Jenische Tomo the same to find. 2)

9 This disputation was not primarily scheduled by D. Luther, but by D. Carlstadt and D. Corners because of D. Carlstadt. But when Luther accompanied Carlstadt and came to Leipzig to listen, he was forced to debate with him by D. Ecken, who then brought him a safe conduct from Duke Georgen. In this disputation, D. Eck went too far and made erroneous, ungodly speeches, and caused D. Luthern to have the same discussion in Leipzig. Luther caused him to publish them in public print, and thus Luther's teachings became more and more widespread.

The letter of Petrus Mosellanus from the Leipzig Disputation to the famous Wilibald Pirkheimer, dated August 3, 1519.

This letter was first made known by Scultetus in anuall. svanML. rsnovat. ad ann. 1519, x". 28. from which Seckendorf, Hi8t. Lutk., iid. I, p. 90d, and Elias Frick has translated it in his German Seckendorf, p. 202. Because this writing is only of secondary importance, we have confined ourselves to an improvement of it according to Seckendorf.

Translated from the Latin by Elias Frick.

A rare and pleasant spectacle took place in Leipzig these days, namely a disputation of eminent theologians, of which you undoubtedly require a more detailed report. However, the faintness that still remains from the severe illness, from which I had to lie for a whole fortnight, does not allow me to describe the matter more precisely. Thus, the hardship I had to endure on the journey to Trier for the sake of my private affairs has taken away quite a bit of my spirits, which is why I only want to report the most important things recently.

On the 27th of June, 3) which day was determined for the beginning of this matter, by order and at the expense of my most noble prince, Duke George, a respectable service was held in the morning with splendid music in honor of the Holy Spirit, after the completion of which the foreign doctors, who were to debate, were led into the castle accompanied by a respectable procession of the entire university. For

2) These words prove that our writing must have been written after 1555, because in that year the first edition of the first volume of the Jena edition appeared.

3) In Seckendorf wrong: XVIII. Junii.

1) This information is incorrect. Compare the introductory note to Document 377.

There, an excellent room had been turned into an auditorium, with beautiful wallpaper, cathedrals and pulpits. This place was guarded by a number of armed citizens in such a way that not every common man (for a large number of learned and unlearned people had gathered for this spectacle) was allowed to enter.

When they had come in and sat down, I entered the pulpit and, in the name of my most noble Duke, reminded the disputants of their office and delivered a long speech on the proper way to disputes in theological matters; however, this matter was perhaps treated more freely than would have been pleasant to all. The duke himself read the speech before it was delivered, and liked it very much. He was astonished that theologians were so foolish, even godless, that one had to give them such a reminder. I send it to you herewith, after I have let it go out in print by princely order; you may read and evaluate it on occasion. But I will proceed to the matter itself.

After I had finished the speech, the chant "Come, Holy Spirit" was sung three times with vocal and instrumental music, which the Duke had ordered on my advice. This was the end of the preparations, and because it was time to dine at noon, the serious beginning of the disputation was postponed until two o'clock. When this hour had come, both parts protested, after the manner of theologians, because of their sincerity in faith. Martinus added that he did not like to see Dominicans, who had caused this whole tragedy in the first place, there to debate, since otherwise they would have aroused hatred in all their sermons against Martin's errors.

First, Carlstadt and Eck were left together, a very unequal pair. For Carlstadt showed a theological modesty in his voice, face, gestures and gait, and did not argue to gain the honor of scholarship or victory, but to investigate the truth; therefore, he did not assert anything other than with the aid of books, nor did he want to assume anything from the opposite, because he would have found the mind of the person addressed to be correct from words that preceded and followed. By this diligence, he highly recommended himself to the scholars; the unscholars, however, considered this to be timidity and slowness. Eck, on the other hand, seemed to be insolent because of his shouting, defiant soldier's face, almost comedic gestures and proud gait. All of this gave an indication of the mind is not very theological. You would have said, where you saw it, a Gorgias, not a theologian, disputer. So frivolous and impudent he often boasted himself. Thus he has given a great blow to his name with us. It is easy for him to assert what is false; on the other hand, he insolently denies what is certainly true, and in addition, with great boasting, to make the matter more odious.

(6) Eck dealt with Carlstadt about free will: Whether every good work comes from the grace of God; or whether free will also contributes something from its own strength? The first was put by Carlstadt; the other was defended by Eck. Then the question was raised: Whether the whole life of Christians is a constant repentance? From which it flowed that men in their good works have also subverted sin, against which Eck argued.

7 Martinus denied that the pope had his sovereignty by divine right, that is, that it could be proven from Scripture. Yes, according to Paul's teaching, every priest is equally a successor of the apostles, and has the power to forgive guilt and punishment in case of need. Against this, Eck drew on a large number of decrees and sayings from the fathers, since this should be proven by divine right. Finally, he came to the last key, namely the saying of Matth. 16: "You are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church. Martinus wanted the rock to be understood as the glorious creed, or the whole body of the church with Origen, or Christ himself with Augustine. Eck, however, with the new scribes the man Peter and his successors, which explanation he tried to strengthen with some passages torn out of Bernard and Jerome. Martinus refuted all this extraordinarily well, because in this way the church would be without a head as often as a pope departs with death, for it must without doubt be without a head as long as the papal chair remains vacant. Against this, nothing would help what is claimed by the cardinals who meanwhile represent the papal office. This is null and void for two reasons: first, because the cardinals have only arisen a few centuries ago, who are many heads, not one head; second, because what is divine right cannot be interrupted by any man's death, or even by the whole world's destruction.

8) The indulgence was also raised for discussion, but more in jest than in earnest.

9. there was such a dispute about purgatory that people were

He did not doubt the same, but acted as the souls in it were against God.

10 Three weeks were spent on such a dispute, from which, as far as I understand, more was expected than was gained. For nothing has been decided in it, nor have the parties reached agreement on any matter. The whole matter was recorded by notaries. The Erfurt and Paris judges were chosen to judge the dispute. However, as far as I can gather from some private discourses of the Erfurters, they are reluctant to accept the burden of such a great burden, as for other reasons, but especially because Eck has excluded the best and most learned theologians of this university, as suspicious, from the judging.

11 It is generally thought that Eck will start badly in defense of the papal primacy. But, it may go as it will, I do not care. To me, this theatrical way of disputing does not seem at all similar to the gentle teaching of Christ, nor will anyone persuade me to believe that the Holy Spirit, who is a spirit of peace, is involved in such actions. The truth of Christian doctrine is more likely to be attained by devotional prayer than by disputation. You have herewith described the whole disputation, however industriously and in haste. What else may have happened, you have probably already heard through rumor. But you will see whom you believe. For the common legend reports something false as easily as true, and you know that there are many new things in war. Erfurt, 3 Aug. 1) 1519.

391: Petrus Mosellanus' other description of this disputation in a letter to Julius von Pflug, a nobleman from Meissen. Dec. 6, 1519.

This writing has D. Joh. Förster in 1609 at Wittenberg printed under the title Streun, lüpsieusis, then it is included in Schiller's 1)6 lidertntk 666168inrum Osminuine, x>. 840, then in the "innocent news" 1702, p. 104 and 154 and in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. III, p. 242. According to the latter, we have revised the old translation.

Translated into German.

1) At Seckendorf: quiuto Xounn ^uAustnn, an impossible date, because there are only four days before the nones in August. Therefore we have kept the date set by Frick.

Peter Mosellanus to his beloved Julius his greeting!

I. The other day, as I had traveled from my city of Trier, where I had gone with the prince's permission for a certain matter, to your fatherland, and did not suspect anything bad, I encountered such a great change in all things that I cannot be surprised enough at the so unexpected change in human things. For as soon as I arrived in Erfurt on my return journey, good friends, of whom I have many and great ones there, told me about the civil or rather family wars of the Saxons among each other; likewise about the scholars' disputes in Leipzig and Wittenberg, which had gone out since my departure on the occasion of the famous disputation, and were continuing to increase without end; to which I myself also belonged. Finally, which was the greatest misfortune of all, they presented the plight of the rampant plague to me so terribly, and painted it before my eyes, as it were, that I almost froze over it with Aeneas in Virgil, my hair stood on end, and my tongue stuck to the roof of my mouth.

2 Although the good people not only admonished me, but also pleaded with me under very acceptable suggestions that I should at least stay with them through the winter, and not put my health, which would otherwise be very weak, in danger, I still preferred to go to the fire, and to see the devastation and nature of the fire more closely. Therefore, I stayed only two days to rest the horses and traveled to Naumburg to our Kyneck. As a good friend, he welcomed me warmly and gave me some news of my affairs, and also reported that you had returned from Italy. In the midst of the misfortune, I was so pleased that I almost forgot all my sorrow, just as the peasants tend to be happy when, after a long rain, the lovely sun finally lets its golden head shine out of the clouds again. But I had neither rest nor peace with this man, because the enemy (scil. plague) was already within the walls, and death could be seen everywhere. Therefore, early the next day, when I had arrived there, I left Leipzig to the left and traveled eagerly to Pegau in the certain hope of speaking to you. I found Marcus, your father's scribe, in the inn. I asked if you were at home or in Meissen? He said: In Meissen. Then I did not know what to do. For I had already decided to go to Meissen,

I stayed all the more because I wanted to see you after such a long time and enjoy your pleasant company. But all my household goods were still waiting for my return to Leipzig, since I would go to Meissen in vain without books, and at the same time the plague deterred me from Leipzig. Since I was so in doubt, it finally seemed most advisable to me for the sake of my health to go straight to Meissen to see you. However, it happened by chance that, since we were already ready to leave and the horses were saddled, there was gossip among the people: D. Alexander von Tzneymani, to whom I had ordered my things when I left, was with his brother in a house near Merseburg: the place is called Kötzlin. Then I asked diligently: how far is this place from your Pegau, and whether I could still get there by day? Since they said yes, I traveled across the fields, because there is no way there, and arrived there in the evening. There we spent almost three days with each other, while our dear and kind friend did us all the honor he could, and the servant in the city cleared out and packed the things, and then looked for carters who were to take it away. Since we are now making our arrangements in this way and not getting far, behold! in the meantime, our Julius has moved away from Meissen again and slipped away from us. Since I had now lost all hope of seeing each other and of amusing ourselves by friendly conversation, I wanted to dare something anew and leave this letter to you. Since I had already finished it, yours came to me quite unexpectedly. From this I have understood that my fate has hurt you in this as much as it has hurt me, although I would have been more interested in it than you, because I would have talked to you not only about common things, but also especially about certain of my own affairs, as my best friend. So I will do as you do, and what could not be done verbally, I will do in writing.

3) For as far as the matter of the theologian Martin is concerned, which has been made so hateful by the zeal of so many sophists here, and of which you would like to know the correct course of events, I am of the opinion that I do not like to entrust such things to a letter, even if it is sealed, nor do I consider it safe; but since I do not seem to deny anything to my Julius, I will faithfully and recently depict the whole tragedy as it happened, but with the proviso that no foreign spectator is present, because otherwise my larva will fall right in the middle of the game.

4 At the beginning one knows quite well, without my telling, how hated Martin's whole enterprise had been by all, who either do not know the wickedness of the Roman fellows, or have enjoyed the vices of the same, or have spent their whole life with sophistical crickets. Although both sides have argued by propositions that were spread throughout Germany, in that Luther eradicates from theology the Aristotelian philosophy, which they alone hold, although they do not understand it: yet they seize it, as their treasure, with all their might, and seek to defend it by all means, with honesty or roguishness, which they consider permissible against the enemy in war. For not only have our Leipzigers opposed their propositions to those of Martin, but Eck, who is a theologian in Bavaria, and who wants to rise as high as if he had more than a familiar Socratic spirit (which could solve all his riddles), because such an innovation annoys him, has presented the bishop of Eichstädt with some remarks against Martinus. And since Martinus had learned this from his friends, he soon incited Carlstadt, the archidiaconus in Wittenberg, against him through his friends, and wanted to force the man to recant. He did answer several times, but in my opinion much too shallowly to bring about respect for his special erudition in an honest reader. For Eck is not so ready with the pen as with the tongue, and has a good capacity to prattle, but not to judge rightly. Since he could not make much headway in such a battle, he called for a public battle and disputation, because he thought he would do best there, as a horse in the open field. The Wittenbergers accepted the fight. So both were given permission to do so in our theological assembly or auditorium, for which July 27 had been appointed. Both arrived in good time. Eck alone with a few servants, whom he had also hired, recommended to our prince by Fugger's letter. Martin and Carlstadt brought with them a considerable crowd from their university, including the excellent Prince Barnim from Pomerania, a very modest prince who was very devoted to his studies and especially gracious to me. However, a large crowd came to see the exit, from all kinds of people, elders, counts, knights of the golden river, scholars and unscholars, that there was not a single auditorium.

This school, many of which are large enough, could hold all the listeners. But the prince took care of that. Because he had foreseen the matter, he had the large hall in the castle prepared for this purpose. And because he allowed the parties to debate against the will of the bishop in Merseburg, and because the others objected, he also took all precautions. He ordered the council to arrange for lodgings according to the status of each guest, and at the same time, to prevent the tumult, he ordered guards. So everything is going well, especially since your father, in the name of the prince, has taken care of everything, and even arranged everything himself.

When the appointed day appeared, early at six o'clock (according to our way of reckoning) in the St. Thomas Church, for the better progress of the project, a mass with all kinds of music was splendidly held. Afterwards, a magnificent procession rushed in droves to the castle. To prevent all the riffraff from entering, sufficient guards had been placed at the gate. But after all had entered and everyone had sat down in a proper place, I poor man, who was not yet completely free of fever and had been let in from behind, climbed up on the pulpit to speak in the name of the prince, at which everyone became quiet and attentive. At first, I confess, I was a little frightened by so many and so large a gathering, such a great waiting of all listeners, and such a great prince's person, whom I was to introduce. However, I delivered the speech, if not with great praise, then certainly in such a way that the prince himself was satisfied with all the kind-hearted people or listeners. When the speech was over, and everyone had had enough (for almost two hours [clepsydrae] had elapsed), some musi

In the middle of the morning, the choir, which had also been prepared by me for this purpose and had entered through the back entrance, played the song: Komm, Heiliger Geist 2c. most lovingly, while all listeners reverently fell on their knees. Since this preparation of the morning had taken place, they left for the midday meal, and a herald proclaimed that they would like to rejoice after the meal. All came back with desire. Carlstadt and Eck, having asked for leniency each for himself, entered the battlefield. They argued about free will, namely how it behaved against the salutary work of a human being. For Carlstadt sought to substantiate: that what would be wholesome only in man's deeds or words, everything would come from God, as the unified source of all good. Man's will would not add anything good by its attunement, but would only receive the influence of heavenly grace. In short: God is the smith, our free will the hammer, so that he forges our salvation. This opinion, which is not at all inconsistent (where I understand otherwise), was contradicted by Eck for three whole days, by giving partly to grace, partly to man's will a meritorious work (so he called it). Finally it came about that Eck admitted: the whole good work comes from God, but not in a complete way, and gave the speaker reason of the related things completely good night. Carlstadt not only laughed at this bad way of differentiation, but also refuted it afterwards in a long printed letter as a ludicrous little fiction. Whether others like this writing, I cannot say; but I liked it, as far as the matter itself is concerned.

6 Martin took over from Carlstadt and wanted to defend this: namely, that one proves only from decrees that the Roman Church and its bishop are above all others, but that the Scriptures and the reputation of the Nicene Conciliar dispute this. Eck made every effort to overturn this sentence and spent eight days on it, while he would have liked to make the man even more hated by advancing most of the articles of the Bohemian mob. But Martinus, who was well aware of such traps, sighed seriously and deeply that he was being dragged along so cunningly and completely out of order. He also rejected the advanced doctrines partly with great zeal, but partly accepted them as Christian, and everywhere drew the most important testimonies of Scripture or ancient conciliar conclusions for himself. In short, he took so much trouble in nothing as to reject the Bohemian mob's suspicion of him, since Eck, on the other hand, went out of his way to teach people this opinion of Martin, no matter how much Martinus argued against it. With these and other matters, about the state of the souls in purgatory, about penance, about fear, about indulgences, 2c., almost ten days went by, and would not have come to an end if news had not come that Joachim, Margrave of Brandenburg, who was returning from Frankfurt from the Elector's Day, was near. For the same had to be arranged for at our prince's request.

1) In Löscher erroneously: XX.

The first thing to be done was to destroy the hostel at the castle in Leipzig. That is why they parted in such a way that both parties boasted of the victory. For Eck triumphs with all who, like donkeys listening to the lyre, do not understand the matter, or have always been above Peter Hispanus 1) since childhood, or are otherwise grudging to the Wittenbergers. Martin's and Carlstadt's victory is the less famous or known, the fewer the scholars and wise men are, and those who do not like to brag about their things.

Thus you have the trade, briefly and above told, since much is omitted which so mainly does not belong to the matter. But why don't you also applaud? Perhaps I have not presented the game properly, or you have not yet had enough and want to see more. So I want to fill you up with this meal to the point of surfeit, and describe the leaders of this battle with vivid colors.

Martin is of medium length, lean from worry and study, so that one could almost count the bones through the skin, still of manly and fresh age, and has a clear, penetrating voice. But he is full of erudition and excellent knowledge of the Scriptures, so that he can count everything on his fingers, as it were. He knows so much Greek and Hebrew that he can judge the interpretations. Nor is he lacking in things, for he has a large forest or stock of words and things. According to his life and manners, he is very polite and friendly, and has nothing sour or austere (stoicum) about him; indeed, he is able to be at ease at all times. In company he is merry, jocular, lively, and always joyful, always cheerful and cheerful face, whether the adversaries still threaten him so much that one can hardly think that the man without God would undertake such important things. But the one fault all blame on him is that he is a little too insolent and biting in punishing, more than is proper to one who is going a new way in theology (χαίροτο- μούνη), surely, or to a divine scholar. This defect has probably all, who have been taught a little late, in themselves.

9. all this is the same in Carlstadt, only in a slightly lesser degree, except that he is even smaller in stature, and black-brown, burnt face, unpleasant and unpleasant voice, weaker in memory and quicker to anger.

1) Petrus Hispanus was the first textbook of logic at that time. Luther calls it a "children's dialectic", St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 1010, § 289, and the same Col, 1016, K 307 at the end: xuerilia.

10 Eck, on the other hand, is tall and long, of a strong and four-toned body, full and quite German voice, which is supported by a very strong chest, that he is not only suitable for a tragedian, but also for a herald, however, that it is more rough than clear; therefore, he has nothing less than the sweet sound of the Ciceronian mouth, which one praises so much in Fabius and Cicero. His whole face, eyes and sight are also such that one should rather make a butcher or Carian soldier, 2) than a theologian out of him. As for his wit and head, he has an excellent memory, and if an equal intellect were present, he would have been quite a masterpiece of nature. But he does not have a great ability to see things quickly or to judge them sharply, without which all other gifts are nothing. And this is the cause that, when he disputes, he cites such a heap of reasons, testimonies of Scripture, sayings of experts, one after the other, without any proper selection, and does not notice how most of it does not rhyme at all, how it, properly understood in its place, does not serve the cause, and how much is not genuine, or sophistical. For that is only his business, that he brings forward a heap of testimonies, and makes a dazzle to the listeners, who are mostly not so perceptive, and teaches them the opinion that he has won. In doing so, he is full of unbelievable impudence, but he can conceal it in the most mischievous way. For, when he sees that he is sometimes entangled in the ropes of the adversaries, he soon directs the disputation to something else. Sometimes, however, he even uses the opponent's opinion in words other than his own, and on the other hand, he pins his unrhymed opinion on his opponent in a cunning way, so that Socrates would not seem wiser than he is, except that the latter pretended to be ignorant and decided nothing but certainty, while the latter pretends to be peripatetic confidence in the knowledge of himself and practices the art of flattery. Behold! There you have a true Apelles, if not such an artist as he was, yet certainly one who does not lack effort and diligence.

11 Now I wanted to think about my own things, but since this is already more than a letter, and your dean is too distinguished to be burdened with too many writings, I will close when I have only added something about other things.

2) Compare Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 24 u.

You will not believe how almost everyone, after we were transferred here, became much more lenient toward Martin, especially the letter carrier (dean); it does not even occur to him that he wanted to write against him. What should he write, the old man who has become childish again? Your Doctor Gainz has correct thoughts about this matter, D. Gabelenz, likewise Heinrich Monachus, D. Germestorff, Johann von Maltiz, a dear man, and quite equal to you. With the others I have not much to do, nor much to hope from them. The Bishop of Trier, however, to whom the Pope has entrusted Martin's cause, does not wish him ill, which I was able to hear from his conversation the other day, when I was invited by him to lunch in my fatherland. That is a wise and generous gentleman, that he does not ask much of those at Rome in this matter. Franz von Sickingen, the brave German hero, is urging Hoogstraten and his companions to compensate our Capnio (assassin) for the damage he has suffered for their sake, and to do so within a certain time, otherwise he threatens to do them and the Cologne country all harm. For Reuchlin's enemies have been condemned to the expense, as they say.

Ulrich Hutten establishes a school of three languages at Mainz at his prince's expense. You see how the whole of Germany has begun to focus on study in this way in just a few years. And this is mainly thanks to Prince Frederick. He is now sending Matthew Adrian, the most learned Hebrew of our time, who is a physician by profession, from Louvain to Wittenberg with a large salary. This school, against our thanks and will, is now coming to Leipzig's ruin beyond measure, so that I should be sorry for the Leipzigers, if hope of better times in the future were not to be drawn from you and your like young people.

14 My prince recently wanted to keep me in Trier, and those in Erfurt have also made efforts to keep me here. Mainz has also offered us a place. What you advise us, I do not know. But I am of the mind that I do not like to move back and forth like swallows. I must certainly travel to Italy to buy the doctorate there. I have planned to do this for about one or two years, but no more. However, I will write to you about this project at another convenient time.

The prince seems to me to be becoming more and more merciful, as does your father and the other great ones.

In particular, the venerable father, Abbot Martin of (Kloster-) Zell, is doing me a great deal of good in my exile, 1) from whose house, which he has in Meissen, I am writing this to you. Wolfgang Fabricius Capito, a very learned theologian in all three languages, has been chosen as preacher of the church in Mainz, which is a very lucrative priesthood there, hitherto possessed by the bad theologians. Theology everywhere will be restored to its former integrity, to which I have also decided to contribute something according to my ability, and therefore have begun to translate four books of theology of Gregory of Nazianzus into Latin, but do not know how happily. For these days Oecolampadius, a preacher of Augsburg, has also written that he intends to do the same. That is why he asks me to give him a detailed written report of what I am doing. For if he knows that I am willing to do the same, he will gladly refrain. But I think it would be better for me to avoid such a great man.

16 Erasmus now writes interpretations of Paul. Germany is now at peace from the war, but almost everything is down with the plague. We hardly have a corner where we can remain safe. I sincerely wish our Hess that he may be well, to whom I would have sent the Crocus books he requested long ago, if they could be had. As far as I know, they are not for sale anywhere. This Crocus of ours lives at his royal court, and calls me in letters to England, but I do not know whether one may trust.

17 I do not send you my Lappereien, which I have published, because I shy away from the nose of the Italians, although Beatus Rhenanus has written to me that they have been reissued in Basel, and would be brought to Italy by the bald bookman 2). Spiegel I wish all the best. Petrus Suavenius, a Pomeranian nobleman, my student, who loves you very much, because he is quite like you, recommends himself very well. I will remember you and your praiseworthy qualities here with all, especially the scholars. For there is probably no scholar in Germany who is famous in something with which I am not, praise God, somewhat acquainted. One respects me more than I find in myself, or this age and my unworthiness deserves.

1) Because he was transferred from Leipzig to Meissen because of the plague.

2) a calvo Bibliopola: perhaps from the bookkeeper Calvus?

Goodbye and write us back very much through the Dean. For I would live with you in Italy if I had known the least about your return and had put my affairs in order at home and here with the Prince. Farewell once again. You will send several keels (calumos) here when the opportunity arises. Meissen, December 6, 1519, in a hurry, as you see.

The Leipzig Colloquium, described by M. Sebastian Fröschel, who himself listened to it.

This report is taken from the preface of M. Sebastian Fröschel to the book published by him in 1566 at Wittenberg in quarto "Vom Königreich Jesu Christi und seinem ewigen Priesterthum" printed in Löschers Ref.-Acta, Vol. III, p. 276 and in the "unschuldigen Nachrichten" 1717, p. 13.

Doctor Eck, when he had now disputed in several universities, as in Vienna and elsewhere, and had commonly been superior and had become a knight; when now D. Martin Luther had also issued positiones against the pope's indulgences and pen Tetzl, a monk in Leipzig, an order of preachers, and had the same positiones publicly disputed and defended in the university in Wittenberg, and had them issued in print; when D. Eck in Ingolstadt had heard, experienced and read such things, he also approached D. M. Luther and offered him and those of Wittenberg the opportunity to have them printed. Luther, and offered him and those of Wittenberg to debate with them publicly in another famous university, and requested this in writing from the lords of the university in Leipzig, as from the theologians, and from the old collegiates and colonels, that they allow him to debate publicly with the Wittenbergers there in Leipzig. But they summarily refused to allow D. Eck to do so. Then Doctor Eck wrote to the Duke of Saxony and asked his F. G. to allow him to debate with the Wittenbergers in Leipzig. The Duke of Saxony wrote to the Duke of Saxony and asked his F. G. to allow him to debate with the Wittenbergers in Leipzig. Eck, should be allowed to debate with each other. Duke Georg himself came to Leipzig at the same time of the disputation, and also lent his castle in Leipzig for this purpose, and had the court room cleared out and made into a lectorium, and decorated most beautifully with cathedrals, which were two above each other, and with benches and tables, at which the notaries sat, and excipitated the arguments, and all of them were invited to speak.

and hang all benches and cathedrals with beautiful wallpaper; the Wittenbergers with St. Martin's, D. Eck with the knight St. George. For D. Eck thought he wanted to become a knight of the Wittenbergers, and thus be knighted for the sake of the Wittenbergers, as he was also honestly knighted by them, then and after the disputation.

Doctor Eck came to Leipzig at that time, before the feast of Corporis Christi, and at the feast in the procession (which was held there, and was quite splendid and magnificent) D. Eck went around in a chasuble - or casel, next to the theologians, and thus let himself be seen well before the disputation, as if he were unafraid of those from Wittenberg. On the Friday after Corporis Christi, those from Wittenberg arrived (as I myself saw), and drove to the Grimmisches Thor in the city of Leipzig, and their students ran along beside the wagons with spears and halberds, and thus accompanied their masters; and D. Carlstadts drove in front, then D. Martinus and Philippus blessed also in a wheeled cart, and all of them had no draped or covered cart. And as they entered the Grimm Gate, and came to the door of the churchyard of St. Paul's Church, D. Carlstadt's chariot broke, and he, the doctor, fell down into the mud. But Doctor Martinus and Mr. Philippus Melancthon passed by, so that the people who saw this said: This one will succumb (meant D. Martin Luther blessed), and the other one will succumb, Doctor Carlstadt, as also happened, and has happened so far. Praise be to God! Also in the hostels, where the Wittenberg students lay, the host had to let one stand in front of the table with a halberd, who kept peace; thus the Wittenberg students came together with the Leipzigers with disputes. I saw all this myself in the house of Herbiopolis, 1) the book printer, where I went to table and sat next to Mr. D. Metzler from Breslau, who had come from Italy shortly before, and stayed for a while in Leipzig, and also read Greek, that he did not celebrate, because he could not be idle. There was also a magister at the table, who lived in the house, and was called Magister Baumgärtner, was a preacher, who had moved around for a long time with the pope's indulgences with Tetzl, and had helped him with his preaching. And the same M. Baumgärtner was so vehement against the Wittenbergers that the host Herbiopolis, a book printer, had to hold one of them.

with a halberd, so that peace was maintained at the table as long as the Wittenbergers were there at the inn and sat and ate at the table. Shortly after the disputation, the same M. Baumgärtner became so enraged with one of the nobility, on account of D. Martin Luther, that he gave up his spirit soon after; I also had to help him to the grave. On Saturday after Corporis Christi Bock Emser came: Dear Domine, from where do you come, you should be called Parcite, who would be the pious Emser. The same Bock Emser came to me and to other young magistrates, and asked us on behalf of the rector and the university that we should stand by D. Eck on Sunday, and go with him out of the castle, where they would act and conclude how and when the disputation should be started and held, and in what form. So it was decided there that Doctor Carlstadt should begin disputing with D. Eck first. In short, D. Carlstadt wanted to have the preference, which D. Martinus was well satisfied with. On Monday after Corporis Christi, when the disputation had begun, all the strangers from Wittenberg and Ingolstadt came to the large Collegium, to the large room; there, D. Simon Pifiori's oration was received. Simon Pifiori's Oratione Latina received the guests from the University of Leipzig. Afterwards, they went to the church of St. Thomas for mass, and the rector of Leipzig ordered that the magisters of Leipzig should take the Wittenberg magisters to the church, and to the first to the castle. So immediately Magister Vach blessed came to me, whom I took with me. And when we arrived at St. Thomas Church, they began to sing a Mass de Sancto Spiritu, and the Cantor Georgius Rhaw, our printer, then sang a Mass with twelve voices, which had never been heard before. After the mass one went out of the castle, there were ordered a quarter of the citizens, who were there in their armor with their best armor and their ensigns, and had to be every day twice on the castle, while the disputation lasted, to keep peace, in the morning at 7 o'clock until 9, after midday 2 o'clock until 5. And when one came on the castle, there Petrus Mosellanus stood up and held Orationem Latinam, afterwards one went to the Prandio to table. In the afternoon at 2 o'clock the disputation began, Georg Rhaw, the cantor, was called with his cantoribus and with the town pipers, who began to sing and to blow the Veni Sancte Spiritus; then they began the disputation, first D. Carlstadt with D. Eck. But what happened in the disputation

The disputation was dealt with on both sides, which is printed in Latin, the scholars may read it themselves. But I must say one thing, which I also heard myself, which happened in the disputation, in the presence of Duke George, who often came to the disputation and listened diligently, that suddenly D. Martin Luther blessed said these words to D. Eck, who complained to him harshly with the Johann cough: Dear Doctor, non omnes articuli Hussitici sunt haeretici [not all articles of Hus are heretical]. Then Duke George spoke in a loud voice, loudly, so that it could be heard over the whole auditorium: "This is what addiction does," and shook his head, putting both arms at his sides. I heard and saw this myself. For I sat immediately between his feet and Duke Barnim of Pomerania, who was Rector at Wittenberg at the same time, and went with the gentlemen over to Leipzig to the disputation, and did not miss any of them, and listened much more diligently than all Leipzig theologians and collegians, he was also much more learned in vera theologia, than all of them, who were always sitting beside D. Eck, and slept quite gently, so diligently did they listen, and so sweet did the disputation taste to them, that they also had to be awakened commonly when one stopped disputing, so that they did not miss their meal and supper, and did not lose their power and strength, but kept the same until [it] came to a concilio, so that they could use the same against the heretics. That is why they were made collegiate and exempted from reading, as was pretended at that time, and why they were held so great, high and valuable. But afterwards, after the disputation, and when the gospel came to light, and their art was brought to light, the common man learned what they had in their shield, and what their great art and holiness was. After the disputation had come to an end, the cantor of St. Thomas, Georg Rhaw, was appointed with the cantoribus and town pipers, and after the oration, which M. Johann Lange, Lembergensis, a Schlesinger, and resigned to the guests, the cantor began to sing the Te Deum laudamus, into which the town pipers blew in the best and most glorious way; this happened after noon, when the disputation had come to an end, everyone went home again, and the Wittenbergers went back to Wittenberg. But D. Eck stayed there longer, and met with the theologians and collegians and other people.

carelessly cheerful and in good spirits. So the theologians also arranged and held a disputation in their Lectorio Theologico for his benefit, in which one of them presided, and my and Domini Joachimi Camerarii praeceptor, M. Georg Helt, Forchheimensis, had to respond, whom D. Eck well vexed and tribulated, and accused him of smelling like Martin Luther, which was more to my dear preceptor's honor than to his shame. It also happened and occurred during the disputation, when D. Eck and Doctor Carlstadt first disputed with each other, during the eight days in which the feast of Corporis Christi was celebrated and held in the papacy, that D. Martin Luther came to the church of the Pauline Fathers and preacher monks without any danger before noon, when they still had their sacrament in the monstrances outside in the church on the altar of St. Dominici in their little huts, and the monks held mass on the other altars. As the monks of Paul had learned that D. Martin Luther was in their church, they immediately ran out of their choir, took the monstrances with their Sacrament, and hurriedly carried it into their choir into the sacrament house, and left it and kept it safe, so that their holy Sacrament would not be poisoned by the heretic D. Luther; and the other monks, who were holding mass on the other altars, took their utensils together and ran into the sacristy, as if the devil were chasing them in. This undoubtedly meant that our dear father D. Luther blessed should put an end to the papists, especially those in Leipzig, the feast of Corporis Christi and the fair with their masses, as also happened afterwards, as soon as the Christian prince Duke Henry took the city of Leipzig and the whole principality of Duke George.

Another worth reading description of this colloquium by the Electoral Saxon Chancellor v. Pfeifer.

From Pfeifer's oriKin. lüxxisus., x. 340.

Translated from Latin by M. A. Tittel.

1) The same desire (which Luther testified to) to get to the bottom of the hidden truth was also expressed to Duke George, who, when he heard that Johann Eck challenged the Wittenbergers with grandiloquent words, and that they did not refuse to fight, promised that he would both wanted to assign a place for it. The bishop in Merseburg and the theologians who were in Leipzig at that time, Matthias Hanensis, Hirsberg, Königshof, Sueven, Düngersheim, Fraendienst and Lungenschneider, were not satisfied with the prince's decision and said that they were doing it at the pope's command. For this reason, the duke wrote to the bishop in Merseburg, and reported 1) that he was surprised that the bishop did not take any pleasure in the use that had been established for the sake of truth from ancient times and had been propagated by the forefathers, by virtue of which they had discoursed on the triune God, on the mysteries of religion and other main pieces of Christian doctrine, without anyone's disapproval, in both ways. It would be quite useful and necessary that the newly raised question be investigated and that the truth be brought out by teaching and listening, whether it is true that if only the money in the pelvis would sound, the souls of the deceased would immediately lead out of purgatory into heaven, by which deception the poor common people would be defrauded of money. He thought that the bishop was backing some bad people who were not much better than timid soldiers, who had their courage elsewhere than in arms, and who would leave before the quarrel. The custom of defending one's cause and refuting the opponents was old; if the theologians could not defend their doctrines as false, they would not deserve the wrath of the pope or the church if they adhered to a better and truer doctrine. But if they taught the truth, even if they could not defend their opinion, they would not harm either themselves or their cause if they were surpassed by the Sophists in ready disputation and appealed to [the] pope. This kind of doctrinal struggle, which has always been going on, would never have been abolished by the pope, who, in his opinion, had a desire and love for truth; no one would be offended who walked in the light, and it would not be repugnant or displeasing to the pope and his councilors if the ignorant were properly instructed in matters that concerned the common salvation of all. It would be very important for all of Christendom that, if something in the heavenly teachings has been falsified through error or ignorance on the part of the teachers, it should be made known to all Christians. But that his theologians did not want to argue, in this act-

They would act contrary to their office and profession, since they would therefore occupy a higher seat on the chairs, and the highest position at solemn school meetings (or gasteries). If they could not or did not want to act according to their office and titles, then old women and children could be fed at much less cost and more benefit to the public, who would be useful to the public and much more obedient to the authorities than some theologians. For old women could spin wool and flax, for example, and thus help the human need, or if they could do nothing else, at least make the audience happy with good songs. The bishop should consider what use it is for a shepherd to have a dog that does not want to bark or attack the wolves. He also asked the bishop not to take on lazy theologians, but rather to seriously persuade such light-shy people that they should not refuse the theological battle, but rather do what their office and duty entails and confidently fight for the truth against the heretics; unless a special prohibition from the Roman pope prevented them from doing so. Surely, if they would only bravely defend the truth, neither the church nor the university could suffer any harm from them, who were so well-disposed against religion, and he, as a Christian prince, would not be suspected of the outcome of the disputation. If, however, neither the bishop's reputation nor the prince's godly and honest will could do anything with such theologians, such obstinacy would be proof from which both he and all intelligent people could assume that they were not theologians but seducers who neither knew nor wanted to bring their teachings to light nor to punish and refute the errors of the newcomers (or false teachers). If they do not continue, he will publicly declare and testify that he has or had no other will than that a godly and honest action be taken in such an important matter, and that the truth hidden in human quarrels be recognized. The same theologians, however, because of their ignorance and laziness, would not only not have been conducive to this discovery, but would even have been most obstructive in that it was not carried out. The bishop should consider what an honor this would bring to the entire clergy, what a glory it would bring to the teachers of theology, and what a beautiful reverberation it would have until their late descendants. Finally he admonished that in such an important and high matter he would show himself to be a man and a bishop and prove himself in deed.

By this letter of Duke George the efforts of the theologians, who hindered and hated the disputation, were so driven away that afterwards nobody wanted to speak against it or to oppose the will of the prince. The prince therefore scheduled the disputation for July 5 and had a large and spacious auditorium with many desks and benches built in the castle of Pleißenburg.

First Johann Eck arrived in Leipzig with his followers, whom he had brought from Ingolstadt and Erfurt. Then came the Wittenbergers, who, as they were entering the Grimm Gate, broke a wheel on Carlstadt's wagon, so that its load was overturned in muck, as if it were a foreshadowing that it would one day be of little use to the church and break divine law.

4th Carlstadt was followed by the Duke of Pomerania, Barnim, as the then Magnificentissimus of the Wittenberg school; but Martin Luther and Philipp Melancthon followed him in a cart (vecti petorito). Around all their carts some students with hatchets [halberds, battle axes] walked as Leibtrabanten to the right and left. The Wittenbergers had hardly descended to their host when letters from the Bishop of Merseburg were posted on the doors of the churches, in which he forbade, in response to a letter from the Pope of Rome (which one is accustomed to call a Decretale) 1) that no disputation on religion should take place. The council had the person who posted such a document seized and thrown into prison for posting something in public secretly and without permission.

5 It had already been agreed between the parties that they would take scribes who would write down everything that the disputants said. Eck wanted to withdraw from this agreement and demanded that nothing of what was said in public be written down. But even though the Wittenbergers insisted that Eck stick to what had been mutually agreed upon earlier, they finally gave in to Eck's obstinacy, since they could not do anything and noticed that Eck was trying to have the meeting suspended again, and they were afraid that suspicion would fall on the Wittenbergers if this happened.

1) Document No. 234.

The first step is to prevent the sides of the plant from being damaged.

When this dispute was over, another question was soon raised by the people of Ingolstadt, about which there was a great dispute. Eck wanted the Pope or some universities to judge the disputes that were dealt with in disputes, but not settled in a certain and complete way. This made Luther very distressed and doubtful, because he could not stand the pope, as the defendant and guilty party, as a judge, and knew that all the universities would stand by him and swear to him. And since he therefore thought about it a little long, Eck said among the people: Luther had little confidence in his cause, and did not want to suffer a judge, but only to penetrate everywhere with his own head and opinion. This was heard, and many who at first seemed to be on Luther's side now became doubtful about it. But whether it was already known what the verdict of the Pope and the universities would be, Luther, in order to escape the evil rumor that had already gotten around, finally agreed that the universities would recognize it; but in such a way that, if he were condemned, he would still have the appeal to a common and free concilium of the church as a refuge.

Since this matter was also settled, and the Ingolstadtians knew nothing else that would have a pretense or honorable pretext for rejecting the disputation, they finally met, as well as the Wittenberg theologians, in due time in a room of the large Collegii, where the most distinguished jurist, Simon Pistoris, in the name of the university, welcomed them with all honors and kindly received them. From there they went to the St. Thomas Church for prayers and from there to the lecture hall of the Pleißenburg Castle. The Duke of Saxony, Albrecht, had kept his princes, Frederick and George, in their still tender years, in Leipzig for the sake of their studies, and George had gained so much knowledge in the sciences that he could speak and write Latin: and some credible people assured that they had seen a piece of a Latin history in which he had described the wars waged by his father. Therefore, he already knew what the situation was at the Leipzig school and what kind of teachers were there, and he enjoyed the scholars' discussions, and was himself at the disputation at that time, to which Petrus Mosellanus opened the door, as it were, with a beautiful and learned speech, in which he faithfully recalled, and wisely and intelligently explained, what he had learned.

Godly advised that one should not argue with anger and displeasure, but should direct all speech and action more to the praise of Almighty God than to one's own glory and honor. For in the theological battlefield, to be down would be human, but to be victorious would not be human strength, and thus the conqueror could not ascribe anything to himself, nor would the conquered have cause to be sad, because the error into which he had fallen out of weakness of nature would be removed from the conquered, but the conqueror would not lead his own cause, but God's. The conqueror would have no cause to be sad, but God's cause, and thus communicates what he has received from Him to the other, so that the conqueror loses nothing more than what would otherwise harm him, and he thus becomes better through what the other communicates to him, so that a pious and truth-loving man would almost wish to be conquered in this rather than to be victorious. Thereupon he asked everyone most earnestly that in such an important matter they would think with proper reverence that not only the whole of Christendom would soon afterwards judge everything that had been said and done, but that God Himself and the holy angels and heavenly spirits would also see and hear everything. Finally, he decided and testified that he had not spoken and presented anything for himself or according to his own opinion, but according to the mind and will of the Prince.

After such a speech everyone went home. And after lunch, when everyone came together again in the auditorium, the singers first invoked the Holy Spirit and sang a song in proper rhyme. Then Eck and Carlstadt rode with each other on the free will of a Christian man. The latter knew the other's sly wit and slippery ways. So that he could hold up to a sly adversary the right reason for what he was saying and saying, he brought the authors' writings with him into the lecture hall, to whose passages and testimonies he referred. Eck was annoyed that he should see himself bound and held so that he could not twist the old authors' writings wherever he wanted and it seemed good to him, because then they seemed to contradict him in the whole speech, as it were coming back from the dead. Therefore, he complained to the judges (Agonothetis) that, contrary to previous usage in schools, the books were dragged into the auditorium by the disputants; he therefore asked that Carlstadt be told to leave out the books and to say from his head what he needed to say and to advance. Thereupon the judges, who recognized Ecken's request as reasonable, also ordered that no books be brought into the auditorium. Which, when you look at it in the light, would be just as surprising as if a commander ordered a soldier, who wanted to fight bravely for house and court, to go into battle with his rifle outstretched and his hands empty.

The following week, Eck argued against Luther about the supreme authority of the Pope in Christendom and about his supremacy over all, and, according to his custom, he poured out more disgraceful speeches than reasons for proof. For he not only accused him of heresy, but also called him patron (or protector) of the unbelieving Bohemians, when Luther had said nothing more than that he had rejected some of the conclusions of the Costnitz Concilii as unjust.

10 After this, Christians were treated of their repentance, as well as of the atonement of sins among the dead. There are still certain memorials or registers of this disputation, which contain the meaning and words of the disputants, which two scribes wrote out, and one of them, Johann Agricola of Eisleben, Luther, and the other, Johann Poliander, Eck, chose for this purpose, so that each of them may diligently record and write down the words of the latter, who appointed him.

11. At that time, some historians also noticed this and wrote it out as something special, that although at that time many people, out of eagerness to hear such famous men discuss the most important things, traveled from far and foreign places, nevertheless, of three bishops and eleven abbots in the land of the dukes of Saxony, not a single one showed up at this so crowded and famous scene of the entire Meißnerland and the most learned people; either because they shied away from the pope's command, or because they were weaned on scholarship and concerned only with worldly and economic affairs, rarely learning anything, even more rarely teaching others, but least of all and almost never going into the company of scholars, And with nothing she put herself in reputation and honor among the gullible rabble, except that on high feasts of the year she stepped before the altar two or three times in her holy skirt or chasuble, glittering with gold and precious stones, and sang mass or murmured.

12 Although the bishops and prelates forget their office in this, Duke George was not displeased to sit down with the learned and famous men; and since he had diligently listened to the theologians for a few days, he was not displeased.

When he heard Luther's speech, some wicked people finally kept him away from the auditorium, no doubt fearing that the prince's mind, which loved truth so much, would notice the papal mischief and properly grasp the knowledge of true godliness. Afterwards, however, he invited Luthern, Carlstadt and Melanchthon to lunch with him, and had Luthern come to him again in particular; with whom he spoke in such a way that Luther said afterwards: "If Duke George acted according to his own mind, he would not do anything that was not appropriate for a prince, and was to be regretted that he did not follow his natural way, but rather what others told and advised him. 1)

The Prince of Anhalt, George, also always listened to the debaters, who studied in Leipzig at that time and subsequently did much useful service to the Church of God with writing and teaching; as his godly and learned writings still testify to this day.

Since such important things were dealt with, something ridiculous and bad happened, which my father, who also studied in Leipzig at that time and was at the disputation, told me when I was young; and because you can see from this what kind of mind Eck had, I will tell it here, as the wise Greeks of the monkey at Dodona described mischievousness in their histories. Duke George had a one-eyed court jester. He always stood at his side in the auditorium, and as there are always joking and funny people among the great ones at court, they made this jester believe: Luther argued with Eck about his (the jester's) marriage, Eck did not want him to be given a wife, Luther, however, spoke for him. The jester got angry about this, and as often as he came into the auditorium with the prince, Eck made a nasty face. Eck, seeing this, covered his right eye with his index finger and looked at the jester again with a scowl. The fool, noticing from this that his one-eyedness was being advanced, as was the truth, bitterly and shamefully attacked Ecken with a great clamor. The assembly laughed quite a bit about this, and thus a little fun was added to the heat of the disputation, thereby moderating and making the minds more or less cheerful in their zeal and attention.

15 The disputation had now lasted eighteen days, and nothing more had happened between the parties.

1) See Document No. 381 towards the end.

The result was that the indulgence stuff, as it is called, was hissed out and ridiculed. But since Eck subsequently spread a false rumor that he had won, and boasted much about himself in writings, Luther was forced to publicly print the discussion and disputation he had held with him, 1) and to show that he had not destroyed the weak arrows of the human statutes that Eck had shot against him by only using the sword of the Spirit, namely the divine word, not only with the sword of the spirit, namely the divine word, but also completely destroyed and ruined the false concluding speeches that the adversary had unleashed on him with sound reasons from holy scripture.

16 Eck himself seemed to admit this twelve years later, when at the Diet of Augsburg, when Laurentius Campegius, the papal counselor, denied him the priesthood he was seeking, he himself came to Philip Melancthon and the theologians who were with him and complained about the insult Campegius had done to him, and finally asked: What would he gain if he left the papal boys and joined Luther? And when Melancthon answered: if Luther's cause was right, why would he not also join it in vain and defend the truth? Eck fell silent at such words and remained silent for a while, until he finally lowered his testimony, which he had already given to the truth, and reduced it by saying: not everything that could be defended was true.

17 Although in Leipzig in 1519, the disputation may have been divided in such a way that, as each was governed by his love and favor or old delusion, he declared either Luther or Eck to be the victor, or made the victory doubtful, the subsequent experience has shown that many were drawn by such disputations from papal superstition abundantly to the teaching of truth. Not to mention that Johann Poliander, whom Eck had used as his scribe, left his previous error and turned to the love of true godliness in such a way that he finally even became a preacher of the truth freed from papal darkness in Prussia.

The auditorium in Leipzig became quite empty due to their departure; and apart from such a cause, the subsequent addition of two years has caused almost the entire school to disappear.

Melancthon's report of this in a letter to Oecolampadius. Dat. Wittenberg, July 21, 1519.

Melancthon had this letter printed under the title: Dxitornscs ckisputations lüp-

Translated into German.

Philipp Melancthon wishes his friend N. Heil in Christo.

I do not think that much is at stake, nor do you particularly require me to express in many words how I feel toward you. For the good spirit of cordial love has so happily united our minds with each other that I hope our friendship can by no means be offended by the manifold changes in all human things, nor even be rooted deeper by mean and base flattery, I mean that kind of letters by which friendship is commonly entertained. The mind is equally inclined to both, that friendship is made outrageously great, either by disguised or useless flattery. And o that I could only be grateful to him for his good deed who has given me a friend who is not only sincere, but also faithful to Christianity. For there is probably no person who has done me more good from my youth than you, whose kindness has been so generous to me at all times, and was completely the play of the goddesses of mercy. My circumstances, however, did not allow me to repay like with like. And since you have something ahead in this play, I ask, let me also have something ahead. Aristotle demands that he who has done a good deed to someone should be loved by the other as much as the good deed deserves, or at least for the sake of the good deed. This is subtle, but not at all well said. For the purpose of our love is not your good deeds, but the Spirit of Christ, as the author of our friendship. What you did to me, as your friend, in the way of love, you did according to the general law of the

We owe it to you to show love. And we are therefore again bound not to withdraw our services from you if the occasion arises.

As far as the matter itself is concerned, since we have almost everything else in common in the study of science, I would not want to fail to make you aware of what has been said with far greater expectation than benefit at Leipzig about some seemingly ambiguous teachings of the theologians. For I am of the opinion that you are not a little interested, who, according to the dignity of the name of a theologian, are also a holy eulogist in the Swabian arena, namely in Augsburg, and take every care that the theological doctrines may be presented in a pure and simple manner. At first, this disputation was started for no other reason than that one might clearly see what a great difference there is between the old and Christ's theology, and between the new and Aristotelian. But what has been brought out, or on which side the matter has tilted, is not so easy for me to judge. All the more carefully I want to go through everything that is relevant to the matter, so that you may come to a more precise certainty about it. Undoubtedly, many things have come to your attention; therefore, I will relate everything credibly and explain the points of the disputation in the simplest way possible, so that you can see what was disputed by both sides.

3) And that I begin the matter from the beginning, Eck made notes 1) last year about the sentences on indulgences, which Luther posted for discussion; this writing is much too biting for me to be able to contribute anything from it. From these notes, Carlstadt has refuted some of them in his conclusions, which he has published. Eck took responsibility against Carlstadt in a protective letter, in which he wrote somewhat less harshly than before in the notes. Carlstadt published a booklet in opposition to this protective writing. They reviled each other for a long time and made long digressions. Finally, in order to pass over the other with silence, it became popular to hold a disputation. The day was set for it. Johann Eck came to Leipzig from Ingolstadt, Andreas Carlstadt from Wittenberg, and Martin Luther. The main points were brought into a few conclusions, so that it would be made clearer what was to be disputed. I

I believe that you know well enough what was agreed about the disputation, namely, that the deal should be drawn up in writing by notaries appointed for this purpose and that this document should go out in print so that everyone could judge it. First, Eck objected to those whom the most illustrious Prince George, Duke of Saxony, the great promoter of the fine sciences, had appointed as supervisors of the disputation, against his promise: as he thought, it was not proper for disputants to dietire their matters; the burning heat of those who argue with each other would be completely cooled by the slowness of writing; by a fierce attack, the minds would be fired up, but by hesitating, one would rather let one's courage sink. Whether this can come from theological simplicity, I do not know, since according to it nothing is to be taken into consideration so much as that one does not speak anything with vehemence, or out of carelessness, or in heat. And as I think that in the sciences, and especially in the work of godliness, there is nothing better and more salutary than the confidential and affectionate dispute of learned and righteous men, where one opinion is held against the other with a quiet and peace-loving, but by no means disruptive and obstinate mind, and one does not rejoice at all over the victory achieved: I believe that there is nothing so harmful against it as rabble-raising quarrels, since even righteous people must be concerned about the victory. You know how much Nazianzenus, how much our Erasmus have written wisely about this. Now, however, one had become one about the notaries. For Carlstadt could not be talked into anything else. As soon as the dispute arose, Eck wanted to decree certain judges; Carlstadt was not opposed. Accordingly, Johann Eck and Carlstadt argued with each other on June 27.

4 Of free will it was asked: whether it is in our own will and ability to do a good work? that is, as they call it, whether we deserve grace according to equity (congruo) when we do as much as is in our power? For I adduce their own words. Since one should have acted on it, see where their quarrels have carried them away, what dangerous cliffs they have run into. They should have examined what our will is capable of in and of itself without grace. They turn the question differently, and argue, I believe, for four whole days about whether the will only receives a good work, and whether grace alone brings about this good work. In these unnecessary connections, they have led the matter, which, after all, depends on Carl's intention, to the point where it is not possible.

were far away from the city. Eck admitted that our will had no natural, but only an assumed ability, given to it by grace, to produce a good work, which he initially seemed to dispute. After he was asked by Carlstadt whether he admitted that the whole good work came from God, he answered that it was indeed the whole work of God, but not completely (totalitarian). Behold, however, how beautifully this cunning little finger is suited for the theological sovereignty. So now everyone is free to twist the words in this way. At the beginning, Eck admits that the will is set in motion by God; afterwards, he says that it is in our power to consent. Carlstadt strongly contrasted this opinion with several passages of Augustine and the saying of Paul: "It is God who works in us both willing and doing. And where I am not mistaken, Carlstadt's doctrine has remained unimpaired. Eck took some things from Bernhardus for his doctrine that did not belong to the matter. That is what Eck disputed with Carlstadt. I think we spent a whole week on it, of which I have recently noted the main points. I first learned from these men what it means what the ancients called sophistry (σοφιστεῖν).

It is extraordinary how impetuously, how pompously all this has been done; but all the less can one be surprised that it has been of little use. For the Spirit loves silence for His own sake, by which He takes hold of our hearts, and settles down with those who are not ambitious, but eager to know the truth. The dear bride of Christ does not stand in the streets, but leads the bridegroom in her mother's house. Yes, the rays of heavenly wisdom should not enlighten us, because we have been purified by the cross, to speak with Paul, and have died to the corruptible things of the world.

Afterwards, D. Martin Luther entered the battlefield. Until then, it was not known for sure whether he would dispute, because according to the right of his appeal, he could not easily set judges in the hateful matter. However, since one had become one with him on this, one began to deal with the prestige of the Roman pope and to argue: whether the prestige of a general bishop could be proven from divine law? Luther freely admits that there is a general bishop. Only against this he disputes: whether his authority can be proven according to divine right. About this point, because it is somewhat important, five days went by, if I am not mistaken. Eck dis

He was sharp and crude, and everything in him was designed to make Luther hated by the common people. His first argument was: the church could not be without a head, because it presented a civil body, therefore the pope was the head of the church according to divine right. To this Luther replied: he recognizes Christ as the head of the church, because the church is a spiritual kingdom, and does not want to know of any other head, as Col. 1 says. Eck added some passages from Jerome and Cyprian, which, how much they prove for the divine right, he may see for himself. Now, some passages of these same scribes were obviously in doubt, which he presented as irrefutable. He praised the testimony of Bernhard ad Eugenium as an insurmountable defense, while in the same book to Eugenius there are things that not a little strengthen Luther's opinion. By the way, who is so stupid that he should not recognize what one has to thank Bernhardus for in this trade? From the Gospel he cited the passage Matth. 16: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church." Luther claimed that this was a confession of faith: Peter presented the person of the whole church and Christ called himself the rock, which he proved by many speculations from the context of the whole speech. Also the words came up: "Feed my sheep", which were actually and personally spoken to Peter. Luther answered that the same authority had been given to all the apostles in the words: "Receive the Holy Spirit, by whom you remit sin," 2c., because these words referred to the office given to them; Christ had wanted to teach them what it was to feed and how a shepherd must be constituted. Eck then referred to the reputation of the Costnitz Council, where it was said against the teaching of the Hussites that it was necessary for salvation that one accept that the Roman pope was a general bishop. There one also heard much boasting that a concilium could not err; to which Luther wisely replied that one had not condemned all the articles as heretical, and what was more of the matter, all of which would only be annoying to recount. The investigation of the reputation of the conciliar churches does not belong here either. It is obvious that no concilium can come up with new articles of faith. Luther was not well spoken of because he was seen as opposing the concilium, while the latter did nothing so eagerly as that only the concilium should retain its prestige. Then one threw

He accused the apostles of heresies, the Bohemian Rotten, and other such accusations. Eck admitted that all apostles had the same prestige and power, but it was not appropriate that they were all the same bishops, because there was a difference between the apostleship and the government. For the apostleship is nothing else but a sending forth to the obedience of faith, as Paul says to the Romans. But I do not see the difference between the apostleship and the government. To some it seemed to be unbearable to deviate from the papal decrees or from the words of a holy church teacher in the slightest, but Luther based his doctrine of the pope on the passage Gal. 2, which, according to my insight, suited it perfectly: "Of those (he speaks) who had the prestige of what they were then, I do not care. For God does not respect the reputation of men. But those who had prestige have taught me nothing else." In the meantime, Eck thinks that Christ chose the apostles, but Peter ordained the bishops. From this you may judge of the other for yourselves. To the constitution that occurs in the decrees that the Roman pope should not be called the general bishop, he answered: one may not call him the general bishop, but certainly the bishop of the general church.

(6) Then they began to talk about purgatory, in which question I think they lost sight of the purpose. For since one should have disputed what power the pope had with regard to purgatory, Eck sang another song: that purgatory existed was demonstrable, which is far too well known to have been necessary to raise the question so often in the schools. Eck proved his opinion with the common passage in the books of the Maccabees. Luther disputed it, and said that, according to Jerome's statement, the books of the Maccabees are not valid, to which Eck replied: one should give the books of the Maccabees the same right that is contrary to the Gospel; this is, of course, a statement worthy of a theologian! And he remained stiff and firm. He added the passage of Paul 1 Cor. 3: "He will be saved, but only by fire", about which, as you know, the commentators are of different opinions. He has also taken the words from Matt. 5: "Be ready for your adversary soon," 2c., from the dungeon, and what follows: "until you pay the last farthing. How far this is fetched, and how the words are to be understood, you can easily judge. One does violence to them if one thinks that the dungeon is a interpret the purgatory. I wish that the people of Christ would be taught better. For most interpretations of this kind lead the scripture far away from the basic text, so that one completely leaves its actual emphasis. From the Psalms he brought to the proof of the purgatory the words on the track: "We have passed through fire and water." And I do not know what he put on more with equal probity. Against the indulgence was not argued so vehemently. For Eck himself was only joking and playing with it. Finally, the doctrine of repentance was discussed, but I do not know whether Eck had hit the main point of the question with his final speeches; he approved of some punishments by means of satisfaction, which Luther conceded; but that divine justice requires a penitence for any punishment for any sin, which is within a man's power to impose, I could not see from his reasons. So these are the most important points that have occurred in this whole dispute. Everything else is far too ridiculous and too childish for me to hinder you in your more important occupations.

The remaining two days were given to Carlstadt. One was devoted to the bar of grace, as it is called, which Eck admitted was not taken away by nature but by grace. The other was debated: whether we sin in every good work, of which many wonderful scriptures were given by Eck and Carlstadt. Methinks Paul gave the greatest weight to Carlstadt's opinion in the seventh chapter to the Romans. I wanted to write more, but I am called away to other necessary business, although this is perhaps already too extensive. However, I wanted to tell you, as my very good friend, about the antics, and I myself saw that this matter was treated with greater expectation than benefit. What others think of such petty quarrels I do not know; to me they seem dangerous. Those of whom I have wished to promote godliness have only shown their intellect, great knowledge and various erudition in this arena. Incidentally, many of us have been immensely surprised by Ecken's splendid gifts of intellect. Carlstadt will undoubtedly already be known to you from his writings. He is an honest man, of rare erudition and unusually highly educated. I must admire Luther's lively mind, erudition and eloquence, whom I have known for a long time through intimate contact, and his sincere and thoroughly Christian spirit. Greet our mutual friends in my name. You know what the Greeks use to say: xxxxxxx xxxxx xxxxx [there is much news in the war]. Therefore, you must not trust the rumor about the course of this disputation, nor those who make use of gossip, in all things. Fare well. Wittenberg, July 21, 1519.

3. what news of this disputation has come to light on the papal side.

D. Eck's report of this in a letter to Jakob Hoogstraten (Hochstraten). Date Leipzig, July 24, 1519.

This letter is found in Latin in the Wittenberg edition (1550), tom. I, fol. 335; in the Jena (1579), tom. I, fol. 3405; in the Erlangen, opp. var. urA., tom. III, P- 474 and in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. III, p. 222. The marginal glosses, of which Walch says in the superscription: "mit Luthers Randglossen", do not seem to us to have originated with Luther, but we have added them according to the Wittenberg edition. Wiedemann, "v. Johann Eck", p. 501, attributes the "läppischen Noten" to IVI. Tittel.

sent from Leipzig to the famous and venerable father, Brother Jakob Hoogstraten, Magister noster in theology, in which he shows with which scriptures, proofs and reasons he defended the articles of the Roman Church against D. Martin Luther in the disputation held in Leipzig in 1519.

1. salvation in the Lord Jesus! It is known to you, venerable father, how I have so far opposed the sacrilegious people of Wittenberg, who despise all teachers from 400 years ago, even though they are still so holy and learned, and bring many false and erroneous things among the people. The most distinguished head of this scandal spreads such things in German printed matter, and thereby seduces and poisons the people. Recently we debated in Leipzig before a very large audience of the most learned people, who had gathered there from all places, where Praise God! their opinion was also brought very low among the people, but among the scholars it fell for the most part.

2 You should have heard the audacity of the people, how blind and ready they are to all wickedness.

are. Luther denies that Peter the Apostle was prince. He denies that the obedience of the church comes from divine right, but is only imposed by human consent or the emperor's permission. He denies that the church was built on Peter: "On this rock" 2c. And when I put Augustine, Jerome, Ambrose, Gregory, Cyprian, Chrysostomus, Leo and Bernhardus with Theophylus 1) to him about it, he denied all of them without shame and said: he wanted to resist 1000 alone; supported by nothing else than that Christ was the foundation of the church and no one could lay another foundation. a) I have refuted this from Revelation Cap. 21, 2) 14. of the twelve reasons. He claimed that the Greeks who were divided, even if they were not in the obedience of the pope, would still be blessed. Of the Bohemian articles he said: of the articles condemned in the Costnitz Concilium, some were quite fundamental Christian (christianissimos) and evangelical. By this sacrilegious error, he scared off and turned away many who had previously been devoted to him. Among other things, he said, when I reproached him (in opposition): if the Pope's supreme authority came only from human right and the consent of the faithful, where would he get the religious habit he wore? b) Where then would he get the authority to preach and to hear the confessions of the parishioners 2c.? He answered that he did not want there to be a mendicant order. He said many other annoying and inconsistent things: that a concilium, because they were men, could err; that it was not proven from the holy Scriptures that there was a purgatory, as you will see when you read our disputation for yourselves, because it was written by completely reliable notaries.

But in many ways they overcame me. c) Firstly, because they brought many books with them, in which they were known, and even brought them with them to the place of the disputation, and to these they immediately took refuge, yes, they always read from books, to their great ridicule. Secondly, because they always had the disputation in writing, and afterwards compared it at home. I have never heard a single word [of what the notaries until the disputation was over. Thirdly, there were several of them, for they themselves are two doctors, Mr. Lang, the Augustinervicarius, two licentiates of theology, one of them a grandson of Reuchlin, a very presumptuous person,^d) three doctors of law, many magisters, who helped both at home and in public, even in the middle of the disputation. I, however, stood alone, accompanied only by the good cause.^e)

I have instructed your brothers in the order to have a copy of the disputation copied and to send it to you as soon as possible. Therefore, for the sake of) whom I serve, I most earnestly request that 1) you defend the faith^g) which you have long since accepted. I do not ask that you get involved and make yourselves and your order hateful, but that you support me with your counsel and scholarship. For the Wittenbergers did not want with the disputation; indeed, they preferred to seek opportunities to dispute.^h) For Luther at first did not want to suffer any university in the world as a judge; but the most Christian Lord George of Saxony did not want to allow any disputation about the faith, unless he let the masters of our faith judgeⁱ). Luther, who was able and driven to do so by his own, was forced to do so. For if he could not argue and could not stand judges, they would all leave him; therefore, when I had left him free to choose from all universities, he chose Paris and Erfurt. Since I do not know the University of Paris,^k) but your University^l) is very friendly with it, I urge your fatherhood, for the sake of the Christian faith,^m) to write to their acquaintances, or, if it pleases, to the entire University, that if dear Prince George writes and sends the disputation and asks for a verdict, they will not refuse it, but will bravely attack it as a champion, because we have both consented to it as a judge. And I believe that the matter is so clear that it does not require a long investigation.

5 You see here recently, venerable father, what I would like to have from you in the matter of faith, and this shall also be written herewith at the same time to our teachers, Mr. Arnold de Tongris and D. Michael Swas. Michael Swas. For it is quite certain that the crowd of grammarians (or language art teachers) introduce these errors into the church. And if the pope had proceeded in the same way,ⁿ) and not only, to our 2) both mockery, which the wretched language teachers^o) have caused. If they had listened to us, they would not now be driving over their heads with their murmuring, as they did earlier when they examined the Cabala. And the Wittenbergers, as it were, went off quite madly and almost without saying goodbye to the host. I am already on my ninth day here after the disputation,^p , which lasted three weeks.

Luther had preached a completely erroneous Hussite sermon on St. Peter's Day in the absence of the prince in the disputation hall. On the day of the Visitation of the Virgin Mary and the following day, I preached against his errors with an audience as large and populous as I have ever had, and I completely aroused the people, so that they were terrified of Luther's errors. Tomorrow I will do the same, and then say good night to Leipzig. My business makes it impossible for me to write to Mr. Arnold, nor to you. If you like something to reply, order it through Mr. Michael Swas, who can send it safely to Ingolstadt through the Sveter or Waler. Your venerable devotion (pietius) live happily; and if I can serve you anything, believe that it is as good as done. From Leipzig, July 24, in the year of grace 1519.

1. good health! Our friendship requires that I tell you how I am doing. Initially, the strong and hot beer got me sick. From Pfreimbt to Gera, I did not have a good drink. In Leipzig, beer was also constantly disgusting to me, so I abstained from it for six days and felt better. On the way, I encountered nothing adverse, except that it rained incessantly, which, however, was to my advantage. I met the Duke in Leipzig, where he arrived on the very day I arrived from Weissenfels. He received me graciously, and the day after St. John's he departed again. [Lotter and Bodenstein arrived with great state, with them two hundred Wittenberg students, four doctores, three licentiates, many magistri and very many Lutherans, v. Lange of Erfurt, their vicarius, the teacher of insolence Egranus, the preacher of Görlitz, the pastor of Annaberg, Bohemians and Picards sent from Prague, very many heretics, who pretend that Luther is an excellent teacher of truth, who does not follow Johann Hus.

On June 26, the disputation was discussed and an agreement was reached. I yielded willingly, which the Leipzigers would not have thought, although they are perfectly on my side, and demanded that Carlstadt should not yield, because he had united with me on one judge. The call went through the whole city, I will have to succumb to this. Our nation, although inclined to me, has not sought friendship with me out of concern to share in my disgrace. However, as an older doctor, I have been preferred to others everywhere: the duke had a beautiful stag honored to me, and a deer to Carlstadt.

On the 27th of June we met in the large college, where the Ordinary (D. Simon Pistoris) received us with a beautiful speech in the name of the university; afterwards we went with all the guests and the whole university to the church, where the Holy Spirit was invoked for help. Thereupon went

They went to the castle, where the duke had a splendid room decorated with chairs and wallpaper. Petrus Mosellanus, professor of the Greek language, gave a beautiful speech in which he made the duke's will known, but at the same time, after his own fashion, except by princely command, he set out on the scholastics. There are also 76 armed men present every day from the beginning to the end of the disputation, and they always march to the castle with flying flags and sounding music, because there is a fear of a crowd of Wittenbergers and Bohemians. The council is very polite, I want to report.

4 In the afternoon at 2 o'clock the disputation began. I opposed Carlstadt on free will. Oh, how miserably he conducted the matter! I would rather that others reported such things. The man has no memory at all. He also confessed, since he had answered my objection in a slipshod manner, that I have a better memory. With everyone's amazement, I neatly and piecemeal repeated his answer, better than he had presented it himself, and immediately gave my reply to it; but he could not grasp anything; he had a large crowd sitting with him, and now read from this, now from another book, to his great chagrin. Therefore our people only began to get courage and to accompany me in heaps. I did it in one way: I made replies at night and gave him time to think it over until the next day at 8 o'clock. So he came in the morning and brought a notary with him, against the settlement, whom he had write everything down; the doctor had written everything on slips of paper, and read off one after the other, from word to word, to his great shame. I rejected what he had uselessly presented, but did not proceed to the right objections, because he had made his reading so long, to everyone's annoyance; and if I had continued in the opposition, the disputation would have been interrupted, and he would again have had time to consider and write something down; So I diligently postponed this until 2 o'clock in the afternoon, since I drove the wretched man, who could not retain the slightest thing, so far that he had to confess against his will that free will has its effect in good works. Whereupon I did not want to bring further proofs, because I had brought him to the right Christian doctrine. He replied that he had never denied this; but I immediately showed him six passages from his "defense" in which he pretends that free will is completely passive with respect to the good, which he also often says in his "defense".

1) This is where Seckendorf starts.

Disputation; about which I referred to the Acta, written by the notaries.

The last June Carlstadt should oppose me from free will. For he chose this matter. But since he again read everything from his notes, like the boys, I did not want to admit this; he, on the other hand, would not let it go, because he had no memory, like me. I then said, "Why is he disputing?" But I left the matter in the hands of the gentlemen, who went out and held a council about it, called Carlstadt before them, and said, "This is not the way to disputing, he should therefore refrain from it; he could read the sayings of fathers and teachers from a piece of paper, but not the proofs and their execution," to which Carlstadt, after due council, answered, "He could not disputing in any other way, and asked that he be given leave. I was sent for; however, I left everything to the discretion of the gentlemen and declared that if they recognized that I could allow it, I would do so. They all said that it seemed unreasonable to them. I agreed that he would do it this time, but would refrain from it in the future. But he did not want to do this either. I therefore requested a testimony from the gentlemen; and so we left each other without having accomplished anything. Mr. Caesar Pflug recited the entire matter in German in the Duke's name, and told what they had decided against Carlstadt; however, he did not want to enter into this, so they gave him time to think it over until tomorrow. He then sent notaries and baccalaureates of theology to me to ask me to allow him to read the evidence from slips of paper; but I answered that I would stick to the statement of the gentlemen. Therefore, the Wittenbergers were in great consternation, and still are; yet he came today and was supposed to oppose, but brought forward three things alone, without the testimony of a teacher and without proof. He was very confused. I summarized the questions in the neatest way, answered them, corroborated them with testimonies of teachers and proved that the holy and excellent theologians, whom he contemptuously calls school teachers, are in agreement with Augustine, Jerome and Ambrose. Up to here from Carlstadt.

6 From the other beast, Lutter. 1) Upon his arrival, I heard that he did not want to dispute; I made every effort to get him to dispute. We met at the princely commissaries and the university;

1) On the edge of the letter he wrote: "I have done a good evil to Lütter, I will tell it orally.

I have placed everything in their will; they therefore wanted him to dispute under the same conditions under which Carlstadt had disputed. He had made many demands of his duke; but I said that I did not demand the prince to be a judge, although I did not refuse him either, therefore he should choose a university, and if Germany was too narrow for him, in Welschland, France or Spain. However, he did not want a judge at all and was therefore not admitted, because by virtue of the duke's order no one is to be admitted who does not want to suffer a judgment. I demanded that the commissioners and the university give me a testimony about this in his time. There are many Lutherans. D. Urbach, the doctor of the Archbishop of Mainz, the doctor of the Counts of Mansfeld, 2) and others have driven Luther because he would lose everyone's favor, even the Elector's favor, if he could not suffer a judge in the whole world. Therefore, he resorted to lies, by which he greatly angered the Commissars by saying that the whole university was suspicious of him. Finally, the matter came to the point that at the end of the disputation, he wanted to compare notes with me about a judge and dispute with me, but that he was free to let the disputation go to press in the meantime. I opposed this, because he wanted to print it without first obtaining a verdict, in order to seduce the simple; for he undoubtedly wanted to add letters and other things that would be in their praise, so that it would look as if they had won the victory; therefore, he also had to accept this. I do not yet know when the disputation will begin; but the Wittenbergers are all almost full of bile, rage and venom; they cause me much inconvenience. Many threats have been made by them to the council, but it has not yet learned anything definite, but last night it placed 34 armed men in the nearest houses, so that if they came and wanted to do something bad or cause trouble, they would receive their deserved reward. You see that they have become disgraced.

There is still hope for Luther, but all hope for Bodenstein is gone. Luther has not yet been allowed to preach in Leipzig, but the Lord of Pomerania (Duke Barnim), Rector of the Wittenberg University, at the instigation of the monk, demanded that he preach the Gospel to him in the castle, which he did. The whole sermon was Bohemian (that is, heretical), held on the day of Peter [and Paul]. I will preach tomorrow and Sunday, at the request of citizens and doctors, and refute his sophistical errors. 1)

Otherwise, there is nothing new, except that the Electors, with the exclusion of the Frenchman, have unanimously fallen to Carl. On the Frenchman's initiative, the Duke of Lüneburg attempted in Saxony what the Württemberg duke had begun in Swabia, and inflicted great damage on Duke Erich of Brunswick, who, after gathering an army of 3,000 servants from the great alliance in Swabia and 1,200 men from Duke George of Saxony, took almost all of the Duke of Lüneburg's land and burned out six towns. Of Margrave Joachim I will tell orally. There are horny Venus sisters everywhere, and people love a lot in this city.

9 I have often been told to stay in Meissen, but I will go back to Bavaria. Almost all the courtiers and most of the citizens were Lutherans; but now they are beginning to become wise. Dear Franz, see to it that what I have recommended to you is also done in this way. Where highly unjust judges do not come forward, there is no doubt of victory. Be well. On the day before the Visitation of the Virgin Mary (July 1) at 3 o'clock, since since 10 o'clock the insipid and unjust Carlstadt has been disputing against me. From the royal city of Leipzig in Meissen 1519.

Translated from Latin.

To Wolfgang Fabricius Capito, Professor of Sacred Scripture, Joh. Cellarius von Kunstadt wishes Heil!

If I let the slightest opportunity pass, dearest Wolfgang, above all to testify to my peculiar esteem for you, then I would be justly accused of the vice of ingratitude, which I have always highly detested, as the beginning and origin of all vices, so that I would not, if I fell into it, be justly esteemed worthy of the bonds of Hippocrates. I have thus wanted to testify what a heartfelt love and honor I have for you, not only because of special merits, but also because of the great love for virtue, scholarship and the scholars, which I have seen shine out in you many times in Latin, Greek and Hebrew sciences.

(2) But what is this occasion or inducement? you will say. Hear such recently. You know, my dear Wolfgang, how much and at what time and how a great dispute between D. Johann Eck of Ingolstadt, and D. Martin Luther and Andreas Bodenstein of Carlstadt, of Wittenberg, because of some (where I am right) outgoing theses: so that after the mere theses, which had been spread out in the whole world before, it finally came to attack and protective writings. But since it seemed to them that this would not be enough for a good outcome of the matter, if they did not also proceed to a public doctrinal battle, a public disputation was finally scheduled with the approval of both sides, and admitted to the laudable and flourishing Leipzig School by our most illustrious Prince George, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia, Margrave of Meissen, the very mildest protector and upholder of the Leipzig University. And although there are beautiful buildings of the Muses, which we call Collegia, and spacious lecture halls in such a famous university of Your Serene Highness, he did not want such theological disputations to be held anywhere else than in his castle. But in what kind of order such disputations of truth

I think that I will be quite pleasant to you and at the same time show my goodwill toward you.

3 It is now the 26th of June in the afternoon at 2 o'clock, for early the arrived guests were received by the legal scholar and experienced man, D. Simon Pistoris, the Law Faculty Ordinary, after which they went together to St. Thomas Church to attend the service held to invoke the Holy Spirit. Afterwards, they went together to St. Thomas Church to attend the service, which was held to invoke the Holy Spirit, and from there to the castle and to the battlefield, where, by order of the most noble prince, the leaders of the dispute were read how modestly they should behave at the disputation, and then, as I said, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, the battle began.

4 First, D. Joh. Eck brought Carlstadt on the path that free will also effectively helps to do a good work together with grace, and that they therefore work together, not separately (mixtim non divisim), which he beautifully demonstrated from St. Bernard. Carlstadt, on the other hand, long resisted in his writings: that the free will only behaves in a suffering and receiving manner toward good works, of which it alone is capable. But when Eck had drawn testimonies from the Holy Scriptures and the Holy Fathers, he finally admitted with Eck that free will had an effect in good works, and they now agreed. You should have heard here, my dear Fabricius, with what a mind, and like another Demosthenes, Eck was able to grasp and repeat so completely everything that had been stated one after the other. Carlstadt, however, used to get the reasons and the answers from a piece of paper and from books. And since he also wanted to read out his entire case during the opposition, as he had considered and prepared it at home, Eck did not want to allow it any further, whether he wanted to allow it this time: At present, however, he must refrain from doing so, unless he had written out the words of a holy father or of the Holy Scriptures. Eck said: he wanted to discuss and not read. After the matter had been brought before the gentlemen, it was decided that this was no way to argue, to read the whole thing from pieces of paper, so Eck would not be satisfied with it. Carlstadt should also consider until tomorrow whether he wants to recite the reasons from his head or give up disputing? Therefore, Carlstadt came back in the morning, and according to the laws of the

The Church, however, equipped with many books, and even taught that the whole good work was from God, which Eck admitted that grace and free will worked separately, according to Bernard, with each other, not in a special or separate way, but that one therefore did not have to say that free will did not work. Although God does the whole work, it does not happen in a total way (totaliter), so that another cause's participation or contribution would be completely denied. Carlstadt strongly objected to this: that the holy fathers had not spoken in this way. Eck refuted this by saying that the disputation about names (or words) should be left to the stubborn; enough that it was clear from the Fathers that the good work was entirely from God, and yet free will also did it. This is what he briefly said: Entirely, but not in a total way.

Since the matter of free will had been concluded in this way, and it had been put to the judges to be chosen, Martin Luther met with Eck in the matter of the supreme sovereignty of the Roman Church, and brought to the fore: the Pope was not more than the others according to divine right, but rather only by human consent, and also St. Peter had not received the supreme sovereignty over the Church of God before other apostles, but it was enough in the One Head, namely 1) Christ. Peter had not received the supreme rule over the Church of God before other apostles, but it was enough for the One Head of the Church, namely 1) Christ. On the other hand, Eck proved with evident testimonies and reasons that there was one supreme ruler of the same supreme head, Christ, in the Church by divine right, and that God had built the Church on this rock, that is, Peter and his successors, according to the evident testimonies of Augustine, Jerome, Ambrose, Gregory, Cyprian, Chrysostom, Leo, Bernard and some popes, who testify to this in explicit words. But Martin paid little attention to their reputation, because he based himself on St. Paul's saying to the Galatians and other passages, of which Eck endeavored to prove that they were not repugnant to him. But the judges will have to decide whether he got there.

Eck also admitted that the apostles were equal in priesthood and apostolic office, after Leo and Cyprian; nevertheless, Peter was set as the head, so that the divisions would be prevented. But since Eck reproached Martin: that such Lutheran

Martin replied that not all the articles condemned there were heretical, but that some of the articles of John Hus were quite Christian and evangelical; therefore he requested that Eck first prove that a concilium could not err. This has not been interpreted by many to the best of D. Martin, just as that he wanted to consider the Greeks, who were disobedient to the Roman church, nevertheless as pious and blessed; but this also belongs to the judges. But when Eck reproached: If the pope did not have the supreme authority by divine right, where would D. Martin get his religious habit? where would his brothers hear confessions? since the parishioners would certainly be against it 2c., D. Martin answered, among other things, that he did not want there to be a mendicant order! But he insisted very much on Gregorius in registro, denying that he was a general bishop. Eck explained hereupon in what way he had denied what he had been true, citing Gregorius about C. decretum 2. qu. 7. and that therefore he had resisted the emperor and the patriarch in Constantinople, as reported by Platina, whom Luther had given much credit in historical truths. The judges, however, will pronounce who among the two had judged best.

(7) Then they began to talk about purgatory: where do the punishments of purgatory come from, whether from the Scriptures, whether because the souls of the departed are of imperfect love, or because they are sufficient for the sins committed here? D. Martin answered: one could not prove purgatory from the Scriptures, although he constantly taught and believed it. And since D. Eck had referred to the books of the Maccabees, he denied that they belonged to the canonical writings. Eck, on the other hand, showed that they belonged to the Canon of the Bible (namely with the testimony of Augustine and Jerome in the Preface [to the Bible]) in the Church. And since many holy teachers were attracted, who pretended in their interpretations that St. Paul spoke of Purgatory in the passage to the Corinthians: "He will be saved, but only through fire" 2c., then D. Martin taught a different understanding; but whether he deviated from the opinion of the Fathers, let the judges see.

8 There was not so much dispute about indulgences. For that there were many abuses of the preachers of indulgences, both admitted, and Martin was more lenient than he otherwise wrote.

because he allowed that indulgences would be useful. However, he held on to the opinion that indulgences were a remission of good works. On the contrary, Eck said that it was a remission of the punishments due for sins. If he did not want to believe that indulgences would be enough, he would have been banned already after the last papal bull of Leo X.

(9) Then, concerning repentance and how it arises, D. Eck wanted to show from the Scriptures and the Fathers that repentance rightly begins with the fear of punishment. And to all that had been cited, Luther answered: first, that the childlike fear of wisdom was the beginning, but not the servile fear of punishment. But when D. Eck appealed to Augustine, Cassianus and others that it was also understood by servile fear, Martinus admitted that servile fear was the beginning of wisdom, but with grace. Eck resisted that grace would be before the beginning of grace, since wisdom in that passage, according to Augustine and Bernard, would be understood as love. Whether he rightly resisted this or not, the appointed judges will recognize.

Finally, Eck objected to the 4th and 5th thesis: If the guilt is remitted, the punishment is not yet over; and such punishment, which must be paid off by satisfaction, could be repaid by the pope through indulgences, and by the priest through the imposition of penance. And so such a person would do enough for the Church as well as for God, for the sin. But D. Martin opposed it. Therefore, the matter was left to the judges.

11 However, the masters had decreed that only the most difficult theses would be dealt with; hence it has come about that much matter has remained untouched.

12 Eck then went after Carlstadt again, and wanted to show him that the school teachers were not in disagreement with the church teachers, because of the removal of the bar [against grace], if one understood them correctly; and that if one does as much as is in one, one will be promoted in good by God and will be saved. He also apologized that, since he had said that the matter of the election of grace did not belong to the matter of which they dealt, Carlstadt had wanted to interpret this to him as if he had said that the passages about the election of grace did not belong to the works that should be crowned and rewarded; and that he had read quite well and rightly in Bernardus: Put away free will, and nothing can be blessed. But Carlstadt would rightly be called a falsifier of the books, if he wanted to read in Bernhardus for: Nothing can become blessed, wanted to read: nothing thereby 2c. (pro quod, quo). To which Carlstadt gave his answer; and it was subsequently put to the judges' verdict.

Finally, Carlstadt objected to Eck's second thesis and wanted to have that the righteous commits sin in every good work. Eck did not want to accept this, and argued that St. Lawrence should have sinned on the grate and St. Peter on the cross. And when Carlstadt brought up Augustine and Jerome, Eck sharply insisted: he should show the place, because this would not be found anywhere in them, but rather the opposite would be proven from Jerome against the Pelagians. Since now many things had been argued for and against the matter, it finally came down to the judges.

Now the matter of repentance was still left, which D. Carlstadt had also long since had recorded with the gentlemen, but because D. Martin was gone and he was also hurrying home, he no longer wanted to make objections to Eck. And so the whole disputation was again concluded, as it had been at the beginning, in a splendid way with a speech, which the learned Mr. Johann Lange of Lemberg delivered very eloquently.

You will, however, my highly learned Mr. Capito, demand to know who the chosen judges were; I will also report this. Eck and Carlstadt were also together before the disputation before the most illustrious Prince George, Duke of Saxony 2c, and the Rector and Concilium of the University. Eck said that he was ready to dispute and wanted to do everything that the gentlemen ordered, if only Carlstadt either agreed to the university's verdict or gave another judge. Carlstadt, however, who was just as ready to argue, asked that what was argued be recorded by faithful notaries or public scribes. Eck was immediately satisfied, if Carlstadt would only agree to a judge. So the gentlemen decided: no one should leave the place until they were one because of the judge. Father Martinus, however, did not want any university to be a judge, even though Eck had chosen him from almost all schools in Germany, Italy, France and England, except for two; on the other hand, he [Luther] suggested that everything that had been discussed should be printed and sent out, so that everyone who read it would be free to do so.

would like to judge. But the most illustrious councillors and the council of the university did not want to let him attend the disputation. So they left the same day and Martin did not want to dispute; afterwards, however, on the advice of his friends, he reappeared and accepted the disputation in Carlstadt's manner.

When the disputation was over, Eck gave the most illustrious prince's councillors under his foot: they would like to elect judges in the presence of Duke George (because the most illustrious prince had often been at the disputation). Therefore Martin suggested the high school in Paris and Erfurt, which Eck also accepted, if only Martin's hermit brothers in Erfurt were not present. Since the duke was away, Martin wanted the whole university to judge, it could be lawyers, physicians or philosophers, but the fathers of the holy Dominican and Franciscan order should not be present. However, it seemed unreasonable to the corner that physicians or people of other professions should judge the highest theological matters or reasons; nevertheless, with both satisfaction, the matter was placed in the will of the most illustrious prince.

17 This is what I wanted to write to you, my dear Capito, in a credible way. Of course, there will be enough who, out of sheer eagerness for victory, will bring all sorts of things to the people, so that it may have the appearance that they have won, even if it is contrary to the truth. But you will believe this report completely: for this is how everything happened properly and truly with the Leipzig theological disputation. I also assure you that I have not written anything to love or harm any part of it, but only how it happened; therefore I refer to our most noble Prince George, and to his most favorable and experienced councils, and to the whole University of Leipzig. When the disputation comes out, everything will turn out that way. Farewell, my most esteemed and learned friend, and greet D. Johann Oecolampadius, who is well experienced in all three languages, as well as Beatus Rhenanus, Bruno and all other good friends of mine. Leipzig, from our house, July 31, in the year 1519.

Translated into German.

1) Two men, who are considered by many to be excellent and outstanding in soul and body, especially the impatient monk, named Martinus, appears, and with him Andreas Carlstadt, full of mockery and an excellent healer, who do not claim to be scholastics, but rather Wittenberg church teachers. For they presume to interpret the Holy Scriptures from their own minds, and in the theological struggle they also deny the Scholastics and the Fathers, who were enlightened by the Holy Spirit, as Thomas Aquinas, Thomas Aquinas, whom they are undoubtedly not worthy to dissolve, Scotus the astute teacher, Bonaventure the irrefutable, Capreolus the highly learned teacher, Albertus Magnus, who is not less than these, and many others, whom I will pass over for the sake of brevity. Although they have sharpened their dog's and viper's teeth venomously and disgracefully against the aforementioned scholastics, and Carlstadt has unashamedly called them shopkeepers in front of many teachers and excellent men, they have finally taken their great refuge in such teachers in the utmost and last need, as in a sanctuary of scholarship and science. But such godless ruffraff is wont to leave a friend and patron in good fortune, but afterwards, when the need arises, to seek his help and protection. Thus the aforementioned two doctors, since they were first able to refute and repel Eck's hostile arrows and reasons by means of the holy church teachers, knew how to rebuke and reject the school teachers; but when they were unable to knock down Eck's Hercules- and Simson-like answers either by their own art or by means of the church teachers' writings, they sought to beat Eck's thunderbolts to the ground by means of the scholastics' erudition. So the aforementioned doctors have not been able to shut the mouth of some man Eck, who appeared with an excellent and splendid modesty, with their intrigues, deceptions, and reasons shot like arrows. What can I say much? Eck's bravery and his great erudition always kept the last word in the dispute in a splendid and manly manner. For before that, the Wittenbergers cried out that they would get the victory. But due to Eck's triumph, they fell miserably and ridiculously into the pit that they secretly intended to prepare for our humble and gentle Eck. On this learned Eck, who is experienced and well-shod in all sciences, and who was as meek as a lamb, they went out of their house with great tumult and violence, with swords and spears, and turned their raised knives against him, as the poisonous Jews against the Savior, to clear him out of the way. I, when I saw Eck wandering alone, without any company and without a crowd, like a poor exiled man among fierce wolves, my eyes glazed over and I thought with amazement: Even Hercules cannot easily stand against two. Except that two things came to my mind for consolation: first, that all of Eck's theses defended the Christian faith, which our ancestors and parents from long ago have always held and confessed until our time. Secondly, that therefore the great and gracious God graciously assists those who honor Him and keep His commandments. Thirdly, that the excellent D. Eck has said quite nicely and merrily: Not all who wielded great swords could strike down and refute Eck's thunderbolts.

2 However, of the theses that Mart. Luther, everyone can easily see that they are unreasonably against the long and common custom of the holy fathers. For who does not believe that the pope is a head appointed by divine right? Who can imagine that a good work is so from God that man's diligence and effort do not contribute to it? Which wise man will also admit that every priest has the power and jurisdiction which the pope, the earthly God, has in his majesty? Who will say that man commits sin even in a good work, as Carlstadt dreams? Which of the teachers will also claim that repentance, which is most necessary for salvation, starts from love and not from fear of the Lord? Who has ever heard and believed that indulgences are a remission of good works, as the venerable Father Martinus certainly claimed?

wants? Finally, which Christian calls the Hussite and Bohemian articles fundamental Christianity, as the Wittenberg Doctor Martinus publicly asserted in the dispute? This and other such things are contained in the Wittenberg theses and proofs; however, I do not want to pass judgment on such opinions. Let those judge who are chosen and ordered to do so.

3) However, no one will like to stubbornly and maliciously oppose the common opinion and custom of the old fathers and our ancestors just mentioned.

1) After God's office [the mass] was held in the church of St. Thomas, a large crowd of people went to the castle of the most noble prince and duke George, where 2) all of them prayed in song for the grace of the Holy Spirit. The following day, the two Wittenberg doctors came to the theological battle with great pomp and accompaniment, and a large crowd of doctors, masters, baccalaureates and students, all of whom had a great desire for victory over Eck, marched behind the said doctors, and many of them led the said doctors and preceptors back to their dwellings. But as time went by and things went very differently and unhappily, all such trabants gradually looked around for the gate, like swallows that stay in the summer and in warm times, but then suddenly leave in the cold. For since the Wittenbergers themselves doubted that their doctors would gain the victory over the one man Eck, because of his herculean powers and strong scholarship, they made a miserable getaway one after the other, like the godless Jews when Jesus was talking to the Pharisees and scribes, who were accusing a poor and sorrowful woman of her sin before him: For he wrote in the dust the sins and iniquities which every one had committed, saying, He that is without sin and iniquity among you, let him cast the first stone at her. And when they saw and heard this, they went out secretly to the temple. In truth, hardly anyone among the great Wittenberg doctors remained steadfast in the theological struggle. That is why many have mockingly said: "Where is the great bunch of doctors, ma-.

1) This is probably what Rubeus wanted to say. The words, as they stand there, say the opposite: rekikwrs ae pertivaeitsr rslnetari nsmo iiaesitat.

gister and Baccalaureen Martins and Carlstadts? where does he sleep or lie buried? Does no one help them any more to forge weapons and thunderbolts against Eck? Does no one continue to secretly blow into them something of science and learned ideas, to their praise and glory? Ah! what shall I say of the venerable father, whom the Wittenbergers worship and adore almost as a heavenly god? I confess that he was once great even with Rubeus; but now I confess also that his praise has entirely died out and passed away in my heart. For the venerable father, before the battle was over, since few knew about it, went diligently to the gates of the city; the next day Carlstadt sought his Martin. When Eck was thus abandoned by his opponents, he took the liberty of going to the other Leipzig disputations himself, so that he might hear the most distinguished and famous teachers in the theological faculty there. Eck was also not ashamed to go to the philosophical assembly.

4. so that I tell the thing a little more extensively, I want to report what the Wittenberg doctors have done. For, that they would like to catch D. Eck, who has so much science and so much knowledge, because they wrongly thought that they alone knew the Scriptures as masters, and that they alone had studied and seen the great books of the church teachers for that reason; therefore, perhaps, as all godly souls easily believe, they did not learn Aristotelian scholarship so thoroughly; and the Wittenberg doctors think that even the scholastics and the holy fathers did not understand the holy Scriptures so astutely, masterfully, wisely and thoroughly as they had and knew all the understanding of the Scriptures; or have probably thought that Eck, the intrepid man, did not read any other teachers at all as schoolteachers. Therefore, like cunning foxes, they wanted to reject all the writings of the school teachers from the scholarly struggle right at the beginning of the theological disputation. Eck, however, as befits a wise, great and excellent man, was able to conceal his intrepid and unconquerable scholarship for a time; therefore he spoke to them quite modestly and humbly: I am not bound to Scotus as to a woman (nec Scotum in uxorem duxi). They deny me the one who formerly earned me a thousand gold florins. We do not want to be easily repugnant to you in anything. I will gladly go with you to the battlefield, which, as you think, is brighter and lighter for you than it is for me. Eck also said in a very friendly way: "What have

What have the holy fathers, namely Thomas, Scotus, Bonaventure and the other fathers, whom divine grace has equipped, done, that they are unfortunately! just now completely excluded from the theological and divine disputation by the Wittenberg doctors? However, so that you see that I have read not only the school teachers, but also church teachers, I do not want to attract and bring forward some school teachers in your disputation, although no wise person, except you, denies that such great fathers are highly learned and enlightened by the Holy Spirit, and blasphemously and mockingly pulls them through. This is what Eck once said in the heat: "I can honestly confess that the school teachers certainly have Carlstadt's opinion of free will. And Eck proved this from the school teachers in Carlstadt's conclusions about free will, even if he had denied them indisputably. Afterwards, Eck also once said, as he modestly taunted: "Highly learned Mr. D. Carlstadt, if there are any thunderbolts and astute reasons against the rejected teachers, then I am ready to take them up and refute them, and to protect and assert the holy fathers with all my might. Thus Eck stood fearlessly and heroically, like another Hector, yes, like a lion in the public pulpit for the protection of the faith of the church, and spared no enemy, and said: he had been diligently instructed in the holy fathers from his youth. And Eck has justifiably and well insulted Carlstadt for falsely and presumptuously pretending that Eck had read little or nothing in the books of the Holy Fathers. But Eck, a well-educated man, could conceal the depth of his sciences, and said to Carlstadt in jest: "My dear scornful doctor, I have from the earliest years gladly studied in the holy scriptures, and let myself be taught from them, also read such books enough, and not the school teachers alone, as Carlstadt blames me, but have also perused almost all the church teachers with lynx eyes, not with lucid or dripping eyes, like D. Carlstadt (which the two Wittenberg gods before Eck's arrival never believed). Yes, I have taken the greatest pains to read and understand the divine teachers to the end. And so that the two conceited, proud Wittenberg theologians would get to know Eck and see that he had brought his quiver full of thunderbolts, theological spears and arrows with him to the Leipzig scholarly battle, thereby wounding and hurting the Wittenbergers, to the shame and mockery of all listeners, he said once, with all Rightly teasing the two Wittenberg doctors: "These two people thought that I had not come so deeply into reading and the knowledge of the church teachers. And indeed, no one doubts that if Eck's thunderbolts had been so well known and knowledgeable to them beforehand, they would certainly not have taken to hurling such ineffectual wedges and arrows at such a great man, and would have eagerly endeavored to repel his projectiles and attacks.

(5) Without boasting (as the writings of the notaries of his time will clearly show), the highly respectable Mr. Eck certainly drew from his incomparable memory, in front of all the scholars present, on the ten proven, competent church teachers, namely not only their names, but also their important, excellent, emphatic and salutary sayings and teachings, for the salvation and right faith of the human race. And yet the Wittenbergers insolently and recklessly blasphemed Eck and pretended that he had not cited any church teachers in the midst of the controversy. But what the Wittenbergers stumbled together from the books at home, they later recited from the books, just as boys recite their lessons to their fox-like teachers. That is why the excellent doctor said to the Wittenbergers with an undaunted voice: A disputant's special task is to grasp all the reasons and arrows in the church dispute without the aid of paper, and to answer and overturn the objections and scruples in the same way: for those who only show their ability in what is recorded in books, and read what they should have in their memory, must fear 1) that when the books burn, all their knowledge will go up in smoke. Carlstadt considered these few words well, and said to his responsibility, although quite läppisch: he would not give a disputator. Mr. D. Eck replied in a bright voice: "Among scholars, however, it is considered the work of a disputer to summarize what is objected to in a delicate, clear, orderly and perfect manner, and to resolve and reject the difficulties of the objections. I am surprised, said Eck, that Carlstadt does not want to be a disputator, since he does and administers everything that

1) What the old translator offers here may have been the opinion of Rubens; we were not able to translate the Latin words either. They read: Hui NNNIHNS in lidromm oUenänt tacnltats rnsrnoias Kunäentsk inunuk oonkerere oonnntittenäa veninnt, ne etc.

A disputator does this, namely by making objections and also answering me with his reasons, which he considers insurmountable. Yes, he went with me to the battlefield for the sake of victory. And before Eck's arrival, Carlstadt and Martin boasted in vain, since (as Eck's enemies would have it) nothing was more certain and firm with them than the victory over Eck, the intrepid and unconquerable man. But one has to name everything (according to Aristotle 2 de anim.) from the end; but Aristotle is none of their business, whom they also reject without justification, therefore they themselves and their followers are mistaken, and they are rightly deceived in their presumption. Their books also obviously testify above with what they really deal, even if not with real wars and physical battles, but with philosophical and theological ones: so they may keep silent, and not protect themselves by saying that they do not want to be disputants. I have at least answered them to this day, and am still today ready and willing to answer the Wittenberg doctors bravely and courageously, and no bullet nor terror shall keep me from taking you on in the public learned battlefield, with all praiseworthy Simson-like and brave courage to obtain victory, by the assistance of the all-good and mighty God, for the salvation of all men, and for praise, honors, harmony and holy fruitfulness, with all the peace of the apostolic chair now left almost without umbrella and protection.

6. And so that it does not appear to the reader as if I were presenting something false about the aforementioned church scholars whom Eck attracted in his godliness, I will soon name them individually; who not only those who were on Eck's side, because Eck defended the old and common faith of our parents and their opinion with power, and said that one must always believe and hope that what our forefathers all faithfully held in firm faith was right, since no wise man yet considers them to be condemned, and therefore we, who confess their faith and religion, will not condemn them either, have heard, but have also heard the shameful enemies of Eck and those who were on Martin's and Carlstadt's side, as good and praiseworthy, to whom all truth of the Holy Scriptures will not have been miserably hidden until the Wittenberg doctors' appearance, nor will have been eradicated from the souls of so many other learned teachers, that it would only have been given and instilled anew by heaven to two Wittenbergers, but not to the previous Holy Fathers, of whom one sings and says that they live holy forever with the blessed and elect without all fear of punishment.

I can freely confess that the Wittenberg doctors not only heard Eck's words above, but also did not seek to thoroughly consider the actual opinion of Eck's words. And since the Wittenbergers truly could not catch Eck's skill and prudence from the holy fathers' writings, they have sought to entrap Eck in their hams by the words put forward by Eck himself: for words, as they say, catch souls as the bull is caught by the horns. How cunningly and carefully they watched for all the words that Eck dropped! like the Jews who wanted to catch JESum in his words. For when the kind JESus had said before Pilate, Thou hadst no power, except it were given thee by my Father which is in heaven; but when the Jews heard these things of dear JESu, and were enraged and mad at them, they said, He maketh himself the Son of God thereby, take him out of the way. So they also rose up against Eck, an evangelical, zealous lover and defender of theological truth, with great clamor, since Eck had publicly called Martin a heretic and patron of Hussite error. For Martin had called some Hussite errors quite Christian, but Hus was burned as a heretic because of them; therefore he called him so in front of all worthy men in a large assembly. And then the Wittenbergers rose up with great noise and clamor against the meek and humble defender of the evangelical truth; although God does not forsake him forever; and said with gnashing teeth: Behold, he publicly calls our excellent teacher Martin a heretic. And the Wittenberg lawyers cried out: He must protest! The venerable Father Martin, enraged and incited by the Wittenbergers, called out to the sworn notaries: "Write that Eck does not hesitate to call me a heretic and a Hussite in an unreasonable and shameful way. But Eck's modesty and humility said quite kindly without any fear: "I cannot protest much, because I am not a legal expert today, but you gentlemen notaries write and record this: Eck wants to show it through his [Luther's] words and writings. I think that the most venerable Father Martin sometimes did not argue out of right consideration, but merely with his mouth against Eck's thunderbolts. For he [Eck] has already brought many a wretched person to the point that they do not do much thoughtful or right things.

have been able to talk. It annoys many who speak when some words escape them that they did not think of, because they sometimes regret it bitterly and miserably afterwards. And so, when the venerable father Martinus ordered some things to be written to the notaries, which he had read or brought forward, Eck, with his nimble and fresh memory, so that heaven would favor him, knew how to recite everything again the next day, and thus sought to enforce Martinus in his reasons and counter-answer, whereupon Martinus always liked to withdraw and deny his words, so that he often firmly maintained that he had not spoken that. Eck, however, referred himself and Martinus to the public scribes, where Martin's words were clearly found. After that, Eck, according to his native tongue or German, mockingly said against Martin: "Der Haß leidt ym Pfeffer", so that the most illustrious Duke of Leipzig, who was present, heard it.

(8) But that I report once the names of the teachers who have been drawn in the theological disputation, it was especially St. Jerome first, then Augustine, Ambrose, Bernard, Cyprian, Solomon, Chrysostom, David, Lyra, Paul, and the four evangelists; and the others, Scotus, although he is holy, Thomas, Aegidius of Rome, Bonaventure, Albertus, Capreolus, Petr. Nigri, Aristotle, and many other excellent men, who have in no way opposed the church scribes, and have been buried in Eck's head as it were abundantly and frequently, and have made their home there: all of these, who have just been mentioned, the two Wittenberg doctors, as if they were damned, and did not understand the Wittenberg theses with proper insight for a long time, or did not think right of them, shamefully did not want to allow them to be valid in the public disputation of the theological faculty. As if Eck (who cites them, although he does not use it) and them did not understand the Scriptures as well as the Wittenbergers: 1) since Eck understood all the same things and many more and more pointed things in the most exact way, which everyone who heard Eck speak and argue could see. In the first place, Eck was much more able to speak from his head quickly and much faster and to draw his reasons and counter-answers much more comprehensibly from the writings and testimonies of the church teachers than the Wittenberg doctors were able to do by their

The author, who often read from the books, not from memory but from notes, raised his objections against Eck's insurmountable power. He could easily have overcome them splendidly in one day and given the disputation a speedy and happy outcome. I wonder not a little, but quite a lot, why two such great lights in Wittenberg, against the unchanged honor of the holy fathers, have held them in such low esteem and rejected them. The venerable Father Martin, who, as I confess, is very learned and of quite high science, is nevertheless miserably deceived; but by what kind of spirit is hidden from my little understanding. Which wise man is not of the opinion that those who refute the scholastic teachers and act disrespectfully are like sows carrying a bag, which they [the scholastic teachers] certainly do not understand properly, or if they do know something about it, it certainly does not bear much fruit with them, because they only dare to speak above and nothing certain about them; since the highest pleasure of a right disputator is to act accurately not only theological, but also the writings of the school teachers in the assembly of many scholars. For a learned and thorough disputator is not afraid of anyone, but goes after every opponent like Hercules or Samson, bravely and courageously, like a roaring lion; for because he has heart enough, he also gives courage to every scholar who wants to step publicly on the battlefield and calls him to appear. But those who know nothing of the beautiful gift of philosophy do not fight cheerfully, but despondently with the adversary. Those who have gifts of body and joy, but do not bring much learning and science with them, do not appear clever and learned either. Woe to those who reject the school teachers and the holy, divine philosophy, and do not teach it to their apprentices faithfully and diligently in their first childhood! For certainly philosophy forges and carves the weapons and arrows, so that one resists the other on the learned battlefield of truth in an erudite manner and keeps the antagonism; and in theology, of course, there is bad debate if Pallas is not on one's side, since all human sciences serve divine theology like handmaidens, and one always holds out a hand to the other. He seems to me not yet to be feared by one who foolishly and impudently banishes philosophy from his mind and

1) The old translator has given the preceding (not according to the Latin as it is found in Löschner) in this way: we leave it at that, because our original is really untranslatable here.

2) In Löschner: indoctos.

He who knows neither dialectics nor the art of nature, neither morals nor metaphysics, and is not versed in all parts and depths of philosophy. Hence it is that those who appear without philosophy generally give bald, lame, foolish and ridiculous answers when they are asked to resolve the objections and reasons; for they often confess that the reasons are too difficult and insurmountable for them when they say: I have not laid myself upon them.

What a beautiful and noble resolution of reasons is this, which is best suited for a fool above all fools, if you disputator do not want to answer and refute everything in the disputation, but crawl behind the oven at home and bake pears, since you do not like to go back to your study room with shame, disgrace and heartache? Ah! my highly respectable bishop, to whom I ascribe this, if Eck had not allowed the church teachers in the disputation battle to be valid for the Wittenberg doctors (for their conclusions could be proven and presented by school teachers; others may say what they want, but I am certain of this and have no doubt at all): then he would have found in the Wittenbergers full of joy and rejoicing what they thought to obtain so long and in vain before his arrival at Eck. But Eck's erudition is infinite, which the Wittenbergers did not seek in him. They may, if it pleases them, challenge Eck's intrepidity once again in writings to a theological or philosophical battle. The heroic Eck, as I have perceived, does not shy away from any adversary, because he is insurmountable, as Carlstadt attributed this to Eck in praise in mocking speech, when he answered him: I am also unafraid. Be it as it may, the Wittenbergers have brought little or nothing home to their university from the victory, except scratching behind the ears, although Carlstadt threatened our friendly Eck almost fatally, contrary to the free escort, and poured out the fury, barking in German language so against him: That shall get you, as the grass gets the dog! Only firmly believe that Eck is not a child nor a new soldier in the writings and depths of the church teachers, but even an old and tempted soldier, who does not shy away from any of his enemies, nor does he fall asleep or slumber before them; in his presence Eck did not fall asleep either.

10 Moreover, the Wittenberg doctors came to the disputation with only one shield, and thus not well suited for dispute.

equipped. But Eck, well guarded with two shields and equipped for future knighthood, flew here with a right heroic courage on the day before the Corpus Christi feast in 1519. Eck's first shield was a profound and sublime knowledge and knowledge of the Holy Scriptures; the other was a thorough and wholesome teaching and science of school teachers. What shall I say much? Eck, the traveler, the serious man, who fears no adversary, stood upright in the public auditorium like a brave lion, with proper and modest gestures and posture of body, hands, eyes and head, before a large and not mean crowd of the most learned, excellent and noble men, finely and well equipped, and eloquence had, as it were, found a seat on his lips. He confidently said to those who boasted that they would present to the corner insurmountably strong and irresolvable reasons and objections: Come on, advance bravely, and send your projectiles and reasons against me: though they seem insurmountable to you, yet they will not be to me. Make haste and come again with more ecclesiastical thunderbolts, I will wait for them confidently; and that is why I have come so far by dangerous ways. Only believe that your reasons and arrows do me no harm; I will accept them all and answer them without timidity. And I do not wait for a single one; no, there may be as many of them as you like. Do not judge so childishly against me only two, four, seven or ten, but the multitude of reasons. I am not afraid of it; therefore only argue against me confidently; run against me hastily, and as many as they are, I am ready and willing to answer everything.

Then Carlstadt, eager for victory, said: "Tomorrow, Doctor, I will present an indissoluble and insurmountable reason to your glory. But so far, Rubeus has really not seen or heard one that Eck has not theologically and from church scholars refuted and nullified. To this the highly learned Mr. D. Eck immediately said: Dear! just present your reasons right away (but it may have been, as I assume, only words at Carlstadt). Eck's excellent memory could happily recite from his head, without books and without faltering, what his opponents had read out, sometimes for more than an hour. One particularly admired this man's way of punishing his opponents: "Take," he said, "you doctors, from me a model of disputing, for I have also often been where excellent philosophers have been.

sophen and scholars have debated together, but they have not, like you, argued with the opening of books, but, being provided with much science and well equipped, have persistently resisted me. Even boys in schools are not allowed to read from the books or to conclude; this is forbidden to them by their teachers. However, said Eck, if you have such a poor and miserable memory, then give a child what you have read together at home, so that it reads this to the notaries. Then I will answer what I have read, without any shame or fear. But certainly the highly important and excellent work is now proceeding quite childishly, since the duties of the disputants, said Eck, have been well and clearly presented, namely, to present the reasons well in the opposition, and to dress without books; then to formulate the objections and counter-arguments properly, delicately, clearly, neatly and astutely, and then to solve and refute the knots of doubt and difficulties; finally, however, also to reinforce the answers with the testimonies or rational reasons given, and to add a reply, if it can be done. For they falsely accuse Eck, the most patient of men, of not correctly citing the witnesses. For Eck has given them the lie and said: If ever a passage is found not to be correct and true, then I will pay a hundred gold florins for one. And whether I speak true, may the present excellent doctors recognize.

12. I am surprised beyond measure that the excellent Wittenberg doctors had such a ready and quick memory against Eck that they tried to poke and prod him again and again with many immodest words that are not appropriate for godly and right theologians, I believe, in order to bring him into armor and zeal, from which there follows hastiness and anger, as it is said by the philosophers, and as Aristotle in his books Elenchorum forges the weapons against the one who attacks again and again, that he tries to bring him to anger by irritation, which deprives the mind of its deliberateness, so that he no longer knows what he is talking about. But Eck, as a man whom no movement at all sets on heat, has always been seen with equanimity, as befits a wise man. But they had no memory at all that they could have refuted Eck's reason or answer by heart just once: for they copied all of Eck's objections and answers with great effort and exertion, and thus Eck's reasons and answers were immediately written down.

They have tried never to argue from the head, but with the help of the paper. They did not want to attack their heads. They may have thought they had a child before them, while they found a Hercules. How? if the paper had been secretly stolen from the doctors? I answer: Then it would have been over for them; or it would have happened to them as it did to the good Father, who once went confidently and joyfully to the disputation place, but relied more on a piece of paper than on his memory. But since someone had secretly taken his paper, on which the reasons were written, and it was his turn to make conclusions, he searched to the right and left, above and below, but found no conclusion or reason for himself, so that he said above the search: "The first Mr. Baccalaureus say a word here, and after him the other! Although he did not oppose the responders, he nevertheless said on his way out: You gentlemen Baccalaurei have done well, because there are no reasons, I want to go swimming in the meantime; and thus carried off the praise of the crow by Horace. Carlstadt misrepresented a testimony that he could not prove at all. Eck, whom Carlstadt wanted to accuse of falsely citing passages, punished him severely about it, saying: "If such testimony is found among the scholastics or church scholars, then I will have the stomach torn out. But give me Cyprianus! because, according to your pretensions, I am supposed to have dressed him wrongly. They gave him the book. He found the passage, pointed to it with his hand, and said, "Tell Philip to open his dark eyes, that he may see Cyprian's passage clearly.

13 Since the Wittenbergers saw and recognized that Eck was so learned and versed in the church doctrines, they put forward some wrong resolutions or explanations, and badly refuted the reasons, although he had given them, may it be out of favor or not, time enough to make themselves right and to consider in order to overturn his reasons. On the other hand, Eck did not take any time at all to reflect, because he considered it childish to look for time and to think up excuses, as the Wittenbergers did when they took time to prepare answers against Eck's objections. For when the venerable father once seemed to make it too long for Eck to read, so that he would have time to think up reasons against Eck for the following day, he said: Venerable father,

1) Instead of HUEützualn read HnamHULm (Walch).

I pray, let your reasons come out now, that I may not have the night to refute your arrows, that tomorrow I may hear fresh and new [reasons].

14 Although the Wittenberg doctors came to Eck for the sake of disputing, they seemed to exercise more the office of readers than that of disputers, so that many excellent men have said to me that these doctors were not disputants, but readers, like the schoolmasters. That is why the highly learned Mr. D. Eck once left the disputation because of the reading of these doctors, because he thought that it was not appropriate to always read from books in such an important matter; the listeners left at the same time as Eck, since Carlstadt was reading for the notaries on the high chair. Finally, the master and doctor walked behind the students and listeners in a wrong way, and not the listeners [behind him]. Moreover, all masters and doctors left.

15 But Eck alone has always remained constant and firm, like Mary in Christ's suffering, unchanging. For although the excellent and learned theologians at Leipzig, also the philosophers supported by the medical faculty, likewise the extremely experienced jurists, have sent their sentences to all of them individually as brothers, so that the foreign guests might hear what great and much skill there is in all aspects of philosophy in the Leipzig masters: yet none of the splendid and excellent men at Leipzig has wanted to dare to fight. Rubeus excuses the Wittenbergers, since none of them is interested in philosophy, which is why I think they cannot debate; but what kind of philosophical sect they belong to, and in what kind of art they teach and instruct their own, and thus earn their pay, I do not know to this day, since both the masters and the students want to exterminate and exterminate all philosophers boldly and freely, to their harm and destruction. In truth, I have heard with my ears that some masters, baccalaureates and students of Wittenberg, with whom I have quarreled almost to the point of tearing my hair out, have scolded Aristotle, the light of nature, a seducer of youth with great insolence, defiance and conceit, since some of the above-mentioned persons, since I have asked them something little and bad, have known nothing of science to answer, because they had not entered deeply into such mysteries. To them I said in anger: Just tell me, to what kind of What good is wasted in the study of your parents, and under what masters and leaders of learning and art are your minds applied? They answered: They laid on the dainty arts and languages. But they shamefully did not know that the dear philosophy was secretly hidden in the bottom of the poets and in their core sayings and writings. For they did not know that a poet is a man who is composed and built of everything that is called science; and so it seemed to me that the good people set about high and splendid books of [great] authors without first having a ground in some science. Would to God that they did not, without benefit and honor, fall miserably from the heights to the ground.

16 The following miserable, bald and insipid answers have always been put forward by the Wittenbergers when they could not answer anything right and proper to Eck's objections and reasons, which I and many others have written out word for word: the first: I answer with the word: I deny. The other: You have missed the point. The third: This is none of my business. The fourth: Your reason is for me. The fifth: I pass over the reason, because it is useless. The sixth: The Lord John attracts an invalid warrant here. The seventh: Your rights against me are ludicrous. The eighth, since they said scornfully and with laughter: This serves nothing at all. The ninth: No letter serves to refute our opinion. The tenth: The Concilium could have erred, because they were men. The eleventh: I believe more in my witness than in all your testimonies. The twelfth: We don't know the attracted unknown and obscure warrantor at all. The thirteenth: I leave the reason to the judges. To this Eck said with a reference: So my reasons shall disprove the judges and not you? this is a good answer, but it is not valid with me. The fourteenth: Tomorrow I will give insurmountable reasons, and answer. The fifteenth: Your reason is a false Aristotelian conclusion. It is a good answer among ignorant people who let bald remedies count, but it has nothing to mean. The sixteenth: The erudite Doctor seeks to divert me from the matter at hand to something else. The seventeenth: The testimonies he attracts are dragged by the hair. The eighteenth: I do not know what the Herr Doctor means when he says, what is to be laughed at, "in a wholesome way". 1) It is quite a prickly strange monster. Alas! poor doctor, why do you so often mock such a learned man, so experienced in many sciences? since all those who know the language know that "the whole thing" and "in a complete way" are not the same. Doctor Eck at least clearly explained to Carlstadt in the disputation what "mainly", what less "mainly", what "completely" means, like a teacher punishing a pupil in school: Who does not know that, what else should he know? Since Carlstadt, with his awkwardness, did not understand the words, 1) why then did he not ask Philipp Melanchthon about it without hesitation? I am also very surprised about Philippus, since he has blown so much into the Doctors that he has not also explained the "gänzlich" and "hauptsächlich" to them. But I will hold Philip excused. He has thought approximately: Such a man, like Carlstadt, would have explored such bad and childish things in philosophy for a long time. I cannot, truly! wonder enough that Carlstadt does not know what "mainly" and "entirely" and "less mainly" mean in school teachers, and that he calls these words spiky strange monsters, since he has publicly boasted that he wants to argue with Eck in Scotus about cloth for a pair of pants. But since Eck also showed that he knew more important, higher and more perceptive things in the school doctrines, he also told Carlstadt for reprimand: And I also want to argue bravely with you about a splendidly decorated hood (pro undulata veste). But Eck, who is experienced in all depths of science, has always tried to penetrate the above-mentioned bad answers and refutations, because of which even boys, if they had given them in the schools, would have been beaten, much more thoroughly, more learned and truer. Or the Wittenbergers may have brought forward the above-mentioned answers against Eck, so that they might incite the mob against Eck, the meek man, or so that they would not seem to be shamefully silent before Eck out of ignorance. Be that as it may, I do not like such ways of answering, they may please whom they please, although they were highly valued by the Wittenbergers.

1) Namely, that God does the whole, but not entirely.

17. I want to answer a secret question (that one wants to raise) and give a report, what such high and excellent men have done on feast days, so that it would not be seen by the common people how they sagged in the body. The venerable father, that I may say what he did well, did not dare to go to the temple of God and the saints because his conscience made him disobedient 2) to the pope, but Carlstadt, as I assume, perhaps wanted to forge indelible and insurmountable arrows against Eck at home, or to make Eck's spears and reasons blunt. Eck, however, as it were, taught the Scriptures shrewdly in a disputating manner, and presented the divine word clearly and happily before the common people.

By the way, Eck may have studied little or nothing with the Wittenberg disputants during the theological battle, since he testified quite nicely before a large public assembly of many people what he had said against the Wittenbergers: that although they had always considered Eck to be overcome long before, they had finally dragged a whole load of books with them. Eck, on the other hand, rode around on the lovely, flowery terrain with the council's servants, and yet afterwards appeared on the battlefield sufficiently and over-armed and ready. I think he realized that the Wittenbergers did not have such great thunderbolts and deep reasons in their heads that he would need the erudition of the Sibyls, or of an Apollo, or the help of Oedipus, but he could quite well give the bravest and most thorough answers to the objections or answers of the Wittenberg doctors from his own strength, which he brought with him from his study to the Leipzig battle in his vivid and most happy memory.

(19) I am truly not surprised enough that Philip Melanchthon did not want to understand what the common saying says: The chariot must pull the ox; and: He brings water to the frogs; since Eck once gave him one, saying: The Spirit blows where he wills (and another time he also gave him a reprimand in German: Philippe, tell me also once something), that Philippe had not given him these mean and hackneyed ways to answer also under the foot; the first: It is well true according to you, but not according to me; to the other: Your reasons are right before the midday meal, but not after it. With the help of such answers, they would have undoubtedly soon and without effort easily dissolve and refute all the reasons put forward against them, even though the good Philip childishly forgot them out of fright and shock at Eck's voice. For Carlstadt himself, in public before so many learned people, let himself be heard rather rudely, Eck to his shame and disgrace, against theological modesty: Eck roars with an ox's voice. Eck, however, did not pay attention to such invectives, but kept silent; for both Wittenberg doctors, in such an important and divine matter, brought up such coarse antics, which are not appropriate for a shepherd; and he said in German: "Ich kündt also wol Schendwort geben als ein ander, wenns wohl stünd", but I stick to Eck's modesty. However, I do not think that Eck can be accused of having an ox voice, as Carlstadt rudely said of Eck; rather, Carlstadt, such a great man (about which scholars may judge), is resented for not knowing that St. Lucas, the evangelical drommete, is compared to a bark, or even Thomas Aquinas, whom Carlstadt disrespectfully despises. Albertus, with his roar and salutary erudition, has preached to almost the whole world, whom Eck will undoubtedly equal in his time, according to everyone's confession, so that the Drommete will not perish. It will happen that Eck will still enlighten the whole wide world with his roar and with his holy, high and salutary teachings, for the benefit of many people and the salvation of immortal souls. All this was said by the excellent and famous doctors at that time in public.

Rubeus has copied it exactly from word to word. Therefore, I do not now present my words in pen or in this writing, but only those of the three doctors, and ask them to forgive me and not to look askance when I take the liberty of telling their words and story here. Either their words have been good and honorable, or shameful and unjust; if honest, they and Rubeus are praised, for the meaner the good, the better it is; but where dishonorable, they are resented, but not Rubeus, for one does not avoid evil unless one knows it. So much with respect!

Translated into German.

Johann Eck to the gentle reader his greeting!

1. since I had disputed at the laudable Leipzig University with the father Martin Luther and Andreas Carlstadt about important theological matters, and it had been decided by the most illustrious prince, Duke George of Saxony 2c., and the Leipzig University Council had decided that our disputation would not go to print before the judges to be chosen had judged which of us had spoken in accordance with or against the Christian faith: nevertheless, the Wittenberg language teacher Philippus, who even understands his Greek and Latin, took the trouble to issue a letter 1) attacking me and using many names to defend not my, but the faith's cause.

1) Meant is Melancthon's letter to Oekolampad, Document No. 394, against which this writing is directed.

and to usurp the office which we have entrusted to the University of Paris. To this I must reply, not for memet's sake, but for the sake of the simple, so that they are not seduced by sweet words or plunged into error. But I will go through his little letter with short remarks. You will like it, dear reader, and spend a little time to consider them.

2. 1) Philip writes: I would have asserted before the most illustrious prince's appointed commissioners that it was the right of the disputants that nothing be written out. He attributes this to me falsely. For I have never mentioned such things to the commissioners; I have always said that I would like the notaries to write everything down. In private conversations, I confess, I have said that the disputant's mind would be dulled by the delay in writing, and the sharpness of the intellect would not be as tense as the zeal or heat of a disputation required. The commissaries of the most noble prince and the whole council of the university will testify to this.

3. 2) From free will, he says, it was brought up: whether we deserve grace according to equity (de congruo)? Since this was the question, he accuses me of having drawn him to a completely different matter than Carlstadt's intention, namely, whether grace alone works the good work? But anyone who reads my seventh thesis can see how impudently he does this: He is mistaken who says that man's free will is not master of his actions, because he is only active in evil, but suffering in good. And no thesis has anything to do with merit in equity. In the end, however, we have disputed a little how it is with a man who does as much as is in him. The bold little man, however, has not shied away from judging Mr. Erasmus in the edition of the New Testament, and therefore also presumes to judge here, and says: Carlstadt's opinion has remained firm and un rebutted. This much I know that Carlstadt finally conceded: the will has an efficacy for good works. But I pass no judgment, for I am a party and not a judge. And yet the bold little man may say: I have stated improper things from Bernhardus. If the

When the disputation comes out, it will be seen whether the language teacher was telling the truth.

4. 3) Since I had said that the good work is entirely from God, but not in a total way (totaliter), the teacher of the language laughs at this, as if at a little fiddle, which is not at all appropriate for the theological majesty, since I have explained myself clearly in the disputation. He does not know that the essence of God is seen completely by the blessed, but not in a complete, full way, because the blessed cannot grasp it completely. The essence of the main species (quidditas generis) is completely in one subspecies (specis), but not in a complete way, because it is also in another. Thus the soul is also wholly in the hand, but not so that it is not also in the foot. Thus the good work is wholly of God, but not so that it is not also of free will, because they work at the same time, not alternately; together, not separately. Bernhardus says this explicitly in a way that rhymes very well with the matter.

5. 4) He reproaches me that I have spoken many rude things against Luther, and in short, that I have done everything to make Luther hated by the people. All honest listeners know that this is wrong. And my reason against Luther, from the head of the church, he attracts mutilated.

6. 5) He charges me that passages from Jerome and Cyprian have been attracted by me as genuine, which are nevertheless doubted. Look at me the blamer! Jerome I have cited lib. I. contra Jovinianum, col. 18, Cyprianus epistola ad Pupianum, lib. 4. epistolarum. Let the diligent reader read them and judge whether I have brought forward a doubtful passage from Peter's supreme majesty. With other passages of the same voice, yes, by Luther's writing, I have proved that Cyprianus believes in this passage that the church is founded on Peter. But this belongs for the judges.

7. 6) He speaks even maliciously: I would have raised St. Bernard's testimony to Eugene, whose reputation he secretly belittles. I think more of the one and only St. Bernard than of Philip and all his followers. If St. Bernard has said something in this book in favor of Luther's opinion, he may ascribe to himself why he has not attracted it. It is certain that Bernhardus is against Luther's opinion in everything.

8. 7) From the passage of Matthew: "You are Peter, and on this rock" 2c., he quite rightly argues that D. Luther's opinion was presented with many probable reasons. But the he conceals that I have drawn from Augustine, Jerome, Ambrose, Leo and others that this rock is Peter. But this belongs to the judges. But it is strange that he attributes something false not only to me, but also to Luther: for he would have answered that Christ, when he said to Peter, "Feed my lambs," afterwards gave the same authority to the apostles, when he said, "Receive the Holy Spirit," 2c., for Luther, according to his great learning, would not have committed such a shameful error. But so it goes when the cobbler does not stick to his last, and [judges about other things. Here I must compensate D. Luther that he did not make such a mistake.

9. 8) He rebukes: that I have attributed to D. Luther the heresies of the Bohemian mob and other such crimes. But he conceals that I had to do this for the Christian faith, since he [Luther] claimed that some articles of the heretic John Hus, which were condemned at the Costnitz Concilium, were quite Christian and evangelical. How wisely this was done by him, as Philip says, the judges may recognize.

10. 9) He implies to me: I would have said that the apostles were equal in the apostleship, but not equal bishops. But this is the language teacher's dream, and not a statement of Eck. I have said: they would have been equal in the apostleship, priesthood and bishopric, but not in the power (commissione) and administration of the regiment. This is what St. Leo, Jerome and Cyprian wanted. Therefore I despise the language teacher's miserable conclusion.

11. 10) He says: I believe that Christ chose them to be apostles, but Peter ordained them to be bishops. This he has presented a little more foolishly (crudius) than I have expressed it. My opinion has been this: I do not remember to have read where the apostles were ordained bishops, the common opinion is that they were ordained priests at the last supper; therefore I could attribute the ordination of the apostles as bishops to Peter, as the supreme ruler of the church (Hierarcham), because many things happened that are not written.

12. 11) From the general bishop he brings my refutation mutilated, because the words of the decree are those of St. Gregory, who opposed the emperor for the sake of this matter, as Platina writes. Let the judges judge this.

13. 12) The teacher of the language again reproaches me for not having met the purpose of the question about purgatory, namely, about the Pope's power over purgatory, but for having started another little song. Here, I say, the little man of speech makes excellent antics, because the purpose of the question was the sixth thesis, namely, that the souls in Purgatory would not be enough for the punishments of sins. That was my point at the time. In the twelfth thesis, however, is the question that the teacher of the language thinks of. But I confess, since I had this thesis in mind, D. Luther said: it is not proven from the Scriptures that there is a purgatory, although he knew that there is a purgatory. I then took the trouble to prove purgatory from the Scriptures.

14. 13) He says mockingly: the speech is suitable for a theologian, namely that the book of the Maccabees is as valid as the gospel. But also here the teacher of the language attributes something wrong to me. For I have stated that the books of the Maccabees were suitable for controversy, because St. Augustine in the 18th chapter of his book de civitate Dei says that the Gospel is as valid as the books of the Maccabees. Buche de civitate Dei, and Jerome in the Preface [to the Bibles and in the Decrees say that this book was not in the Canon with the Hebrews, but the Church included it in the Canon; just as we do not know now, since several Evangelia have been written, which are of undoubted credibility, except by the approval of the Church, which approves four Evangelia and rejects the others. So also the book of the Maccabees must be the undoubted truth for a Christian, because of the approval of the church. Augustine's words are well known: I did not believe the Gospel 2c.

15. 14) The teacher of the language considers it most wrong that I said that Matth. 5 can be understood as purgatory under dungeon, and wishes that the rabble would be better taught than by such kind of interpretations. But tell me once, you teacher of the dusty school, whether you consider it wrong to explain the Scriptures as St. Ambrose did, who explains a similar passage in Lucas in the same way. Do you thus mock St. Ambrose, and wish Christians a better interpreter than he? If you kept yourself within your limits and in your profession, you would still mean something, but now you disgrace yourself completely.

16. 15) But if he blasphemes, "I have not met the purpose of repentance. Behold the sincere and uninvited judge! He himself has not met anything that we have discussed about repentance. We have been discussing whether the atonement is of the Love of God or fear; according to the third thesis. But when we came to the fourth and fifth theses, we dealt with the remission of punishment according to the remission of guilt. But whether I have rightly asserted what is ours, or D. Martinus has better defended what is his, that will be judged by the highly learned judges of the University in Paris, without regard to what the language teacher thinks.

17. 16) He writes: that the indulgence has been a loud game and amusement for me. This is also wrong. For I have shown quite seriously that indulgences 1) are useful, which Luther also admitted. I have also shown that it is not a defect of the good work. Finally, I have tried to prove that through indulgences there is a remission of the punishment due for sin, where Luther vehemently contradicted me and said: Indulgence would be a remission of good works. But in this I refer to the writings of the notaries of the university. However, we both agreed that the abuses of those who proclaim indulgences should be censured.

18 I wanted to make this known to you, dearest reader, both for my own sake and for the sake of the common cause of Christianity, so that if you were not at the disputation (as Philip warns very strongly that one should not believe the common rumor or those who like to spread rumors), you should not believe him either, who has attributed things to me without hesitation that I have not even thought of. And although Philip is not the kind of man that a theologian would want to get into a theological fight with him, I have, that I do not want to concede by silence what he interprets to me, hereby want to oppose him badly, because Augustine also had no hesitation to write against the language teacher Cresconius.

19 But you, dear reader, believe those who were present at the disputation and are not influenced by passion or even by friendship and favor, like Philip. Our justification, however, you may interpret for the best. God is my witness that in this matter I seek the truth of the Christian faith and the glory of God. Farewell and greetings. Leipzig, July 25, in the year of grace 1519.

1) Löscher offers posnitontlas instead of inäulZelLias here.

407 Philipp Melanchthon's defense against Johann Eck, professor of theology. Perhaps still in July 1519.

This writing came out, as Löscher says, "presumably before the month of Julius was completely over, at Wittenberg" under the title: Dokonsio kdilippi Akelantlionis contra ^otiannoin lHrinin, Dtioolo^iao ?rok688or6N2. Walch says it was first published in Leipzig in 4. It is included in the Latin Wittenberg edition (1550), torn. I, toi. 339d; in the Jena one (1579), torn. I, toi. 345, and in Löscher's Ref.Acta, vol. III, p. 596. Only Löscher gave the name Oecolampadius; in the old editions it is iV instead. It seems that Löscher had an original edition at his disposal.

Translated from Latin.

Philip Melanchthon sends his greetings to the gentle reader!

1. Recently, a letter from me to Oecolampadius came into the public domain, in which I outlined, more than described, a few pieces of the Leipzig disputation to the righteous and honest man, my hearty good friend; For at that time, I did not have more time to spare for other necessary tasks, and most of the things in this battle were of such a nature that one could not well go on about them without hating them; and some things did not seem to me to be worth so much that I wanted to bother a friend with them, who has far better things to worry about. And in this I have been especially careful not to offend anyone, since in my whole life I desire and seek nothing more than that pious, righteous people may be favorable to me. And just as it is not Christian to repay one who has done evil in kind, so I consider it something quite inhuman to offend one who has done us no harm; in that respect, I hope no one will lay some blame, nay, not even the suspicion of such blame, on me. So also the well-known virtue and erudition of those who have disputed has been able to remind me of my duty and to move me not to rudely puncture anyone; for I am not so silly that I do not see how badly I might fare for it. In short, Oecolampadius is held too high by me to want to abuse his name to blaspheme anyone. Therefore, I have written everything that is written in that letter of mine, so help me God, in simplicity and with historical fidelity, and thought nothing less than that anyone who should read it would ever be annoyed by it.

2 Eck alone is evil to speak of, who has not been attacked at all, so much so that D. Carlstadt and D. Martin Luther would rather be angry with me if they wanted to interpret what is ours in an evil way. Martin Luther would have to be angry with me if they wanted to interpret ours badly, who are just as concerned as Eck with what I said about the whole way of disputing, indeed, about most of the things that were included in the disputation as something untheological. And I do not hope that Eck has such an impudent brow as to deny that many things occurred at this disputation which were more suitable for the [crude] lapiths in Lucian than for theologians. I confess that I have told a little more about Eck [in the letter], namely that he played the first role in all things in this whole game, since he argued as one, with a more than Herculean courage against two. And that is why I have also noted in more detail that which was either quite clever and subtle, or has something about it that seemed to me, I don't know how, to deviate too far from the theological majesty.

3 For what should I remark on mean things? I prefer to remember some important things that have been written down to some extent under the dispute. I did not want to blame Eck at all, but rather I liked some of his subtleties. Some of them I may have carried through a little freely; but I was driven to this more by a holy concern and zeal for the holy Scriptures, to which I owe such a debt, than by any hostility; for Eck has sometimes interpreted them somewhat more boldly than equity requires. For there is nothing wrong with his citing great authorities whose opinion can be followed with certainty. For we shall also show hereafter how honestly he has often used them; and one need not immediately consider everything good that Ambrose or Jerome have said in some way. I am of such a mind against the holy Scriptures that I consider nothing more shameful than to pull and tear them apart in the manner of human fables, yes, like Penelope's ball of twine, soon unwinding it, soon unwinding it again, according to each one's will; but that I do not even think how ungodly it is to twist the Scriptures according to human will or inclination, and to defile the holy of holies with unclean hands, yes, sacrifices to idols. Eck himself knows what we have to thank in the respect of the miserable question theology (quaestionum theologiae), which concedes so much to human appetites, although he wants to be its protector and defender. This, then, dear reader, has been the whole intention and design of my letter. And if I should have said something in it by mistake or by chance

I hope that it can be forgiven, but it certainly cannot be interpreted in a bad way; For I am fully aware that I have written nothing out of malice or hatred, and regret very much that I am drawn into this game, and must be a spectacle on the battlefield, to speak with Paul, on which, however well I do it, the reputation of the adversary presses me down, and even if everything runs smoothly, nevertheless one blasphemy always grows out of another, and, according to the well-known Greek proverb, one quarrel always stirs up another. That is why I initially wanted to let Eck's blasphemies pass with a deaf ear, that is, as a blunt arrow, especially since they are of such a nature that, if one holds them against my letter, one immediately sees what could be answered to them, and also the public book of the whole trade gives us sufficient protection. However, since some good friends have advised otherwise, I will clear myself only with a few things from the accusation of falsification, which no godly person should pass over with silence, as they think. In the meantime, I will behave so moderately in the matter that it cannot be said that I have been too rude and immodest to Eck. For Christ is certainly more to me than such an unworthy accusation.

4. 1) I am said to have acted quite unreasonably, according to Eck's pretence, in making known some parts of the disputation, because the parties had agreed that the disputation should not end until the judges had spoken in the main matter.

First, you see that it is none of my business what the parties decided, for I have never had anything to do with Eck, and have sat as an idle spectator of the Leipzig battle among other common people. Secondly, it has been denied that the disputation is not printed; however, I have only written out a few sayings from it and let them go out, so that one might see more about what was disputed than so that one might recognize who was right or what judgment should be made about the matter. Dear, am I then judging from victory when I say that Eck and Carlstadt did not deal with human justice, or with merit according to equity (congrui), but with whether the will merely receives the good work? I merely report what is argued about without saying who won.

(6) But if he says, I take the office of a judge for myself, my letter, in which this is written, acquits me sufficiently. For he who has

It is not so easy for me to judge whether I have achieved victory.

7. 2) That Eck did not want that the scribes should be denied to write it down, of this are distinguished and honest men witnesses, who partly insisted on it before the commissions, partly saw that those who were on the spot were rather biased. And even if I admit that such a thing had not been sought before the commissions, it is obvious that he had no desire to have it written down. And why did they not want to admit that the whole world would judge about it, but I do not know what to assign to individual persons, if he did not want to have acted in the dark with the cause of faith, as he calls it?

8. 3) Carlstadt intended to assert his eleventh thesis: that free will, before grace, is good for nothing but sinning. Eck disputed this. One can see that it deals with human powers, and thus with human justice, or merit according to equity. And I do not dispute now whether a special help comes to it or not; for the teachers of the questions [the scholastics have different opinions about this, too. At least the schools unanimously do not allow that such special help is the grace of Christ. And this was what the audience eagerly expected. Since he refers the reader to his thesis, no one would be so stupid as to think that Carlstadt took it upon himself to defend Eck's thesis. From such an intention, the matter has gradually been drawn to whether the will only receives? since among Carlstadt's theses there is one that asserts, as it were, in passing, that the good work is entirely from God, which Eck also admits, if only the work is not entirely or solely from God. I am assured, however, that Carlstadt never had in mind to play the matter into such narrowness (symplegadas). I believe that this is why he came to say, and rightly so, that the whole good work is from God, because the nefarious school of Eck does not distinguish the works of grace and nature in any other way than only in respect of reason, respectu rationis entirely of one kind or type, which nature either works without grace, or the will and grace with each other. Now here the barbarian Heraclitus, Scotus, should have been either defended or excused, of whom you remember what Christian things he teaches in his patched-together witness (rhapsodiis) of this.

(9) What he has added about the Lord Erasmus, the prince of godly arts, you see, dear reader, is only to make me hated by the dear man and by all righteous people. Eck may have a good year, and pass through us, and rejoice over the little ones; Christ will give us strength and courage for such blasphemies. I can see for myself how much all students have to thank Erasmus, as well as I in particular, to whom he has done so many good deeds in general and in particular. After I have begun to recognize them, but I have begun to do so by Christ's grace and assistance, I also know how grateful my heart has been to him. 1) The other I have to attribute to the school, as the forge of an evil mind.

10. 4) The subtle answer of the whole and in a complete way did not please me badly. For it is fine, and all the more pleasant, because it is new, and suits Eck's profession, in which today is the judgment of words and things. That he now teaches us what difference there is between such things, such an effort of a friend is quite pleasant to me; although we, too, have already learned Porphyrius, and now hate to see that one wants to direct us again to such cricket-like antics (nugalia theoremata). But what was it necessary to assert the power of free will with such new and completely fictitious interpretations (glossematis), since even among the highest school teachers, namely the occamists, this doctrine is completely in vogue, that some activities of the will are merely received.

11. 5) Luther honors and claims a general pope's authority. But he has only argued from divine right, which Eck proves from him from the saying of Matthew: "You are Peter, and on this rock" 2c., and thinks that because the holy fathers have declared this passage of Peter's supreme sovereignty, with the universities and authiliarities, the authority of the general pope would be amply proven from this. But with what modesty and honesty Luther refuted such a thing, the matter itself will give once. Only see what Eck, when he so strongly praises the reputation of the holy fathers and places all hope of his victory on it, is doing with it. First, I do not want to take anything away from anyone's reputation; I admire so many lights of the church, so famous advocates of Christian doctrine. Secondly, I believe that it is not in vain that the holy fathers are of different opinion, as it is wont to be, that they are accepted according to the judgment of Scripture, but not that Scripture suffers violence according to their discordant judgment. For there is a certain and simple understanding of the Scriptures, as well as a certain heavenly truth, which must be taken by comparison, with the Scriptures, from the speech which hangs together. For this is why we are commanded to search the Scriptures, that we may test men's opinions and decrees by them, as by a touchstone. Furthermore, if the holy fathers are to be used at all to judge passages of Scripture, it is best to take the opinion of Scripture from such passages where they intend to explain it, but not from such passages where they act as orators or are in some way taken in by their emotions. As we ourselves often experience, that we understand the Scriptures in various ways, depending on how we are led by such emotions, since we like sometimes this, sometimes that mind, because each one leans to where his desire or craving leads him. And just as a polyp takes on the color of every rock to which it clings, so we try to bring out, to the best of our ability, what we feel like and desire. How often does it happen that our mind acquires the real and louder meaning of a saying, and for some time delights in it in an incomparable way, which it afterwards, when it has fallen away, 2) absolutely cannot find again? Thus the holy fathers, too, have often misused the Scriptures out of this or that inclination, not to an evil, but nevertheless quite clumsy understanding, which I do not condemn, but nevertheless assume in such a way that I think it can be of little value in the dispute. For they run (according to the common Greek proverb) well enough, but out of the way (χαίως τρέχουσιν, αλλά έχτός οδοῦ). Yes, I may also say this, that the holy fathers have sometimes explained the Scriptures according to such an understanding, which some lively emotion or movement has given them, which may well be good and not unseemly, but which we poor people nevertheless do not see as agreeing at all with the letter, because our weak mental power leads us elsewhere. For it is a secret food of the mind, and a manna, which I believe Paul calls the spiritual mind, which can be perceived rather than described in words. But who does not see.

1) The following sentence is only with extinguisher.

2) Instead of pueril - elapsnm we have assumed elapknrm, referred from viw kententiae.-

That the ancients misused the Scriptures most freely? Much has been done according to the times, much according to the disputes of the heretics; one could cite innumerable examples of this kind. Sometimes it also happens, especially in the moderns, that the interpretation itself disputes with its origin.

I do not want to say much about the school teachers, to whom the Scriptures are often something quite different from something simple; indeed, they make, so to speak, a proteus out of the fact that it must give them sometimes an allegorical, 1) sometimes a tropological, sometimes an anagogical, sometimes a literal, sometimes a grammatical, sometimes a historical sense.

(13) I come again to the ancients, of whom I have hitherto said that they misuse the Scriptures; but now I say that they also often err. Dear, how often Jerome, how often Augustine, how often Ambrose stumbled! For they are not so unknown to me that I should not dare to say this freely; indeed, they are perhaps somewhat better known to me than Aristotle is to Eck. How often they disagree among themselves! How often do they recant their errors! In short, the one Scripture of the divine Spirit is pure and true throughout, which is called canonical. What great sin is it, then, if Luther occasionally departs from some doubtful interpretations of the ancients? And why should he not do so? In the interpretation of the passage Matth. 16: "You are Peter, and on this rock" 2c., Luther follows Origen, who is as good as many others, and that in a place where Origen is just above interpreting; Augustine in the homily, namely in the explanation of the Gospel; Ambrose in the 6th book about Lucas, the others I pass over. Let it be that Eck also confirms his opinion with some testimonies of the Fathers, namely Jerome and Cyprian, on which he particularly defies; for Bernard and Leo will not have much to say about this; so one can see that the other opinion of the Fathers also has testimonies on its side. What is it then? Do they argue with themselves? What is the miracle? It follows so much that it is not proved from the holy fathers that the place of Matthew belongs to a general bishop. For I believe the fathers, because I believe the Scriptures, to which I do not give force by their various opinions. Therefore, Luther has a firm and certain understanding from the right context of Scripture and the order of the matter.

1) Compare Table Talks, Cap. 52, § 5, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XXII, 1341.

The best commentators, who explain this whole passage, are of great help to him. Now you see on whose side the strongest group of the Fathers stands. On Luther's side are those who explain the whole passage; on Eck's side are those who misuse the passage of Matthew in a completely different, alien matter, so that, if one wants to see it quite obviously, they often doubt and deny their own things again. Jerome improves his opinion and thus moderates it: But thou sayest, The church is founded on Peter, though the same is done in another place to all the apostles, and they all receive the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and on them all the firmness of the church is built in like manner. Nevertheless, one among twelve is chosen, so that the cause of division may be removed. So you see how Jerome's opinion is softened and moderated here. Eck may thus tell us: How the church 2) strength is built on all alike, and yet one is chosen only for the sake of division. And how many other passages from the same can be set against this one of Jerome. Cyprian's passage to Pupianus clearly belongs here: there must be One whom the people obey, not the people of the whole world, but in all districts. Whoever wants to read the letter correctly will, if I am not mistaken, not judge differently.

14. 6) It is not written in our letter: After Christ said to Peter: "Feed my sheep" 2c., then the apostles were given the same authority 2c., but so: After the same authority had been given, that is, after the same authority had been given in the words, "Take ye" 2c., thereupon it was said to Peter, "Feed my sheep" 2c. Now if Eck had consulted even the language teachers, as he calls them, he would not have forged our letter. You see, my Eck, that I stick to my last. And there will be no danger that you will make us hated by our Luther here, since you can judge our affairs so well yourselves.

15. 7) That the books of the Maccabees are as valid as the Gospel, he has obviously said, and he cannot deny it, although I do not know why he pretends, and it is not hidden to anyone how rightly this is spoken, who has only looked at Jerome, who says thus: "As the church, then, has 3) Judith, Toby, and the other, and has not yet been able to understand it.

2) Only Löscher has here correctly: ecclesiae; Wittenberger and Jenaer: ecclesias.

3) Only the Jenaer reads here correctly: qnidero, the other editions: qniäarn.

and the Maccabees reads books, but does not count them among the canonical Scriptures, it also reads the two books, namely Wisdom and Jesus Sirach, for the edification of the people, but not to reinforce the teachings of the church with them. So there is a difference between the books of the church, which accepts some books differently; that therefore it does not follow: This is among the books of ours, therefore it is also a writing of the Holy Spirit.

16. 8) That we blame Ambrosius immeasurably is the fault of Eck, and it would be worthwhile here that I treat him somewhat harshly, for I have spoken of Matthew's passage, but he explains that of Lucas. Now it is certainly another adversary in Lucas from whom we should disengage ourselves; another in Matthew with whom we should seek to compare ourselves, against whom I have spoken somewhat more harshly, because of those who consider it something soon to be reconciled, and, as they call it, permissible, not to show a compliant mind to the enemy; in short, against those who have brewed the commandments and evangelical counsels for us into one another in such a way that an honest heathen often stands far higher than a Christian. Although the passage in Matthew also seems to me to hold something more in itself, because in the Greek it says: ἀντίδικος [adversary, enemy]. After that, Ambrose explains the dungeon in Matthew by extreme darkness, which is undoubtedly a description of hell. Finally, he wants, which seems to be in favor of the corner, that by the image of the penny the payment of the debt is understood, and, as the text says: "until you pay the last penny", does not say that once the last penny is paid off: so also Ambrose, who says that by the image of the penny the payment of the debt is meant, does not add that such payment is made to the dead, yes, rather he obviously contradicts this, if one wants to draw it to the payment of the punishment to the dead. I will be able to deal with the passage sooner, when I will explain what is necessary according to the frequent figure of speech of the Hebrew and Greek language in the word "until". So you see that I do not dislike Ambrosius, although I do not consider it a sin to disagree with him when he lets go of his right mind. Furthermore, he also has all sorts of thoughts in the same chapter in Lucas about the heller, since in Greek only xxxxxx xxxxxx stands, which is a part of the Heller's amounts. Yes, what he says about the devil does not please Jerome himself. That he now says: I will become completely dark here has good reasons. For I am quite happy to be hidden under the shadow of Eck's name.

17. 9) We have only answered a few things above. There is still more in Eck's booklet, which will probably not be necessary to refute, because the list of notaries will show it sufficiently. For I would have preferred to pass this over in silence, too, if it could have been done. Of course, I have not given him an unfriendly word. Therefore, I ask him not to argue with invective, but with the matter. For we owe this to love, which I, as surely as I want to have a gracious God, wish to have unharmed and unoffended from the bottom of my heart.

18 But that he considers us too clumsy to deal with the high questions of the theologians, I put up with. If only he would allow the common Christian people to talk about some godly questions from time to time, and we, who are not completely unfamiliar with theological studies, may occasionally refresh our minds with such holy morsels. How much better it would be to encourage the little ones, among whom we are also, with benevolence and favor to the holy science; yes, if they also fail a little out of ignorance, to overlook such things for them, than to scare them off with such pompous speeches! Fare well, dear reader, and take this defense to the best. For Eck himself will be witness that I could have carried out this matter more hostilely in some places, where I would have wanted to follow my desire and courage. Farewell again! From the famous Saxon city of Wittenberg, Anno 1519.

468: Oecolampadius, to whom Philipp Melanchthon had addressed the above-mentioned letter, soon after published a paper under the title: Canonicorum indoctorum Lutheranorum ad Jo. Eccium responsio, or Answer of those whom Doctor Eck called the unlearned Lutheran canons in semem Sendbrief to the Bishop of Meissen. December 1519.

This writing appeared, as Löscher and Wiedemann, "D. Johann Eck," p. 140, indicate, in December 1519. It is printed in the Latin Wittenberg edition (1550), toin. I, toi. 368k; in the Jena (1579), tom. I, toi. 361k; in Adam Petri's Knoukrationum pars nna, roonko Inio 1520, p. 359; in the Erlanger, opp. var. ar^a, tom. I.V, p. 59 and in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. III, 935. about October Eck had the liosponsio pro II. linsor, contra maiosanam Kntkori vonationom, ad lok. do skioMitL, licci. Dislu. lipisconm (St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 910) print.

In it, he used the name "Lutheran", which was first used by the Minorites in Jüterbock, and he also pretended that no one of the clergy agreed with Luther, except some unlearned Canonici in the lower monasteries, whom he had enchanted. Already in 1520 this writing was translated into German. Cf. St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, 929, note, likewise the introduction there, p. 29.

Contents of the following missive.

The unlearned canons answer Eck how far and for what reasons they are Lutherans, because in his letter to the bishop of Meissen he called them unlearned Lutheran canons and propagators of his errors.

Answer of the unlearned Lutheran canons to Johann Eck.

The unlearned canons send their greetings to the most glorious, most learned observer, Magister noster, Master Johann Eck, theologian.

If you had not reproached Luther with anything else about the ignorance that you impose on us, excellent Eck, to whom we are more favorable than to the truth, according to your wisdom, truly, we would have been deterred by your wondrous and proud master's degree and would have been content with our quiet rest, which luck those have before others who are uneducated. For just as God gives you a miserable, laborious life (yes, you inflict all this evil on yourselves through the intemperate desire for science and through arrogance), so he does not begrudge us the quiet and peaceful life. Therefore, because almost always at no time has our pen been hostile to one of those who keep quiet and withdrawn under its roof; therefore it would not be put on standby against you either. For would that not be a great folly? Would it not be nonsense that we unlearned, as you call us, should contend with you, the son of Apollo, the timid with the most sacrificed, and the unknown with the most famous?

2. we are not so careless, not so hasty, not so unintelligent, not so stony-minded that we would freely put ourselves in danger, which we should defend ourselves against with all diligence, especially since we have known for a long time that at no time, whether you speak or write, perhaps even when you are dead, do you lack words.

(3) Therefore, until now, as you have sought praise and glory with great diligence, we have cultivated tranquility, not so unwisely as despondingly. But now, because your famous modesty, which has also become a proverb, calls Martin Luther, who is dear to us because of his holy life and is the most diligent and free representative of Christian theology, secretly and publicly a Manichaeen, a Viking, a Hussite, and with innumerable other names, and cannot stand that he is considered a Christian; and because you, so that your honor may also increase from us, in your epistle to the reverend bishop of the church at Meissen, according to your great deaf and so very theological simplicity, denigrate us against this most gracious prince, and make us, as much as is in you, suspicious of the whole world, and call us Lutherans and propagators of his errors, that is, as you think, the very worst chief heretic's helper, protector, friends and patrons: therefore, willingly or unwillingly, we are urged to give you, as a patron and champion of the Christian church, and a cleanser and purifier of the children of Levi [Mal. 3, 3.] to give some account of our life, whether we would like to cleanse ourselves from this stain. For, as you yourself teach, the accusation of heresy is far too malicious to be patiently endured by Christian modesty.

4 But we could (for this can also the unlearned, who sometimes also with their thorns wildly behaved), according to the example of your severity,* also leave the modesty and be completely nonsensical, if your kind and nature were not completely known to us. You again seek people on whom you may rub off your scabies, you again seek people whom you may scandalize (αἰχίζης == maltreat with blows), so that you ever leave no one unnoticed, so that you ever spare no one, so that you ever provoke everyone to displeasure, so that you, like Ishmael, as one, may fight everyone. You let yourself think that it is too little that you war with the learned, if you do not also challenge the unlearned. And just as if the war with the teachers or masters had been accomplished, you rage against both the students and the patrons, so that nothing remains that is not destroyed by the force of your arm. Afterwards, when you have either subdued us or not, let the printers take care, let the presses take care, let everything that is near take care, so that it does not fight with you in an unequal battle, because you are still senseless through the fresh defeat.

(5) But we consider it worth much more trouble to save our innocence and honor than to respond to your reproach.

Words. Therefore, first of all, so that we do not quarrel with each other in a feminine way, because you cannot deny that so many specimens convict you, including your own, which you have incorporated into your epistle: tell us, however, in what way such insults, yes, invectives, may be either concealed or even softened, so that finally and irrevocably all displeasure may be lifted. Truly, we have no way to excuse you, but very many causes take our side. For what you call a Lutheran, namely a man tainted with poisonous and heretical delusion, you have sufficiently and to excess instilled into the ears of the whole world, albeit in vain, for a long time now. And even if you had kept silent most diligently: is it not true that among right Christians names of parties are hated in themselves, even the names that are otherwise praiseworthy because of the holy fathers' memory?

6 Nevertheless, you consider this to be nothing, and you also call us propagators of errors, which you shout out as exceedingly pernicious much more forcefully than you prove. Moreover, so that it would ever be known that you were not repentant of what you said, you wrote in the margin, instead of an asterisk: "the unlearned Lutheran canons," 1) and perhaps you feared that an industrious reader might walk by and not notice the word. Therefore, you thought it necessary to remind him to stand still, to consider such a word diligently, to imprint it faithfully in his memory, to look forward, to thank and applaud you, and to be angry with us.

(7) Here, my good man, you see that everything here serves noticeably more to move people's minds against us than to make them inclined toward us, and that so much that you fully deserve to receive retribution for it. But that is inappropriate for our purpose. Therefore you should read, if otherwise your glory (magnificentia) has no weight, what has made us inclined to the man of God, and how far we are Lutherans. You must not have the suspicion that it comes from selfish friendship, we have not dealt with each other so much. Here is no hope of gain. He is a mendicant monk, he lives on alms. But we were seized by the desire for the renewal of things, 2) not by the one that is a disturber of peace and unity, but a reconciler. For nothing is more perverse and corrupt than the customs of this iron age, which he endeavors to heal by his art, proclaiming peace, preaching obedience, praising humility, and doing nothing more unpleasant than to be driven, with you and your like, to lose the good hours with quarreling.

He continues to show the contempt of worldly things, the honor of heavenly things, and the goal of the Christian life. He rejects ambition, abhors the avarice of the clergy, and scolds simony and the deceit of Roman robbery, and other corruptions. Who would not wish and desire, if he were even nonsensical or completely forbidden, that such great destruction would be done away with? What Christian man would not want the kingdom of the Lord Christ, which transforms, renews and improves all things? Who is there who abhors the mockery of our inexperience, and does not wish that the unfruitful, unholy, corrupt teachings be done away with, and the more fruitful, blessed, and holy studies of science be restored? And would God have us see that just as the good arts flourish again, so also good morals arise again, which is Luther's endeavor. But you persecute the teacher of respectability and, as far as science is concerned, you patch up new bundles to spoil the splendid facilities of young people, just as if we had not been overwhelmed with useless things before.

(9) Moreover, this desire to renew things is done with too little danger to be excused with many words. But if one ever wants to condemn this in us, then we will perhaps not be unlearned because of it. In addition, there is the main reason: Luther is a godly sorcerer who makes us and our peers, the unlearned, dependent on him through love potions. Otherwise no reason can grasp that such coarse-headed people, other than enchanted, should have an inclination to the sciences. It must be a wondrous potion that he who prepares it makes drunk those who are as far away from him as another world. But we earth children want to speak more clearly, and must [as they say] call a punt a punt, and a saw a saw. The tender truth and unaltered virtue, which can also move God and men to love one another, these are the very things that make us dependent on Luther.

1) In the margin of Eck's writing is written: Oanoniei Inckoeti ImcZerani. See Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XVIII, 929.

2) Löscher correct: eepit; Wittenberger and Jenaer: "O6pit.

But now we let ourselves think, as if we saw how Eck's modesty opposes it, how he throws his hands, eyes and head around, how he testifies with hands and feet that nothing has ever been spoken that is more unlike the truth. But one must leave the man his way, which no one but death will take away from him. We want to show our intentions with more certain proofs than with mere assertions. For a long time, many of us did not know whether Luther was black or white; indeed, Luther's name was completely unknown to us. But a few years ago, some of his little sermons for the people, which we thought were written suddenly and in a hurry, came into our hands, in which he interprets the Ten Commandments of Moses and takes the veil from his eyes.

(11) Therefore, both by his scholarship and by his clear clarity, he has brought about that we unlearned, above the custom of schoolteachers, should think more highly of the Lord Christ and more holily of the gospel, and with the abandonment of hope should ascribe little, even nothing, to ourselves, but rather ascribe much, even all things, to God, the Lord Christ.

So he first gained favor with us. Afterwards, when the rumor came and showed us the man's blameless life, it confirmed the opinion we had of him. My good Eck, what should we do? should we be grudging? should we despise him? should we be ungrateful? How were you going to deal with such students?

(13) However, some preachers, who were not well aware of their office, have in many places attached more than is right to the papal graces called indulgences, and have deceived many people, who put their trust in such comforts that they would attain salvation even by rejecting the cross of true repentance. What kind of fraud, what kind of deceitfulness, what kind of deception is practiced under the pretense of holiness by the mendacious sellers of lies, although we keep silent, is not hidden from anyone today. All theologians were silent, the bishops looked through their fingers, yes, they approved of it, no preacher preached against it. Therefore, as if from a God-fearing silence, the insolent injustice increased in prestige from day to day. And the evil had got so out of hand that now no longer in the jubilee or golden year, or even every fifty years, but every year, not once, but again and again, not out of honest and urgent, but quite minor, injustices were committed.

and fictitious causes, many indulgence seekers did not wander about without seducing souls.

At that time, as we know, when Luther had considered this unjust action, he first began to discuss these things in school in Wittenberg with good misgivings, after several theses had been presented. These were immediately spread with miraculous speed through the German lands, and were also accepted with special favor by all the most learned, whom you either do not know or despise, because many of them were well aware of the frauds, although none of them wanted to be the first to put themselves at risk, as is customary. Then you, Eck, raised your comb against it, as one of the foremost warriors, and wanted to confuse heaven, the earth, and all things, so that only the indulgence would remain in its dignities. We pass over many things. Since the disputation has come about, it is said that nothing colder has ever been done, and that the indulgence has even been laid down, so completely that if it should again come to life, one must either devise a new one, with which one again leads the old one out of hell, or else honor the deceased indulgence's image. Should it not be due to your modesty, excellent Magister noster, to say the highest thanks to Luther, who has made you, if not in other things, at least in this matter more learned.

(15) But therefore we do not concede to you that errors should have been sown through us; for if Luther's writings and doctrine (Lutherana) had not already been sown, how would they have reached us, who are of the unlearned common people, and almost live in another world? Is this not the business of the printers, who, as soon as they become aware of something new, which is according to the truth and pleasant, so that they may gain from it, wrest it from the people more than they seek it from them with request; yes, they steal it more than they wrest it. But who cares that your wars may not be hidden? Is it not true that you hardly ask the printers with some conditions? and you do not give them your things, but impose them? Hardly any of the things you have written are printed again, unless perhaps so that you are the more reviled. But you know that Luther's writings and doctrine are now often printed, even in various printing houses, and yet you think that we, the unlearned canonists, have tried to avoid so much trouble, while your

However, these things are despised by not 1) a few scholars and rejected by many unscholars. Do you think that the truth can be hidden under a bushel? Do you think that the thing that is from God can be eradicated?

But that is where the origin of this trouble comes from. You call it error; we have not yet been persuaded of it by sophistical sophistry. For we unlearned hold only to the books that are canonical and accepted by the approval of all; we pay no heed if something else is raised that is contrary to it. We regard as great that which comes closest to Scripture. We also do not want to hear an angel or an apostle, even if he came from heaven and spoke against the gospels. But the interpretation of the Gospel Scriptures, however unlearned we are, we would much rather learn from the old teachers, who were not so far from the times of the holy apostles, than from you and your like teachers. We also prefer to believe the chronicles and histories than human and certain tyrannical statutes.

Does Papias of Hierapolis, a disciple of St. John, seem to you to have unwisely and unlearnedly written his preface to the books of the interpretation of the sermon of the Lord, that he did not want to follow the delusion of many, but to have the apostles as his masters, as St. Jerome and Eusebius write of him? But he listened to the living apostles; we, forced by necessity, are content with the writings of the holy apostles and those who have the spirit of the apostles. Hereby it is evident enough whether you or Luther walk closest to the Gospels, which of you relies on the most trustworthy 2) sources, which of you is most faithful to the fathers' sayings and most learned, which of you strives for the most honest goal. We seek the springs of living water; will you lead us to the foul marshes and murky waters? We seek the Lord Christ; show us where the Lord Christ is born.

Either follow us, and we will show you the way, or go ahead of us, and we will follow you. But you, much more cunning than Herod was, would endure us if we followed you, and would call us sometimes Vilefites, sometimes Manichaeans, and, sitting under the idols of your sophistry, would not agree to be our companion. Where are you drawn to by your raging

Who could suffer your presumption, who could suffer your hopefulness? Those who read and love your books and doctrine should be learned, but those who read and love the fine books of your rival are unlearned and heretics, even though they are closer to the gospel and the church teachers.

(19) We shall read thy books, lest we be called unlearned; and our eyes shall be put out, lest we be accounted blind. You have recently found out what kind of Lutherans we are: as far as Luther is a friend of the gospel and of Christian freedom, we are part of him; if you will also be like that, there will be nothing to prevent us from being dependent on you as well. Therefore, your modesty should not have offended us with insults. For we are not to suffer slander because in pure faith we are not disparaging to the most Christian theologian. And Luther's cause is not worse because it is considered the most Christian even by the unlearned. We confess our ignorance, and perhaps acknowledge it with no less honor than you everywhere trumpet your own praise. We are unlearned, we do not know how to keep our backs to those who are excessively eager for shameful gain. And in this the pope also keeps it with us. For when you, like a hired servant of the merchants, humbly begged him in petitions that he would recognize the very unfair contract (contractum) of their company as fair and right, it was denied you; for your little feet were above the pope's understanding, while you were ready with your fine tongue and hand not only to force and twist the whole scripture at once, but also to corrupt it, lest you ever come back with dishonor.

(20) We are unlearned, for we do not see in what way the perfect can follow the poor Christ, when they may swear oaths concerning temporal things. But how? Of course Erasmus, who is a shining star in our time, must, according to your judgment, be mistaken in the same matter as we are. We are unlearned, because we cannot tell the manifold ceremonies of the first church, but again many of the most learned join us. We are unlearned because we do not penetrate the innermost secrets of the divine majesty. But the great apostle Paul is also not ashamed that he does not know what you collect in your book Chrysopassus.

3) In the Jena the words: nsmnli 8(üts, tainetsi,. because not understood, are omitted.

1) Wittenberger nos instead of von.

2) Wittenberg rsosxtoribns instead of rseextloridus.

We are unlearned, but nevertheless we could report many such pieces that would bring you more dishonor than us. For in sum, there is none of your journeys so blessed, of which you recount many childishly, I will not say gloriously, that have not brought you and your fatherland more dishonor than glory. No booklet, no matter how small, has gone out from you that would not either contain the grossest barbarism [in Latin] or would not be full of great errors. Therefore, most clever corner, you would not be acting unwise if you stayed at home for a while and received the praise, which you cannot obtain with talk, with silence. For how unhappy it is for you when you enter into dispute with learned people can be judged from the fact that even the unlearned are no longer afraid of you. You should also not venture to hope that you will gain victory over us; we, the unlearned, are many, and although we do not all know how to argue with sophistical projectiles, there are still quite a few scholars who can hurl strong spears, which you will not be able to defend yourself against, so that you will completely commit yourself to true theology and to Christ, the almighty God, setting aside the insults and worldly arts. Farewell. Anno 1519.

Luther's report to Spalatin about how Oecolampadius had written to Melanchthon that he had done the previous writing, and how Eck had complained that this writing had hurt him the most.

410 Georg Spalatin's Collectanea von Eck.

From Kapp's Nachlese nützlicher Reformation-Urkunden, Theil II, p. 428. This writing is a piece of the satyr: Doeins cksäolatns (the planed Eck), which appeared in its first edition either with Frobenius in Basel or in Strasbourg with Ansheim. A second edition, printed in German letters, appeared at Erfurt in quarto, 4 sheets, and has the date: Feb. 20, 1520. (Wiedemann, "v. Johann Eck," p. 141.) From this Werthlosen Posse, Wiedemann brings almost seven pages, pp. 141-148.

Translated from Latin by M. A. Tittel.

From Eck's modesty.

As the perfect master of the life of men, and the some Apollo of Christianity.

Eck, the right master of the art of blasphemy.

That he may not let the poisonous writings go out on the said Riz, our most powerful king's medicum, and either wipe out a wicked man's scab or atone for such disgrace.

The comedy of the smeared corner was held on February 21, 1520.

Eck, whom you always call Keck, and rightly so, Doctor of the Holy Scriptures and of Canon Law, although unworthy, offers his greetings to the learned and respectable men, the theological faculty doctors and magistris nostris in Leipzig.

If you, esteemed gentlemen (scientifici), are well, it is dear to me. But I have neither the time to write nor you to read about the distress and danger I am in. Only this I want to say, that I am almost as badly off as someone who is in the worst situation.

Since I have fallen into such distress for your sake, from which salvation or health itself could hardly save me, even if it wanted to, I beg and implore you most earnestly to send a proven medic to a friend who is in a foreign country and with whom things have come to a standstill, so that he may restore me to health, not only for myself but also for you, and especially for the Roman See, which now calls me, as it were, a champion of the Roman Church. If this happens, I will have to thank you not only for my health, that I still enjoy life, but also for the apostolic gifts I hope for, and for the cardinalate itself. Farewell, you brave comrades-in-arms and zealous Lutheran enemies, and do not postpone helping your friend.

D. How Eck sued Luthern in writing before the Elector Frederick of Saxony.

413 Eck's letter to the Elector Frederick of Saxony from the disputation in Leipzig, July 22, 1519.

This letter together with the reply of the Elector is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 68d; in the Jena edition (1564), vol. I, M.146(b); in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 273 (in the wrong place, namely before the disputation); in the Leipzig, vol. X VII, p. 250 and in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. III, p. 604. In all these editions with the wrong date "July 23" (in the Witt: "July 32"). Correct only in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 90; but there the proof of the Wittenberg and Jena editions is missing. We have followed the text of the Wittenberg, since that of the Erlangen correspondence seems to us to be very erroneous.

I. Most Sublime, Highborn Elector! To E. C. F. G. my subservient services, together with my poor prayer to God, are diligently prepared. Most gracious Lord, that I have engaged in disputation against E. C. F. G. Doctores at Wittenberg, I humbly request that you do not hold this against me, or accept it in disfavor; for I have not begun this to the detriment of E. C. F. G. University, as I am highly inclined to serve it, so that E. C. F. G. is famous before other princes in the realm, quod et literas et literatos foveat. But only for the benefit of the truth of the holy faith, D. Carlstadt has caused me terribly, and has also let Conclusiones go out in public with many contemptuous and disgraceful words against me; although he is not skilled to scold the people in such a way. But for the sake of D. Martinus, with whom I have a pity that his beautiful ingenium has come into such singularitates and has gone into such matters, I have been caused by his manifold writing out of many matters, thereby, according to my little understanding, causing much insanity and annoyance.

The author may accept that he denies and negates the opinion and interpretation of the holy fathers, Augustini, Ambrosii, Hieronymi, Gregorii, Leonis, Cypriani, Chrysostomi and Bernhardt. This is a bad thing among Christians, that one misses to know from his understanding the meaning of the holy scripture, because the holy fathers with each other.

2. is also difficult to hear that he says, even in the disputation, many articles Johann Hus and the Bohemians, condemned by the holy and laudable Concilium at Constance, are christinnissirni and evangelici. What joy the heretics received from it is good to signify. That he wants. St. Peter did not have primaturn over other apostles of Christ, with many other bits and pieces, E. C. F. G. as a Christian prince may well accept, whether such and such many other points in Christianity may be allowed. According to my little mind, I cannot see that.

Therefore I want to resist such things, if I can, for the sake of truth alone. For neither V. Martin, nor anyone else can say that I have ever received heller and heller worth from the most holy father, the pope, or from the great heads; but, although a poor pawn, at my expense, E. C. F. G. Doctoribus moved in, and am still required, where D. Martin thought that he had not yet disputed enough, I will move with him to Cologne, Leuven or Paris. For I was quite mistaken, if they reproached me with the University of Leipzig, they would also let me know there; which they have refused and rejected, even since I have set it up with the University for the High Reigning Prince. By all this, most gracious Lord, I do not want to disparage D. Martinum, nor do I write to his detriment, but only to apologize to E. C. F. G., where otherwise she would be presented with my displeasure, because the truth is in her; and so that I also give occasion to E. C. F. G. to consider what you owe to Christ, the Christian faith, country and people. For I would have liked to apologize to E. C. F. G. recently and promised, for this reason, to visit E. C. F. G. six times. C. F. G.'s court in Augsburg, but I do not know why I never came before E. C. F. G..

4 And although E. C. F. G. Doctores have left with some urges to write a lot, I have disputed that there would be no need to write. Our convention is also too quiet.

until the sentence is given by the ordained universities. Therefore I have left them a free choice of all universities that are in reputation in the whole of Christendom, of which they may justly make do. Well, they write, is not almost repugnant to me; I would like, however, that they would do this with a bravery, as the matter requires, not so frivolously, luxuriantly and with disgraceful words. As I then fully believe, E. C.F. G.deß bear no favor. What is written by a theologian should read in such a way that only a man who reads it may understand that a theologian has written such, in the opinion of seeking the truth, not a buffoon, 1) who alone presumes to revile the people. However, after I willingly accepted the two universities offered to me by Doctor Martina, he first wants to drag in the legists, physicians and artists; it is easy to assume that he wanted to settle his erroneous opinion with the crowd, not with those who understand the matter. Since he writes against Sylvester, he considers him, although an old, famous theologian, not skilled enough that he could understand or judge such theology, since he, Martinus, deals with it; and now he wants to judge the legists, physicians and artists learned enough about it.

5 Let not C. F. G. accept this long letter of mine in disgrace; for I alone do it for my excuse. If God, E. C. F. G. should fully recognize my mind in this case, there is no doubt that such a thing would be graciously acceptable to me. For I would not like to be noticed in such or such a frivolity, to give a carriage in print, 2) as E. C. F. G. D. Carlstadt has done, and quite mockingly spurned me with a printed name in it. I could also make a carriage, but I did not want to put a horse in it; but that is no art. I command myself most humbly to E. C. F. G. as my most gracious lord; and if some matter is brought before E. C. F. G. by me, I am most humbly requested that E. C. F. G. give me to understand this, then I will put it down and answer for it by writing or personally in all obedience to E. C. F. G.. However, if I do, speak or write something else out of ignorance or lack of understanding,

I will gladly let myself be guided away from this at all times and refrain from my presumption. For to serve E. C. F. G. would be a special, great, high joy for me. Date Leipzig, July 22, Anno 1519.

E. C. F. G.

subservient chaplain.

Also, most gracious Lord, it seems to me that since I have disputed against D. Martin de potestate Papae, I have intended all of his "foundations". For it is not a new song that he holds; many other people have also held it before. But from such mere suspicion he has drawn an opinion, as if some E. C. F. G. subjects should have answered and handled Doctor Martinu's booklet, newly printed; and namely they have let themselves be noted against He Caesar Pflug, as if D. Peter Burckhard; I say it is fiction, and one does injustice to D. Peter and others; for Doctor Peter has never said a word to me about it, so I have never seen it to this day, because as much as I think he reads from it to his liking; although I can calculate with one like it what is in it. It would be quite praiseworthy for E. C. F. G. if you would burn them in a heap. Order me E. C. F. G. Date ut supra.

Johann Eck, Doctor.

414: Prince Frederick of Saxony's short answer to D. Eck, July 24, 1519.

See the previous number.

Our greetings first, esteemed and worthy dear special. When you now wrote to us in matters concerning some doctors of our university in Wittenberg, and concerning the next disputation held in Leipzig, we read its contents. Since you have not written anything to us about this matter before, and the doctors of Wittenberg have not reported the disputation to us, we want this letter of yours to reach the same doctors and hear their answer and instruction. And if we find from this that something further needs to be sent to you, it shall also remain undisclosed to you. We do not want to save you from this, because we are inclined to be merciful to you. Date Altenburg, on Sunday after St. Mary Magdalene's Day [July 24], Anno Domini 1519.

Most Serene, Highborn Prince and Lord! To your F. G. may my prayers and submissive services be ready beforehand with all obedience. Most gracious Prince and Lord! The respectable D. Eck has let E. C. F. G. handle his handwriting and complaint, in which, among other things, he highly disparages me to E. C. F.-G., as if I should speak too clumsily to him, with his avoidance; and it is no different that I consider my pettiness, and my disgusting mind that I have no desire to dispute with such a boaster and screamer. Accordingly, I have indicated the cause, printed in many places above. But that his letter suggests that I should be inferior to him, please let E. C. F. G. know that he has not taken anything from me, but has at times publicly, at times covertly come to me, and has had to deliver my sentence in the disputation, although D. Eck teaches differently in his sermons than in the school. Most gracious C. F. and Lord, I have read him my Solutiones from the books which he has advanced to me and cited against me, and I hope honestly to my mind; also I have told D. I have also publicly told D. Ecken that he has not read and heard his books well, as I prove by reading them. This hurts him and some others, for which reason he despises and scorns me.

I also cannot deny E. C. F. G. that the much-mentioned D. Eck alleges heretical books and uses them against me in matters that highly concern the Christian faith, as he himself indicates in his letter of complaint, and finally, at the last, he brought forward an authority hieronymi, as this, quod justus non semper peccat, dum bene facit. Then I said I would see about it. 1) When he heard that, what a shout and rattling was heard from him! But I held firm and indicated that in such a brave matter should be acted with all deliberation, and no levity should be exercised. But D. Eck lost his books, where the authority was not written in the upset book. I searched for it further than I needed to, and did not find it, and therefore had much talk; and on the day of my departure, I sent my Magister Notarium 2) and two witnesses to him, and requested through them that he should show me his authority, or give me his books, for which I wanted to scold him a falsarium, which I could do in the right, if it was found that he willingly alleges falsely. But the good doctor shows me nothing yet. I did not want to salvage all this in a hurry, not to leave E. C. F. G. without an answer when I was ready to leave, and I am glad that E. C. F. G. came home healthy. May the merciful God grant E. C. F. G. a long life, with health and victory. Date Wittenberg, Sunday after Anna [July 31], Anno 1519.

Andreas Carolstad.

Most gracious Prince and Lord, the venerable Lord and Father Martinus and I want to answer E. C. F. G. recently and all together. We ask that E. C. F. G. now graciously forgive us for not having been able to talk to each other at such a time.

To the Most Serene, Highborn Prince and Lord, Lord Frederick, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall of the Holy Roman Empire, Elector, Imperial Majesty in Saxony Lands Vicario, Landgrave in Thuringia, Margrave of Meissen, our most gracious Lord and Patron.

JEsus.

Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Lord! To Your Electoral Grace, our obedient servants are ready with our prayers to God beforehand. Most gracious Prince and Lord! We have received E. C. F. G.'s writing, together with D. Johann Eck's letter, and understood its contents, how the same D. Eck does not intend to disparage us against E. C. F. G., and yet with his sophistical tricks works towards it, as he has done to E. C. F. G., by his usual loose talk. by his usually loose talk to testify to us only in view of his letter and quick judgment about the country; we are not surprised that he considers E. C. F. G. such a person and may write such a letter to such a prince. For we know and experience that D. Eck is and remains D. Eck, he does what he wants.

2 But E. C. F. G. did not want, first of all, to forgive us that we did not report it at the time of the disputation. For it is an unfunny thing, which is driven by pure hatred and envy, respected by us; therefore we did not want to be the first, that one should not say, as here D. Eck fears without need, that we had sought someone's unhappiness with our glimpses.

3) However, since we have been caused by D. Eck's letter, we ask that E. C. F. G. would graciously listen to the reason, although we do not like to do such long useless chatter in front of E. C. F. G.. But let the matter speak for itself, whether D. Eck, according to his fame and legacy, is the one who is inclined to serve or disgrace E. C. F. G. University.

4 First, D. Eck complains that I have let Andreas Carlstadius issue several Conclusiones against him, with barbed and contemptuous words, since he does not consider me skilled enough to scold people. I say: D. Eck may regard me as he pleases; but it would almost have been fitting for him to have added to his complaint also would have, as he did before, us and E. C. F. G. Universities to shame and disgrace, D. Martinum so that [it] would have been too much for a wicked woman: scolded him by his poisoned Obeliscos a Bohemum, haereticum, seditiosum, virulentum, procacem, novum Prophetam, and only judged according to all his lust, of which I did not do the twentieth part to him for the salvation of our honor, and acted too much moderately against such mischief.

5. for I also consider D. Ecken much less skillful, who should not only revile such a man, but all of us, before E. C. F. G. University to shame, blaspheme, and without any reason and cause so sacrilegiously. And so D. Ecken der Kitzel so fast rühret, so sind die gleichen Obelisci noch vorhanden, 1) wollen sie wohl an Tag bringen, die wir bisher, seiner Ehre verschonet, verhalten haben, so je so großer Undank we verdientet, dass wir ihn nicht mit gleichem Maß bezahlt haben.

If it is necessary, let us also, as he has done, collect a note full of his nasty, pointed, annoying words and comments, so that the disputation will be a real hindrance to the truth.

7 Secondly, he lets my chariot go to waste and thinks he can make one, but not with a horse, but perhaps with a donkey. I have neither named nor painted anyone in the pictures of the chariot, but have shown the common errors of the theologians, that we were promised in the country and everywhere, and yet no one was allowed to give his reason or to challenge us. I will let him make a wagon and put a donkey in it, as he wishes; perhaps we will find a driver for it.

8. that he has mercy on me, Martini Luther, praise God; but would like to hear the singularitates, of which he punishes me so mercifully, although with him nothing is to be done to me in articles concerning faith, except perhaps repentance; the other is opinio de indulgentiis, purgatorio, potestate Papae, in which I confess that after his-no little mind (as he himself says true) has caused much error and annoyance, not to the common people, but to the phariseis and scribis, to whom also Christ and all the apostles caused annoyance; of which, of course, I still do not want to moderate myself today, I then experience the great mind of D. Eck. Eck, how he will defend me.

9 He blames me and does not blush, I should deny all the holy fathers Augustine, Ambrose, Jerome, Gregory, Leo, Chrysostom 2c. and so on, and attribute my understanding to the Scriptures alone. Thus a Doctor of the Holy Scriptures should speak before such a prince with force and with his mouth full.

May here E. C. F. G. notice with what service D. Eck is inclined to us, who may write such a piece cheerfully from us. If he had said that I had denied some fathers, there would have remained an appearance; but all of them denied, his clear conscience knows that [it] is not true.

11) But that C. F. G. knows the reason: "I have probably introduced a doctor next to the text of the Bible, against another, the doctor Eck bare, naked, without a Bible, and will not desist from doing so for the rest of my life. And that means that Doctor Eck has denied all the Holy Fathers and is considered evil in the New Eckian Christianity.

For more information, I will indicate one of them. The saying of Pauli Apostoli Gal. 2,6: Deus personam hominis non accipit, I have led with St. Hieronymi's interpretation against the primacy of the Pope; thus, that the person of Peter (that is, the greatness and everything that he would like to be externally) is not respected before God. For the Scripture says that in the sight of God, lord, servant, great, small, poor, rich, highest, lowest, 2c. are equal; and everything that is outwardly seen in man is called person. But if persona and primacy were jus divinum, God would not despise them, but would have commanded them; so Paul would lie when he says: Deus personam hominis non accipit.

13 On the other hand, D. Eck says with St. Ambrose that the person of Peter is the poor fishermen of St. Peter; but the text of Paul concurs with St. Jerome, not with Ambrose, because St. Paul wanted to resist the Galatians, they should not be mistaken about St. Peter's and the other apostles' high standing, as they presented the false apostles, no doubt not the lowly fishermen's standing, but the high apostles' standing and first and foremost St. Peter's title was preached to them, as the text (before which Eck allzeit grauet) clearly brings with it.

Item: Tu es Petrus, et super hanc petram etc. [Matth. 16,18. [Matth. 16,18.] I have understood with St. Augustine and the whole scripture through petram Christum, when Paul says: Petra autem erat Christus, 1 Cor. 10,4. D. Eck wanted to have Petrum with many other teachers. Thus, Eck did almost the entire disputation, always fleeing from the text of Scripture, only looking for how he could find naked sayings of a teacher. And that means denying all fathers. I would like to say that he has denied and fled the entire holy scripture.

(15) About all this he did not want to pay attention to what other teachers, or how a teacher in another place wrote and held against himself, just as if I should consider D. Corners for a god, what he would bring forward, badly blindly receive.

16 St. Augustine taught me, and is referred to dist. 9 in Decretis, that all teachers, no matter how holy or learned, should be tried beforehand and judged according to the text of the Scriptures, as Christ, Paul, and John have also commanded us. D. Eck knows something better, and despises such a commandment, teaching us that we should judge the Scriptures according to the teachers' opinion, and that it should be enough if one or two teachers say something, leaving the others with text and Scripture. And is his some babble which he exalts: Let no one interpret the Scriptures according to his own reason, but follow the teaching of the fathers.

17 Thus I said that if I had a clear text, I would stick to it, even if the teacher's interpretation were against it, as St. Augustine often did and teaches. For, as the jurists also say, one should believe more a man who has Scripture for himself than the pope and the whole Concilio without Scripture. From this the dear friends, D. Eck and the Leipzigers, conclude a round judgment, saying, I have denied all teachers. What should one do with such deceitful hearts?

and tongues do good? According to the way he has accused me of the Concilium Constantiense, that he blames me, I have denied it; to this I want to answer him honestly in his time, and to expose his false heart in day. Now be enough to report to E. C. F. G. that D. Eck has undertaken to prove primatum Papae jure divino, and has taken his some strongest reason before him the Concilium Constantiense, placed himself, or perhaps does not know, that Concilium est jus humanum, and may not jus divinum ἡ ἀρετὴ ex non jure divino. Against this I have set the whole orientalism Ecclesiam, a thousand and four hundred years long, which has never been under the pope.

If now primatus would be de jure divino, then in the 1400 years too many Christians would be condemned, also almost the most holy fathers and great teachers of Christianity, as Basil, Nazianzenus, Athanasius, Chrysostom, and the St. Jerome tells, lib. de illustribus viris. For they have ruled without the Roman See's command and authority.

19 On this my D. Eck publicly scolded unashamedly that the Graeci were all rebelles, schismatici and haeretici; that I have never heard of the sacrilegious, wanton blasphemy of the holy churches orientali; yet even in the law books Graeca et orientalis Ecclesia is famous, also never rebuked. It is true that in orientali Ecclesia were heretics, Ariani, Macedonii 2c. But they have been in ossiäntali also, as Manichaei, Pelagiani. But for the sake of Judas, one should not blaspheme Christ and the apostles.

20 Secondly, I have brought forward the most Christian and greatest Concilium Nicenum, and also Africanum. For if the primacy is ἡ ἀρετὴ, then the same Concilium Nicenum and all the popes are all heretics and condemned, because they have statued there and had it statued that the Roman bishop should only have regard to the French churches, and Alexandrinus to the Egyptian churches; in addition, the bishops were not ordained from Roma, but by the next two or three bishops. As St. Cyprian writes, and all of Africa and Gallia lived and followed the same lukewarm time; which is all against the jus primatu8 and current custom.

although the Roman See has confirmed the same Concilium many times and still, and holds it equal to the Gospel. Now there is no man so blind (be silent a theologian), who does not know that jus divinum no one has power to walk; which nevertheless has happened here, when all bishops are to be confirmed jure divino by Rome.

Thus D. Eck has made heretics of me and blasphemed the whole Ecclesiam orientalem, Africanam, Gallicam, and the most holy Concilium Nicänum, where the whole of Christendom has held and still holds, as they have acted against jus divinum, so that he imposes his Constantiense Concilium (which he himself neither understands nor wants to understand) on me to give us Wittenbergers a defeat, to please his Leipzigers.

22 And that E. C. F. G. notices how D. Eck, out of sheer courage, does not want to understand the Constantiense Concilium, but only wants to revile and blaspheme E. C. F. G. University, I give E. C. F. G. to know:

First, that the same Concilium does not censure all articles of John Hus haereticos, but some erroneos, some tmsrario8, some offensivos, and it is still undiscussed which are haeretici or not. Then D. Eck with his Leipzigers should have looked at the letters rightly and considered how difficult it is (as I often told him in the disputation) so many Christians in Orient and Africa through so long a time, for the sake of the primacy, scold and condemn heretics. This did not help; my dear Doctor Eck, as if he alone were more than the Pope, Concilium, and all of Christendom, and he was commanded to master the same determinationes of his liking, he freely made all the articles haereticos, and the Leipzigers, who should have resisted this, let it please them; which, God willing, should not please them at all. Demi which articles are not haeretici nor erronei, they must be Christian and true, they be temerarii, offensivi, seditiosi, as they like. For even the holy gospel is at all times offensive to the great Hansen and molliculis auribus, scandalosum, even, as Apostolus says [2 Cor. 2,16.], odor mortis et verbum offensionis. And does God know where the condemnation comes from, that a saying.

is rejected because it is offensivus and not haereticus nor erroneus. Perhaps the Holy Spirit watches where the theologians sleep too deeply.

24 Secondly, it is found that several times are condemned articuli contrarii, namely: Deus facit malum, Deus non facit malum, which are both christianissimi, yes, invented in the text of Scripture. The first Is. 45, 7, and Amos 3, 6., the other 1 Mos. 1, 31. Although I would have preferred to spare the word of Scripture, and among other words, condemn the heretics' error. And I do not believe that a council has the power and authority to condemn clear sayings of Scripture for the sake of heretics' abuse. For in this way one would ultimately have to condemn the whole Bible, from which alone all heresies come, so that some fools call the Bible the heretics' book.

25 So one has acted to Costnitz also Contraria. To the first condemned the article: Primatus non est jure divino, and yet determinirt, the Concilium is over the pope. This would be heretical and erroneous if the pope had jure divino primatum. For then the Concilium would be supreme on earth, and would have a primacy over the pope's primacy, as the right vicar of Christ, in plenitudine potestatis omnium.

26 Therefore it follows that the Roman church is not above other churches, but all churches are equal. And I believe this to be true, because St. Peter, Apost. 8, 14, subject to the church at Jerusalem, was sent with St. John to Samaria. Peter and all of them would have hardly sinned against this, if Peter had been jure divino supreme, and had allowed himself to be sent as an untern. So, if Primatus was jure divino of the pope, then the Concilio had no right to take over itself, and to depose the pope as a subject, to rule and act as it pleases. For jus divinum can neither be governed nor changed. And if the pope is over all Christians, and the Roman church over all churches, he is certainly also over the concilium, which is nothing else than all churches.

27 In Rome, in the Concilium against the Costnitz Concilium, it was determined that the pope was over the Concilium, and that the

The Concilium of Basel has been abrogated, and so the Concilia go against each other, and, if we build on them, we do not know in the end where the pope, the Concilium, the church, Christ, or we remain. All this must then have been done by the Holy Spirit, and be jus divinum, that we must be heretics at one time according to one article, and Christians at another time, as they think good. So they put it in our mouths that we must say, willingly or unwillingly, that the Concilium has erred.

28 Now I will not put my finger between the contrarietatem of the determination and erroneous trades of the Conciliorum, nor undertake to concord them, or to explain or discuss articles, of which D. Eck subjected himself to. It is enough for me that Concilia do not make jus divinum, and D. Eck may not raise a consistent argument against me, out of such jure humano, in addition fickle, partisan dealings and determination Conciliorum; nor may he say (without force and lies) that all articles are heretical or erroneous, but much Christian and true.

29. so I have said, and will well receive it before v. corners, whether God wills that some articles are christianissimi, as, the: Primatus Romanae Ecclesiae non est jure divino. First of all, because a much greater, much holier, much more certain Concilium Nicenum, with the whole of Christendom, all the world, and also the Roman See's opinion, has been differently established, approved, and so far more than a thousand years barred and confirmed, considered by the Roman See to be equal to the Gospel. All Christians of the Orient have lived up to this, and the D. Eck is to leave me blasphemed and unheretical, and not to say that they have acted contrary to jus divinum. I have held this point against him many times in Leipzig; but the little nut has always been too hard for him, and his nasty solution has not helped him, so that he thinks that Romani pontifices have imposed this; jus divinum can neither be hanged nor beheaded.

30 Secondly, because not all articles are heretical, nor have they yet been discussed, nor have they been explained, nor have they been acted against in the Concilio itself; from which trade the understanding is to be taken more than from the letter.

31. so the article is also Christian: Divi- nitās et humanitas sunt unus Christus. And there is nothing in it that the logicians have invented. Item, which is also true: Omnis actus hominis est bonus aut malus, and concordant mit Christo Matth. 12, 33.: Aut facite arborem bonam, et fructum ejus bonum; aut facite arborem malam, et fructum ejus malum, and the like many others. Let John Hus or the Concilium have a mind of their own, the articles as they stand are true.

God never wanted a devout Christian man to understand a saying of Scripture correctly and form it in his mind, and then reject it for the sake of some erroneous minds, regardless of his right mind. About this one should deny pope and concilia, for the salvation of the holy scripture. For where this article is heretically scolded, the Gospel, Paul and Augustine must perish.

Before I do this, I will use my Christian liberty and say thus: A concilium may err (as all teachers of Scripture and law write), and has erred several times, as the histories show, and the present Roman indicates against the Costnitz and Basel. So in the articles the Costnitz also errs; or prove that it has not erred, especially if one should believe more a layman who has Scripture than the pope and concilio without Scripture.

34 Also in this way, D. Carlstadt and D. Eck held and concorded in this disputation that liberum arbitrium ante gratiam nihil valet, nisi ad peccandum. If this is true, then this article is also true: Omnis actus etc. For he says that all works apart from grace are evil; so those in grace must be good, so there remains no remedy. So D. Eck must also go against the concilium. But if he redeems himself, he must also let us do so, or he must also be a Hussite and speak all his blasphemous words about himself. Although the Concilium is not against me, or it is not clear whether it is against me, Doctor Eck did not want to leave this to the judges, but became a judge himself, and put me to all shame, proclaimed a heretic and heretic-patron and had it written. So me and all of us, before E. C. F. G. Uni.

The people of the University, publicly deprived of our Christian honor, by such an intolerable insult, have sacrilegiously broken the royal promised and ascribed escort; and those who should have resisted such mischief, sat quietly, and put up with it, as if they had advised and helped them.

Yes, they have strengthened, justified and protected him publicly before everyone. For since I called upon Mr. Caesar Pflug, as the princely administrator, he and the Doctoribus, after the end of the disputation (that ever Doctor Eck had our disgrace and E. C. F. G. University), and gave me this as an answer: D. Eck speaks, what he said, he wants to prove. So I had to have the slap as if a dog had bitten me. I also wanted to forget my moderation, to have accused Doctor Eck of being a sevenfold heretic and blasphemer of the Most Holy Nicene Concilii and of the whole of Christendom, as he is then also true, and must still hold it against me, even if I will now also judge in my escort; but we were publicly defied with the escort, we had to hold that, Doctor Eck might do, let, as he wished.

37 However, because we have come to this and D. Eck causes us, we want to tell E. C. F. G. more about how we are held to Leipzig; E. C. F. graciously will not bear any disgrace.

Since I had responded to D. Eck for three days, and the fourth day was mine to oppose, D. Eck also took the same day, only to spoil the time with useless words, and we were commanded to end the matter on the same day. So I was left with a whole hour of the same day by D. Eck's grace and favor; I did not want to have that either. And if Mr. Hans von Plaunitz, E. C. F. G. Captain at Grimm, had not been there, I would have been Hans back there; as the same E. C. F. G. may well report.

39 He had to have the first and last word, so that to more appearances his retained arguments would remain unanswered at the last, and [he] would be like a victori.

40 If a day was determined and precessed on a matter, D. Eck might well change it, because that is how the masters wanted it.

41 Also that he does not argue for the sake of truth, but only to our disgrace, he shows by the fact that he took all my books and what I ever wrote, picked up, and would have liked to disgrace it all in front of everyone and znnicht made, whether it was not ad propositum. He searched for nns in such an ugly way.

He also could not help not wanting to leave the poor monkhood unchastised.

I did a little sermon before our rector, my gracious lord, Duke Bernimo, but three holy days were not enough for D. Eck to tear me away with my sermon and to revile me before the people. In the meantime I kept silence. For that is how one should keep a monk.

44 From my book Cypriano, which he had falsely allegorized to me, and was supposed to point out to me, and in two days still might not find, he did me the honor of saying that I had figned in margine: Hic fallitur sanctus vir, which after all comes to nothing at all, it had to come out, and with disgrace in the feathers.

Although these and similar pieces are much too childish, E. C. G. notice from them what lies behind D. Eck and the Leipzigers, who deal with such little points so childishly in the brave cause. We respect that if D. Eck and the Leipzigers had known about the murder and all the disgrace of nns, the disputation would have had to remain, and everyone would have heard and read this. For some also start to write that I carry a devil with me in my can; all these are signs of a despondent cause and desperate trade, which has to strengthen itself with shouting and such wicked little friends.

We would not have brought this to E. C. F. G.'s attention if D. Eck had not desired to report and apologize with his hateful writing. Not that we want to denigrate D. Eck against E. C. F. G.; even if we do not need revenge, we want to atone for it in another way, he is not yet over; but that we do not have to suffer that E. C. F. G. blasphemers and taunters want to adorn themselves first and foremost for willing servants.

He also gives his wisdom a noticeable particle that he believes the heretics are pleased with my opinion. Shall I first and foremost, for the sake of D. Ecken's suspicion and belief, keep my

If you want to change your opinion or let go of the truth for the sake of the heretics' joy, then I have truly come across a delicious master in D. Eck. Almost all of D. Eck's arguments were full of sharpness and subtlety, and have pleased the Leipzigers.

(48) That I do not give St. Peter the primacy over the apostles, and that he opposes this and more, God help him, he may well do so, especially since he considers himself the sole patron of the wretched, abandoned Christendom. Let us see, by God's grace, how we can protect ourselves from the resistance that has so far been so gracious to us. Although we are justly surprised at what the free hero encounters, that he fears the light so horribly, and does not like to write, and has had so much trouble that the disputation is suppressed and does not come out before the people.

I gave St. Peter Primatum honoris, non potestatis, because he had no authority to make, send, govern, or ordain the apostles.

50 I do not dispute D. Eck's juridical and dense Distinction de apostolatu et administratione, because it shows that Doct. Eck does not yet know what apostolatus means in Scripture, who nevertheless presumes to fence jure divino.

I do not want his disputation, but give it the right name, that is, crimination unb perditio temporis, so that I know how to act on it. There are now barely two points in the whole disputation, and yet with loose, dnrcühbeten 1) arguments, which I was ashamed in front of learned people. Shouting, talking, a lot of chattering, and getting nowhere, these are D. Eck's disputation.

We have not suggested Leipzig to him; because his great, highly famous memory has forgotten their letter that Leipzig is accepted by him, by us. We would have preferred Erfurt or another city; now we have understood why Leipzig appealed to him. What broke him in Wittenberg, under E. C. F. G. Geleit?

We also wanted nothing better than that E. C. F. G., who submits himself to Doctor Eck

1) "practicing through" - tritis, trivial.

We do not doubt that it is not recognized according to the shouting and the arguments, as those at Leipzig are doing now without any command. There is no doubt in our minds that it is not recognized by the shouting and the talking, as those at Leipzig are doing now without any command.

What good shall they recognize in Leipzig, if they now, blinded by envy and hatred, give D. Eck won; if it is nevertheless in broad daylight, and they may not deny that Doctor Carlstadt's positions have come home unharmed by D. Eck's grace, although D. Eck has written against them a great, pompous title, contra novam doctrinam, as if he wanted to devour them raw. In addition, he must confess that he has admitted Liberum arbitrium, and all of Doctor Carlstadt's positiones, and has joined Carlstadt; Scotum, Capreolum, thus denying the Thomistic, Scotistic, Modernistic sects, otherwise he would have come a Pelagianus to Ingolstadt. And so the great bubble of the title, Contra novam doctrinam, has been holed and torn, and now holds it with Doctor Carlstadt in all points, so that he has also confessed it himself. So Doctor Carlstadt has won, but D. Eck has the cry. This is how the scholars of Leipzig judge, whom D. Eck desires to be judges.

It is true and necessary for the sake of the truth that we are minded to write against D. Ecken. Eck boasts with his pomp of having won that which he himself holds, and is one with Carlstadt, and by such false boasting makes a delusion that he holds it differently than Doctor Carlstadt, and with such his damned honor takes away the honor of the tender truth, which looks good to no pious man. Therefore, he must give us the carnival larvae and let us see who he is, if God wills.

It is not true that our convention is to stand still until the sentence has passed, but D. Eck says this about himself, as he says almost all other things. Even if this were so, D. Eck would have kept his writing, judging, praising, and judging much more cheaply, and would not have attacked us before princes with writings and words.

falsely recited. So he says that one should stand still, and yet he acts as if it were not true; for he lacks the beautiful memoria, juxta proverbium: Mendacem memorem esse oportet.

It is agreed that the disputation, written by the notaries, will not be printed before the sentence, to which D. Eck and the Leipzigers forced us, against his own writing, seal, promises, and first pact, that we would speak a free disputation in the pen and give it to the light of day before all the world. Now, however, they have used their coarse stubbornness to make a clamor, to pass a bare judgment, and to exert judges to their liking, so that the matter would be suppressed everywhere, and with the judgment thereafter all printings were put down.

58 He is still not satisfied with this, now wants to have only the theologians as judges, refuses the legists, physicians, artists. So much does the Eckische and Leipzigsche truth fear that it alone crept into the corner of the theologians, whom it knows to be against us; and adorns itself with the kitten, as if the theologians were the only ones who understood the matter, the others incomprehensible. Why, then, did he earlier want to call E. C. F. G. and the high lordly prince, E. C. F. G. cousin, Duke Georgen, to judge, if he does not like anyone but his theologians. Perhaps he was not serious! But I want the whole university, not only the theologians. For D. Reuchlin's matter has amused me, how learned the theologians are, and how they judge. If the legists, physicians, artists and lay princes had done so, 1) the truth would have been given to the theologians like a sheep to the wolves; that is what D. Eck is looking for here, too.

He also says too much that he has accepted two universities of my liking. I could not come to the favor; I had to let Freiburg and Basel, which I like, go, refused by him.

At the end, he gives fables about the honorable, pious man, D. Peter Burkhard, as if I should have suspected him of having taken my little book to him, and of having read it without my knowledge.

1) The opinion of this sentence is: If the legists, physicians, artists and lay princes had not been there, the truth would be 2c. Compare St. Louis edition, vol. V, 251. 668; vol. VIII, 1035, 812; 1052, 8 54 2c.

and scornfully scorned unheard (as he himself writes); for perhaps he still intends to put his dreams to us for rule.

Doctor Peter is a pious man, I have not criticized him for this or that. If D. Eck has dreamed something, he makes a prophecy out of it, so he loves it. I am not idle to answer all his fantasies.

62 However, I like his decision, since he says: E. C. F. G. would be quite praiseworthy, whom: she burns all my books in a heap. Haec Eccius. Such a letter should have such a seal; that is a respectable theological piece, not to see a book, and yet to judge to fire. But it is not necessary that SUs teach Minervam.

63 We hereby humbly request that E. C. F. G. would let us be in her command, and not to pardon our much chatter and long letters. And E. C. F. G. should believe that we have told the truth, and we want to bring it to light in the best possible way with Latin writing.

64 God spare E. C. F. G. for the salvation of his people long blessed, Amen. Given at Wittenberg, on the 18th day of August, 1519.

D. Andreas Carlstadius.

417 Carlstadt's and Luther's accompanying letter to the Elector of Saxony. August 18, 1519.

The original of this letter is in the Ood. ordurt. 379 Lidl. Ootti; printed in Cyprian's "Nützliche Urkunden," vol. I, p. 406; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. III, p. 624; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 321; in the Erlangen edition, vol. 53, p. 26 and in the supplement to the Leipzig edition, p. 28.

To the most illustrious, highborn Prince and Lord, Lord Frederick, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall of the Holy Roman Empire, Elector, Imperial Majesty in the Saxon Vicariate, Landgrave in Thuringia, Margrave of Meissen, our most gracious Lord and Patron.

Jesus.

Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Lord. To your princely graces, our servants are ready with our prayers to God beforehand. Most gracious Prince and Lord! After E. C. F. G. requested from us an answer to D. Johannis Eck's writing, we have begun to take every possible pains to issue a transfiguration by public pressure against his erroneous opinions and untruthfully presented pieces of our proposition, in which we shall provide D. Eck and everyone with sufficient reason and instruction. However, we hereby send E. C. F. G. a German written reply to his letter given to E. C. F. G., specifically directed as to whether E. C. F. G. might like to send the same to D. Eck, which we would like to see, since we suspect that he will take this as a serious reason to flutter out, as he is wont to do, and thus the matter would be given the ground. However, we place all this at the pleasure of E. C. F. G.. We publicly feel that from D. Eck's various writings and works that come to us from Nuremberg, Augsburg and everywhere else, that he intended to blaspheme and revile the Wittenbergers with lies and deceptions to the worst of his ability. He surrendered. Now God help the truth. We tell this to E. C. F. G. so that she will not think that we are perhaps doing too much to him. Hereby we humbly command E. C. F. G.. God spare E. C. F. G. long blessed, Amen. At Wittenberg on the day of Agapiti [Aug. 18] 1519.

E. C. F. G.

The underserved chaplain and servant D.
Andreas Carlstadt. D.
Martinus Luther.

418 Luther's private responsibility against Eck in a letter to Spalatin, in which he particularly responds to the point that Eck had falsely claimed in his defamatory letter that Carlstadt and Luther had suggested Leipzig or Erfurt to him as the site of the disputation, since Wittenberg had been suggested to him first, which, however, was not up to him.

See Appendix, No. 53, U§1.2.

419 D. Johann Eck's response to Carlstadt's and Luther's letter to the Elector of Saxony. Date Ingolstadt, November 8, 1519.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 75d; in the Jena edition (1564), vol. I, p. 155 d; in the Altenburg edition, vol. I, p. 282; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVII, p. 259 and in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. III, 626.

Most Serene, Highborn Prince! My submissive, obedient services, along with my poor prayer, are ready beforehand for Your Electoral Grace. Most gracious Lord! I have received E. C. F. G.'s letter, together with the responsibility of E. C. F. G.'s doctors, in all humility, as is due, and have also read the same. And while waiting for the decision of Paris, my opinion would have been to remain silent. Again, I have considered that Doctor Martinus Luther interprets the untruth to the holy Concilio, and to this end, I consider it necessary to discover the same to E. C. F. G., asking in all humility most humbly that he not receive it in disgrace, nor have any displeasure.

(2) First, I let it remain that they say that the dispute was driven by envy and hatred. May God be my witness that this is not so on my part. But I proposed the disputation to them for the sake of explaining the truth, and so that the matter would finally be decided by those who heard us disputing, so that the disgraceful writings would be avoided and abolished. And therefore, since they did not want to come to Paris or Cologne, I accepted Leipzig at their request and followed them to their province, since I did not know any doctor or master. But if E. C. F. G. Doctores have disputed out of envy and hatred, God knows that.

3) First, Doctor Andre Rodolphi 1) of Carlstadt apologizes that he has let his disgraceful Conclusiones go out against me, that I have previously touched Doctor Martin Luther in obeliscis meis. I confess, most gracious lord, that I have made annotations at the request of my most gracious lord of Eistet, on 18 Conclusiones Martini; but have not let them go out, nor have I provided that they should come further. How they were answered to him is hidden from me; but this much I say that I do not have a copy of them, because only how Martinus wrote them with his hand. I do not die from their suspicions, but I ask that I let the theologians of the noble universities of Paris, Bononia, Leuven, Cologne, Vienna, and Leipzig know whether I have done the Annotationes correctly or not, and whether they are right or wrong, and follow the same judgment, that they do so, and have the choice of which they like.

4 On the other hand, he apologizes for his paltry carriage, half of the painting. I did not complain about the painting, because I think he is sitting on the lower wagon himself, but that he attacks me with expressed words and scolds me: if I put donkeys in wagons, he would drive the donkeys, I let it be; if he can, he is probably lying in Welsh land.

5 Doctor Martinus thinks that the pieces do not meet the faith, of purgatory, indulgences, papal authority, it is opinion. I do not mean that one would have burned Johann Hus propter opiniones, dig up Wiklef, condemn Marsilium de Padua, Johannem de Jandavo, Pauperes Lugdunenses for heretics. But that Luther may deny before his sovereign without shame, as if he had not denied the holy Doctores, I show myself on the Notarien Schrift, and so D. Bodenstein has secretly taken away a copy to Leipzig, against the princely councils and the university's command. In the same, E. C. F. G. can clarify: Quod si etiam Augustinus et omnes Patres Petrum intellexerint per petram, resistam ego eis unus [that is]: If already St. Augustine and all the Fathers had understood Petrum through the rock, I united will resist them. I had allegorized the Fathers: Chrysostomum, Ambrosium, Hieronymum, Gregorium, Leonem, Cyprianum, Bernhardum.

6 Now judge E. C. F. G. whether I have written correctly, I will put the point to E. G. to recognize. Therefore, it is a flowery and colored excuse that he does not introduce one doctor against the other, about the words of Paul Gal. 2, 6. Those of Paris will well judge who has introduced the Bible, the holy scripture, and understood it more correctly; but E. C. F. G. according to his highly renowned understanding and reason, knowing richly in everything, can well judge what blindness is there. God does not look at the person of man; therefore St. Peter has not been mighty above other apostles. I say: God do not look at the person of man; therefore Moses was not placed in authority over the children of Israel. So your doctor understands the holy scripture beautifully secundum novam grammaticam. It also does injustice to St. Jerome that he understands it against the primacy and supremacy of Peter, who expressly says that Peter was made head of the apostles by Christ, ut schismatis tolleretur occasio.

Furthermore, Luther shows how he understood the words: Tu es Petrus, et super hanc petram etc. with Augustino through the rock Christ; no one has denied this to him, for it is true. But that I also understood Peter through the rock, so that Christ is the rock and the Lord, on whom the church is built, and yet Peter is also a rock, on whom the church is built, as a vicar. And I have not become fugitive from the text, as Doctor Martin maliciously accuses me of; for I have taken the word of Christ, Matth. 16, 18.

8. and that my understanding is just, I have proved from the fact that the understanding of the text has had the holy fathers, and the Christian church, as Cyprian, Origen, Augustine, Hilarius, Chrysostom, Beda, Leo, Ambrose, Gregory, Cyril, Ignatius, Maximus, Concilium octavum generale, and the greatest Concilium Chalcedonense. These are not little sayings: I want to believe the saints more, where they understand the holy scripture so unanimously, than a young doctor. I do not refer to the young ones who have written in 400 years; for I know well that Luther despises and rejects them according to common hope.

9 And from the following words, E. C. F. G. can deduce what art D. Luther has in the holy doctors, that he says: One has written and held against himself. This is a small honor for the holy doctors. But I say that he does them an injustice in our case. For the two are not repugnant: Christ is the Rock; Peter is the Rock; as the saints, Ambrose, Leo, clearly indicate. I have never done dishonor to any holy doctor in the disputation, that I would have rejected one, like Doctor Luther and Carlstadt: and yet they wrote themselves Ecclesiasticos, and called me sophistam scholasticum.

(10) And because every Christian knows that the Scriptures are praised and honored above all others, I have written: Let no man interpret the Scriptures according to his own reason, but follow the doctrine of the fathers. Thus Doctor Luther brings it forth, and calls it my own verbiage, and will direct himself to it, if he has a clear text, so let him

He would stay with it, although the teacher's interpretation would be against it. Notice E. C. F. G., what insolence is there in the cowl. This has seduced all heretics, their obstinacy, that they do not want to follow others, and think they understand it better than the holy teachers. If the text is clear, they want to stick to it. If the text is clear, how did the divine teachers not understand it? How would it be if someone thought he had a clear text and was mistaken, like the heretic Arius?

I rather believe the dear saints than my coarse mind. And my useful doctrine he calls a babble, and yet it is not mine, but St. Clementis dist. 37. c. perlatum: It happens to us how some, dwelling with you, resist sound doctrines, and teach not according to the old fathers' interpretation, but according to their understanding.

(12) That Augustine wrote against the doctors of his time, when the Holy Scriptures were not yet explained as they are now, is good to think that he might well have done so. Now E. C. F. G., like D. Luther, has unreasonably and falsely attacked me, as if the Leipzigers and I had thought of him as having thrown back all the holy doctors, which is evident from the notarial Scriptures, and I wanted to prove this with 200 people.

Luther further wrote that I wanted to prove the authority of St. Peter, that he was a prince of the apostles set by Christ, with divine right. This I confess. But that he pretends that I have had some reason to believe the Concilium of Constance, which is only a human law, not divine, I say that D. Luther is telling the truth. For I have based the authority of Peter on the holy Gospels; as the scripture of the notaries clearly shows; I am highly disconcerted how he may present such a thing before E. C. F. G., and I know that it is not so.

14 Thus, only in the third disputation do we come to the Hussian articles and to the concilium. And that he says that the Concilium is not able to make one according to divine law, is therefore true; but if a holy Concilium, properly assembled, decides to be something of divine law, we are to believe it.

15 But that further D. Luther E. C. F. G. indicates, he has set against me, the whole church towards the end of the sun 1400 years, which had never been under the pope, would be damned, with so many great teachers of Christianity, as Athanasius, Chrysostom 2c. What to say of such great error and falsehood, a prince before-to carry? I speak, and E. C. F. G. should always believe that the Oriental churches in Asia, Egypt and Greece, because they were pious, have always recognized the Pope and the See of Rome as the highest in Christendom, and have also been obedient to him. And that it is true, St. Athanasius with three other saints, when he was deposed by the heretics, appealed to Pope Marco in Rome, is almost 1200 years.

16 After that, Pope Julius summoned the bishops from the Orient to Rome, and when they disobeyed, he passed a sentence against them, and reinstated St. Athanasius in Alexandria over the sea. And brother Luther is allowed to denounce St. Athanasius that he was not under the pope!

The Pope also restored St. Chrysostom, who had been expelled from Constantinople, and Theophilus, who had expelled him, wrote to the Pope, as if he were to confirm him; but the Pope Innocentius recognized that Theophilus had judged wrongly, and had expelled St. Chrysostom (who also declared his innocence to the Pope) unfairly. Doctor Luther is still allowed to pretend the insanity of E. C. F. G.. St. Chrysostom had not been under the pope.

18 I do not want to dispute now, but only to reject Luther's false pretensions. For that the churches have been under the pope at Rome, even though they have had special patriarchs, I would like to show through the dear holy martyrs and popes, St. Victor, Fabian, Zepherin, Eusebii, and others, who have shown their supremacy over them. Therefore, do not give credence to Luther in this case.

19 But it is astonishing that D. Luther is not ashamed to present the untruth. Luther is not ashamed before his sovereign to present the untruth that the Greeks and other churches were heretics and unruly, when they are highly praised in Scripture. On this I say that he does me wrong, and in this he shows that there is nothing good in him to inflict such disgrace on me. And I refer to the writings of the notaries who wrote out our words, that I said that it is well known that the Greeks and Orientals were Christian and pious people; but at that time they were under the pope, as St. Gregory himself sent pallium to the bishop in Greece. But since they fell from the obedience of the pope, they were heretics and breakers of Christian unity, so that the Constantinopolitan emperor and patriarch in the Concilium came to Florence, and again did obedience to the Roman Church.

20 Therefore, Luther should not conceive such a false thing against me with untruth; for the pious Greeks have recognized the pope, as Flavian, patriarch of Constantinople, appealed to the holy pope Leo the First, Ignatius to the pope Nicolaum, and both were again legally appointed.

And about the foregoing, I would like to indicate at length how the pious Greeks have always recognized the Pope and obeyed him, as through the holy popes Iginium, Leonem, Innocentium, Gelasium, Pelagium, all of whom were before St. Gregory, through Concilia 2c. But I do not want to burden E. C. F. G.. It is true that in the disputation I accused Luther of wanting to mix the dear holy Greeks with the heretical Greeks and to defend them with them; he should separate the obedient ones from the pope and the pious ones from the disobedient heretics. For this I speak freely: He who separates himself from the Roman church is a disruptor of Christian unity and a servant of the devil.

When Luther further indicated that the holy Concilium Nicenum, at the time of the Luther wrote that he had decreed that the Roman Pontiff alone should be in charge of the Roman Church, and the one in Alexandria of the Egyptian Church, and that the bishops should not be confirmed by Rome, but that two or three, the closest bishops, should ordain him.

(23) Most gracious Lord, I do not know what to say, whether it is malice or ignorance. For first, I know that D. Luther never saw the Concilium; he also alleges it incorrectly in German and Latin; nor does it contain a word about the French churches. But this is in the sixth canon of the Concilii, that he of Alexandria has power over Egypt, Lybia, and the five cities according to ancient custom; for the same custom is also held by the bishop of Rome. The Concilium wants that, as a pope of Rome would have power over the bishops in his patriarchate, so also the one of Alexandria over the bishops in his patriarchate. But it does not say that the patriarch of Alexandria is not under the pope. For St. Athanasius was patriarch of Alexandria, and yet he recognized the popes Marcum, Julium, Felicem as his superiors, as is reported before, and yet he was in such a council.

24. and that brother Luther has his poisonous tongue

I want to tell E. C. F. G. one more thing in all humility, that this holy council, held at Nicaea, which among others has always been considered the holiest and the highest, and held equal to the Gospel, as D. Luther indicates. From this it is clearly indicated that the pope is above all bishops. For there is a law made that any bishop who would be accused by his primate of abdication should appeal to Rome. And by virtue of the statute, St. Athanasius appealed to Rome.

(25) Again, Luther erroneously and unjustly judges the holy Concilio by saying that one should not confirm the bishops from Rome, which is never reported with a word. And with ordaining, Luther says that two or three bishops may ordain one; this is an error that cannot be excused or defended. For two cannot elect one bishop. But he speaks of it like a blind man of the colors, has never seen the Concilium, and does not understand it either. But the 4th canon of the Concilii says that a bishop should be ordained by all the bishops in the province; but if they do not all want to come from a distance because of the way or other need, then three should ordain him, as happens today by day. For it is different to confirm a bishop and to ordain a bishop; and he who does not know this does not know what a bishop is.

(26) My brother Luther also introduces another falsehood, as if I had ever said that all the bishops of Rome should be confirmed by divine right; in this he does me an injustice, and spares the truth. By the grace of God, I know very well how things have been in Christendom in the past, because Luther. Why should I speak such things? For I know that every patriarch has confirmed his bishop, and that sometimes the bishops primas sedis, that is, the primates, have done so; as the pope through Greece ordered the bishop Thessalonicensi, who instead of the pope confirms the bishops through Greece, which belongs to Rome and not to Constantinople or Antioch. Although now, unfortunately, Christianity has come to a patriarchate, as Bahanis predicted many hundreds of years ago, to be in the future. Therefore, D. Luther attributes to me what I have never thought or said.

27 It is even more unpleasant that he spares the truth after that and, according to his evil habit, accuses me as if I wanted to make heretics of the churches at the beginning, in Africa, France, and the holy Concilium Nicenum. However, it is clear from the things mentioned above that he has truth, and does not know or understand what he is saying.

But if D. Luther quite freely and out of a heretical spirit (as is to be assumed) said in the disputation at Leipzig that some articles of Hus, condemned in the holy Concilio at Constance (which was assembled from all Christendom), and Hus their holder and compiler burned, were the most Christian and evangelical, he now wants to apologize and color himself against E. C. F. G. according to his custom; he says yes, some articles are condemned as heretical and some as insane. C. F. G. and color them according to his custom; says, yes, that some articles are condemned as heretical, some as insane, and some as sacrilegious, which offend Christian hearts. Therefore, he supposes to receive some damned articles as Christian and true.

29 But the wickedness may not be hidden, most gracious Lord. The holy Concilium does not separate the articles of John Hus in such a way, as D. Luther indicates, but calls them in general all in such a way that they are heretical and insane. He also does not understand why the holy Concilium names the articles in such a diverse way, which I will now leave for the sake of brevity, because one should soon see it in print.

30 And what an outrage it is that the Articles have been condemned by the Concilium, of which there has been none for so long, with so many persons and unanimity of all Christendom, since three popes have surrendered their justice to the Concilium, or have been deprived of it; since French, German, French, Hispanic, Angelic, 2c. all come into one obedience, and by the nations, not by the pope's trustees, as D. Luther proclaims, the Articles have been condemned. If he first wants to make them the most Christian and evangelical, I put this to E. C. F. G. for consideration, and will therefore leave it at that, whether the Holy Spirit is watching over Luther or not. I will therefore leave it at that, whether the Holy Spirit watches over Luther or over the holy Concilio.

But that Luther indicates: Yes, repugnant things are often decided in concilia; I say: In the points concerning faith, D. Luther will never make this true, where concilia are properly assembled in the whole community. For a concilium of a province may err; so may a concilium generale of a patriarchate err; but a common concilium universale, that may not err, and not even now concilium generale. Therefore I do not accept that he brings from the article, but he shows me in which concilio. For in truth he has never seen a few Concilii Canones in their origin; so I have 42 Concilia, in none of which the two articles stand. Therefore, I think he is doing with it, as I have often experienced him now, and is inventing it.

The same sacrilege is in that he says that the Concilium at Constance has decided repugnant things, and Brother Luther wants to revile the whole Concilium, and so many learned people, that they would have been repugnant to themselves. But of this I will say later.

33 Whether it would be so, that the two would be conciliarists, properly decided in the Concilio, as D. Luther indicates, yet he does them wrong, that they would be contrary to themselves. For the two are not against each other, that the pope retains the primacy and supremacy over all special persons of all Christendom, and yet the common assembly of Christendom, as a concilium is, is over the pope. This was the reason given by the Patriarch of Antioch in his booklet against the pope Eugenium. Therefore, Luther himself errs and deceives himself with such sophistical arguments and dissolute causes.

34 If D. Luther begins to argue before E. C. F. G. with his stupid and lazy arguments, I ask you, most gracious Lord, not to be displeased that I recently reject them, because they come from a wrong mind. First, he says that Peter was subject to the church at Jerusalem with St. John, because he was sent in Samariam [Apost. 8:14], and he who sends one is superior than he who is sent. This has been a dilapidated reason of the heretics Arianorum, by which they wanted to prove that God the Father would be more in divine essence than the Son, if God the Father had sent into the world. Therefore it is an insanity that he who sends one is always more than he who is sent.

35 Also, the Concilium does not want to depose a pope, because by divine right he would be the supreme one in the church. I say, D. Luther truly does not understand all this. But recently to decide that, I confess that an undoubted pope, unless he becomes a heretic, may not be deposed from the church. And even if the whole of Christendom were to raise one against the pope, to whom they all wanted to be obedient, he would still be guilty, for the blessedness of his soul, of being under the pope. There is no need to talk further about it.

But in order that brother Luther might hide his evil, false opinion against the holy Conciliarities, he brings up one thing that we have not discussed, whether the Concilium is about the pope; as if the two Conciliarities at Constance and now at Rome had decided disgusting things. I say, most gracious sir, that I do not want to discuss this now, which is not addressed in a few words.

but to reject the venomous argument of D. Luther against the holy Concilia, I say that D. Luther will never again argue that a Concilium is a general Concilium. Luther will never argue, if he knows more truly what a concilium is, that I have a great doubt that the Constance Concilium universale, a general concilium, decided to be a concilium over the pope. It is true that the part that was under the obedience of John the 23rd decided that; but that was not a complete concilium, because they were still under the obedience of the other two popes Gregory the 12th and Benedictus the 13th, therefore there was no concilium at that time. They may have doubted whether this was a true concilium or not, as it could be told by its length. That is why Luther speaks quite blasphemously of the concilium, that they have erred, now setting this, now that, and have made Christians err, which no devout Christian should speak. Therefore, from all that has gone before, it is easily noted how D. Luther maliciously rejects as not wanting to take a consistent argument from the holy Concilia. For a Christian should not speak of the holy Conciliar that they are fickle and determine partisan trades; for thus God would have left the Christian faith in doubt.

If something were to occur from the Holy Scripture that D. Luther understood it that way, and I otherwise, everyone would think that the text was for him. Luther would understand it this way, and I would understand it the other way, everyone would think that the text is for him, then Luther does not want to turn back to papal decision; then the Concilium would be unstable and erroneous; and therefore we must remain in doubt. This is not to be said of our Lord Jesus Christ, that he would have left them helpless in the matters of faith. In this way all heretics would make do with the accusation that the Conciliar and the Popes had erred.

38 Most gracious Lord, how can E. C. F. G. allow that D. Luther still persists in his erroneous, false, heretical opinion that some articles of Hus, condemned by the holy Concilio at Constance, are Christian and true, which he wants to maintain against me. As far as my person is concerned, I would not care much that he wants to preserve them against the holy Concilium, but listen to what E. C. F. G.'s neighbors, the Bohemian heretics, say; for from time immemorial they say that their master was burned for Christian and true articles.

Luther recounts several articles and brings up the Concilium Nicenum, of which it is sufficiently said how he introduces it falsely; he has never seen it. The Concilium is also completely against him. E. C. F. G. see but how lavishly brother Luther pretends to be when he says: "I did not like to bite the little nut. I put this on E. C. F. G.'s knowledge, whether I have not shown rightly with the truth, how the Concilium of Nicaea is not with him, but against him.

40 He also used such falsehoods with the Concilio in Africa, which he also alleges for himself, although such allegations are nowhere in the Concilio. For he has seen none, as I have said; but thus he has been deceived. For C. primae sedis 99. distinct. is a rule of the same Concilii, and since it is short, he has also meant the following words, which are Gratiani, they are rules of the Concilii. But how to understand the words Gratiani, Pelagii, St. Gregory, I show in my booklet of the Superiority of St. Peter.

If D. Luther says that the article is Christian: Humanity and Godhead are One Christ, I say that the article is condemned and belongs in the fire. But I believe that, as St. Athanasius speaks in the Christian faith, that one prays in the prime time, 1) or that D. Luther reads, God and man are One Christ.

(42) Furthermore, he shows the article to be Christian, that every work of man is virtuous or blasphemous; I say against it that the article is condemned and belongs in the fire. And it does not help that he wants to strengthen the obstinate, who believed too much in themselves and considered the Concilia to be erroneous. I certainly believe that the holy Scriptures are in the first place with us. But if brother Luther says, one should understand it thus, and that is the right sense of the text; the pope and a holy Concilium say, No, the brother's mind is wrong, so one should understand it: then I believe the holy Concilio, and let the brother go. For otherwise all heresy would be renewed; for they have all founded themselves on the holy Scriptures, and have supposed that their understanding is right, and that the popes and Concilia are in error, as Doctor Luther now thinks. Therefore they have remained obdurate.

(43) Therefore it is not Christian liberty for one to boldly cry out of foolishness, "Let the concilia err. For I say against it: Whoever says that a common holy concilium, properly assembled, errs, is to me like a heathen and an open sinner. But that the false concilia have erred, as Ariminense, Ephesinum, etc., it is because they are not properly assembled.

The following is a summary of the events that have been collected; as long as it would take to write what would have been lacking, which I omit for the sake of brevity. With the Concilio of Constance and that of Rome has been reported.

44 If D. Luther has deliberately misrepresented my words about free will, I will leave it at that; for soon after he will come back with it; then I will show E. C. F. G. how D. Luther has spared the truth in the article, as is also his custom. For I remain with the holy Concilio, as I know well to maintain against Doctor Luther, not only with mere words, but also inherit me for the laudable universities, Paris, Louvain, Cologne, Bononia. And whoever lies below, let him pay the costs to the other, according to the knowledge of the same universities.

45 D. Luther complains most highly that I have called him a heretic and heretic patron in Leipzig and thus deprived him of Christian honor. Luther highly complains that I scolded and shouted him out as a heretic and heretic-patron in Leipzig, and thus deprived him of Christian honor. Also accuse those of Leipzig, as if they had strengthened me in this, that on his complaint such things were not forbidden to me, and left him the slaps. I ask E. C. F. G. to graciously hear how D. Luther is not ashamed of any shot, and as I now report to E. C. F. G., I will draw on the writing of the sworn notaries, and the gentlemen of Leipzig, will also gladly give me in E. C. F. G.'s name. C. F. G. punishment, where they will not find all things as I say.

It has the form: Luther wanted, as also here in the letter, that the Greeks had never been under the Roman church for 1400 years. I say that he wanted to protect the heretics and breakers of Christian unity with the appearance of the pious Greeks and saints, if he took the years all together, and thus mixed the evil and the good, which he should separate, since there is no comparison of the light and the devil. Then D. Luther interfered with my speech and said: I am speaking impudently and lying about him, and testified to that.

After that, I accused him of saying against the holy Concilium at Constance that some Hussite articles were most Christian and evangelical. Then Doctor Luther spoke out again and protested that it was not true that he had spoken against the Concilium. To the third, I pointed out to D. Luther that the damned heretics would like to establish themselves and take such speech to help them, which would be useful to them, and thus say against the Christians: If the Concilium at Constance erred in the articles, then the authority and faith of the Concilii will also waver with us, in other articles. But Doctor Luther testified that it was a lie. In response to such immodesty, I modestly said nothing else, because I wanted to prove and make true what he had said and what the notaries had written out.

1) In the old prints: "Prim. time"; the first of the "seven tides" or Korns onrLootions.

48 Most gracious sir, note E. C. F. G., who broke the escort, who was more lewd, also how such a Luckmann 1) is Doctor Luther, who protests that it is not true that he spoke against the Concilium at Constance, when he now in his writing much and often goes about keeping that in which he erred. I also caught him on such a pale horse in Leipzig. For when we were before the gentlemen, my gracious Lord Duke Georgen 2c. and the university council, I referred to all the universities in Christendom (two excluded), that they should recognize which one was right in his disputation, so that when the disputation took place, one would know who was right; not as now, that each party says it is right, and becomes much more evil after the disputation than before.

I have also offered (although the matter, concerning the faith, belongs to the papal see at Rome), I do not want to force him to do so, but to appeal to the universities, as I have reported. This is what the councils did for a long time with D. Luther, who did not want to grant some universities, wanted to have a free disputation, which they did not want to allow him by princely order. From this alone it appears that he cannot have almost a good thing, because he does not want to suffer any judges.

50 Thus he left, that he did not want to dispute, and refused me the disputation; after that he poured out, the councilors did not want to let him dispute, he wanted to let the pope judge about the disputation. 2) The pope did not want to let the councilors judge about the disputation. Thus he wanted to denigrate the honorable councilors and make himself beautiful. May E. C. F. G. well consider how this is not honest, nor is it proper for a pious man. I refrain from doing so, and I refer this to the noble councils of my gracious lord Duke George, the high lord prince, and to the university, also to the strict, highly respected lord of Plawnitz, knight and doctor 2c, E. C. F. G. captain.

51 When I offered myself before the Lords,

1) "Luckmann" will probably be as much as Lugmann, Lügenmann. The same expression returns in § 80 of this writing.

2) Inserted by us.

they gave further information, which Doctor Luther would have behaved according to his own nature, if I had offered to take from the writings of the notaries, who would have written out all things, and would have entered the disputation, so they wanted to let them know about it, who would then judge the whole disputation; that D. Luther complained unreasonably to my understanding. Luther complains unreasonably, to my mind.

52 And so Doctor Luther writes that he would have accused me of being a sevenfold heretic, and a blasphemer of the Most Holy Nicene Conciliar, and of all Christianity, as I truly am. Only when D. Luther would have done this to me in the disputation, I would have answered for it to him in such a way that I would not have had to refer it to him. But that he now writes out of a poisonous, envious heart that I am such a one, I add: It is certainly true that those who are poisoned with heresy easily revile other pious people by calling them heretics; and therefore Luther speaks no truth to this, and does me an injustice. He has also never had or seen the holy Concilium Nicenum right, which he also falsified. And that he now often comes forth with it, why did he not bring it forth in Leipzig?

I have relied on the noble, highborn prince and lord, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave of Thuringia 2c., who, as befits a noble Christian prince, has permitted the disputation, has ordered it, and has not incurred a little expense in it; he has often been at the disputation himself. I also rely on his noble councils, on Rector and Doctores of the famous university, on an honorable wise council of a noble city. But how E. C. F. G. Volk held the escort is well known in Leipzig, as they once grasped the swords when we were disputing. Item, how they shouted at me at night time in front of the house, so that an honorable council had to keep my hostel for me.

But that E. C. F. G. recognizes my innocence, and Doctor Luther's seductive, insane, heretical teaching, I inform you that a disputation note has recently come to me from Wittenberg, printed; among other things, this is also a position: It is not heresy not to believe in the sign of baptism, in Latin characterem, and in the transformation of the bread in the sacrament. Notice, E. C. F. G., how the holy sacrament of the tender Corpus Christi of Jesus Christ is touched, that it cannot be safe from them, and want to bring forth the old error, that without the sign of baptism it is heresy.

Heresy one may say that the bread still remains in the sacrament and is not transformed. Then E. C. F. G. may well consider, according to high reason, what insanity and heresy will arise there, if one does not look into the matter differently.

55 If, furthermore, Doctor Luther comes to the disputation and shows how his time for disputing has been cut short, I will inform E. C. F. G. with all humility that Brother Luther is telling the truth. For he and D. Bodenstein have first asked the most noble Prince Duke Georgen 2c. to break off the disputation; because their university would be missed by their absence, also to present everyone with heavy costs. When my gracious lord ordered the judges to do so, D. Luther decided not to argue against me in any conclusion, because in the 13th he dropped all the others, and also took Doctor Andre alone. But I took seven against Luther and two against Andre, which I led out, although Andre left one behind; and I would rather have taken more, if I had been allowed to, because I would rather have six weeks than three.

56 Doctor Luther also says that he has had enough for one or two hours. But that he complains how I have taken his hour from him, know, most gracious lord, that Doctor Luther is again keeping up his pretense and telling you the truth. We had half decided on my part, and the day was free for him to oppose, as had been said; then he first began to dispute my previous decision, and introduced something new, which had not been on the track before, therefore I had to answer for the same. And I must not complain about the time, because I made him so tired that he no longer wanted to stand on the chair. You can see from the notary's handwriting who had the last word. So I have kept completely to the way the noble councils have managed with me, and have not left the contract; therefore I will come to the princely and university councils.

That I had all his little books in my hands, and what the matter gave him and D. Bodenstein, as he had written here and there before. Bodenstein, as he had written here and there before, I do not refer to myself, but attribute to my diligence and prudence. Thus he falsely ascribes hatred to me, if I used it, which I had good reason and right to do against him.

58 Furthermore, D. Luther, I have scolded him the poor monastic state. That is the truth, most gracious lord, since he wrestled with Rome and the pope to such an extent that he alone could not have been

I felt that the habit was pressing him hard, and I said to him, "Where did he and his brothers get the robe they were wearing, who had confirmed their rule, who had given them authority to preach and hear confession, when the parish priests and bishops had not consented to it? Then my brother Luther says, I have reviled the monastic state. But he conceals that he said to me: He did not want there to be a mendicant monk. Then E. C. F. G. recognize who has reviled the monastic state more. And when you establish and build monasteries, he wanted none of them to be mendicants. I give this to the dear fathers of all Christendom to consider.

59 He also complains that I tore up his sermon, which he preached in Leipzig, in three sermons before all the people; I confess this, because I thought his sermon was false and seductive, therefore I wanted to point the pious people to a right path. But whether D. Luther thinks that I have done too much to him, or that I have done him wrong, I ask to be brought before a noble university in Leipzig, who have heard this, or before my gracious Bishop of Merseburg, Ordinary in Leipzig.

60 Further, he indicates how I have disgraced him by having the notaries put into the pen what he would have written in his book; to this I say, most gracious lord, but Luther pretends to be untruthful.

61'. That I have alleged Cyprianum, or that this has not been serviceable to my undertaking; for this I say, where D. Luther indicates that I have alleged Cyprianum, and is not thus found in the book, I will pay D. Luther the expenses and costs incurred at Leipzig in the disputation. Luther the expenses and costs, suffered at Leipzig in the disputation. And that E. C. F. G. will make a credible note of this, I do this in all obedience to know that I allege Cyprianum at two ends at that time, and think that D. Luther was mistaken about the first; therefore I put a sign for this in his book, because he had truly not read him well.

62 And in the disputation he wanted to have the other place where Cyprianus said that the Christian church was to be built on Petro, I show him from hour in the fourth book of his epistle, where the holy martyr Cyprianus says with expressed words: Peter, superquem aedificanda fuerat Ecclesia; where Luther had written: Behold, the holy man has been deceived, has also meant that Christ has built his church on St. Peter. This has ever been entirely subservient to my cause, and let E. C. F. G. Cyprianum besich-

If it is not so, then think no more of me; but if it is as I have indicated in the disputation, and still, then think no more of the monk.

63. from which E. C. F. G. well, what lies behind D. Corners, as D. Luther writes, and whether that is childishly acted, and puts a lot on the Leipzigers. I know nothing of the pious gentlemen, because everything good. I have never known any of the good gentlemen before; so none of them, whom I have seen, has never written me a letter before.

64 Whether D. Luther carried a devil in a box or in a robe, I do not know, nor has anyone in Leipzig ever heard from me that I have accused him of this; but that is true, he carried something on a finger with a little thread and a silver ring, and there was much talk about it. Whether D. Luther meant me as a blasphemer and tattletale to E. C. F. G., he would be doing me an injustice, as in others. For to serve you, as a highly praised and famous prince of the German nation, would be especially desirable to me, and completely desirable, if I could do so.

That the heretics rejoice in his teaching, as it is certain that they have publicly pleaded for him, even some heretics have been secretly in the disputation. Now he rejects my argument, which I will put to the knowledge of E. C. F. G., whether it is not good: the heretics in Bohemia rejoice in Luther's teaching and put it on the Christians; on the other hand, the pious Christians in Bohemia are displeased with his teaching, and they are sorry for it and completely disgusted by it. Who would not notice now that it follows that his teaching is suspicious of heresy?

Of St. Peter, most gracious sir, I say, yes, he is a prince of the whole church and of the apostles; and that D. Luther thinks he can resist me, I do not mean. Luther thinks he resists me, I do not mean that, and the verdict of Paris will decide who resisted the other. But there he saves the truth, that he says: I fear the light, and have had great trouble that the disputation would not come to the people. E. C. F. G. has heard above that I am looking for the light, and wanted the disputation to come before the people, therefore left him a free choice of all universities 2c. He is well aware of the light, but for a long time he did not want to give in that the disputation would be recognized. I have dedicated myself that the disputation should not be printed, unless it is first recognized; otherwise, there will be more fools than jokers, more evil than good; therefore, I wanted to have a verdict on it beforehand.

67 That he distinguishes, as he gives St. Peter a primacy, and he will not allow me to distinguish. And his distinction is false, against St. Cyprian and Jerome. As I indicated to him in the disputation, and yet he thanked me highly, and so soon forgot it. Your doctors would be better off disputing Memori. Well, I am now making a booklet about him, namely about Peter's supremacy, in which I want to suppress this false, seductive, Lutheran doctrine, with the grace of God. He must be inside in this and other that I like to write, although with the vituperative writings, as D. Luther does, I have never been comfortable.

68 That he scolds me as if it had been a scolding, not a disputation, I let myself rely on the knowledge of the princely councils, and on the university, also on the writing of the notaries, who has taken the liberty to scold and disgrace him. I know well that he does not like to dispute, he fears that his vanity will come to light.

Furthermore, D. Luther writes that they have not suggested Leipzig to me, because my highly famous Memoria has forgotten my letter. Do E. C. F. G. know that D. Luther, according to his habit, but[mals] saves the truth. So he is not ashamed that I am surprised. My memory has not forgotten it (God the Lord grant me the long).

70) That D. Luther proposed the two universities of Erfurt and Leipzig to me at Augsburg with the Carmelites, and I ordered him to talk to D. Bodenstein; that he then wrote to me that D. Bodenstein had agreed, and if I had to go further, they wanted to leave me the choice; as I mean, I still have the letter in my hands, and my gracious Lord of Bavaria's councilors, and our university have read the same letter, with whom I discussed which one I wanted to accept; for I was not known in any place. And in the end I chose Leipzig, so that I could follow them far enough away. As the letters sent to my gracious Lord Duke George 2c. and the University of Leipzig also show.

If it does not turn out that way, most gracious lord, I have the honor to pay Luther all the costs he suffered in the disputation at Leipzig; but if it does turn out that I am allowed to punish him for a lie, then I will tell him the truth.

(72) Since he, Luther, shows how the laity are now more learned in the Holy Scriptures than doctors of the same, anyone with an understanding can calculate what blind and unrhymed speech this is.

73] D. Luther also scolds the Leipzigers. Luther scolds those of Leipzig, saying that they have won me over, that they are blinded by envy and hatred, even though D. Bodenstein's Conclusiones have come home intact, and I must confess all of D. Carlstadt's positions, and have stood by him, otherwise I would have come home a Pelagian heretic, and have denied Thomistic, Scotistic, Modernist sects, and I now stand with D. Carlstadt on all points. So D. Carlstadt won, but D. Eck got the shouting 2c. Most gracious sir, who can sufficiently consider the malice and his falsehood? I have answered this false point sufficiently in Latin, as I am sending it to E.C.F.G. herewith.

Doctor Luther writes that, or Carlstadt, that they praise themselves, they have won. There is nothing to it; for the verdict has not yet been given, and yet they confess the truth, I have the cry, I have won. The common cry is seldom empty. But that they say that V. Carlstadt's positiones have come home unharmed; now they have almost bled in Leipzig; are they now whole? Let them judge beforehand.

He further indicates that I have admitted all of D. Carlstadt's positions; he spares the truth, as the notary's writing indicates, and I further indicate in Latin. Thus he also does not tell what we have mainly disputed. For that has been the dispute, E. C. F. G. Doctores have long disputed and written that free will adds nothing to a good work, it is entirely from God, and free will alone receives it, habeat se pure passive et receptive tantum capax. So that D. Luther writes in one place that a pious man does more good works when he sleeps than when he wakes; the Manichaeans considered this a heresy. For why do the monks have to get up at matins? And I presented so much that finally D. Carlstadt had to admit to me that free will also worked something in the good work, and would not only give completely from God; I was satisfied. And so, when D. Carlstadt fell from his and D. Luther's opinion (which probably disgraced some Wittenbergers), I let it be, and was satisfied.

76. then E. C. F. G., as they falsely pretend, so D. Carlstadt had to come to my side, after many disputes, so they pretend with untruth, I gave in to them. They also blasphemously write that I would have come home Pelagian if I had not denied them; I say that they have invented such things, and with the truth it will never be found; show me on the writing of the notaries that I have denied nothing. And pierce there with his venomous tongue, as if

if all Thomists, Scotists and Modernists were heretics, now 200 years ago; where were the fathers of his order, Egidius of Rome, Alphonsus, Thomas of Strasbourg, Gerardus of Senis, Jacobus of Appamis, Augustine of Ancon, Simon of Cassia, Hugolinus and others? Have they all been heretics, except for brother Luther? So, all preachers, all barefooted; for in Latin he alone excludes Gregory of Arimino. There E. C.F. G. sees what poisonous sacrilege is in the cowl.

Furthermore, they apologize, they want to write. Most gracious sir, I know well that they flee disputing; as, then, when Augustine speaks, is the heretic's way. By writing they mean to flourish the cause, and to revile the people, which pleases many a fool. Well then, write to me, I will pay you by the board, as I have now answered his poisoned hipsterish writing three times, to the epistle to Spalatinum, to the jad 1) against the pious honest man, Licentiate Hieronymus Emser, and to the articles, which the pious Barefooters have complained against some Lutherans, the Bishop of Brandenburg. I do not want to forget the halter on the barn [bear?]; if they want to make use of such pieces, see who gives the other the carnival larva. But if Doctor Luther does me an injustice, and saves the truth, that he says, because of honor I boast against D. Carlstadt, then I hold it, as he first said about it; it is also in the notary's writing, how much it has beaten.

78 For the sake of the convention that took place in Leipzig, that one should stand still and not leave anything out against each other, D. Luther wants to go to the disputation alone. In my opinion, he will go to the disputation alone, although I have heard otherwise; but writing letters alone has never been reported. And Doctor Luther shows me what he has recently done himself, before my letter, in a letter to Mr. Willibald Pirkheimer at Nuremberg, in which he boasts greatly and gives him credit, and in it reviles me after his damned manner. There he sees to it with his Memoria that mendax is memor.

1) Gejad - Hunt. - Eck's answer to Luther's letter to Spalatin (Document No. 380) is his sxpui-Autio; the second writing mentioned by him is his "Antwort für Emser wider Luthers tolle Jagd" (St. Louiser Ausgabe, Bd. XVIII, 910); the third one will be the one he let go out in the matter of the Minorites at Jüterbock against "Luthers Vertheidigung wider das böswillige Urtheil des Johann Eck". Compare St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 4Lb.

Further, Doctor Luther writes that I, along with the Leipzigers, have forced him by force, against my own writing, seals, promises and first pact. Most gracious prince and lord, I say that such things were conceived with falsehood, and no pious person has ever accused me of it. For I have never thought otherwise than that those of Leipzig should judge, as my letters clearly state, so I wrote to my gracious lord, Duke Georgen 2c., the university and the faculty, also through my and from their notes. He will also never see the day that he shows me my letter, in which I have promised him something that is contrary to such a convention. So he does not have my seal on any letter either. It is certainly my opinion that the disputation should be opened to the whole world; but only after the verdict, as D. Carlstadt himself states in his epistle on the verdict well considered by Leipzig, and after that, when we have come there, he does not want to do it. Since E. C. F. G. recognizes who would not comply with his letter, I may well have E. G. as a judge.

80 It is equally false and fictitious that D. Luther writes. Luther writes that such a promise was made solely for the sake of fame, and so that we would raise judges at our own pleasure. I have shown before how they have been given the choice of all famous universities in German, French, France, Spain, England, two alone excluded. How can Luckmann say that we want to have judges of our liking, if I have not chosen any?

Brother Luther complains that I did not want to let the physicians, legists and artists judge at the universities, only the theologians and the canonists. It is a wonder that D. Luther also did not desire shoemakers and tailors, or that he would have brought it to a covenant day. So the matter is created, most gracious Lord, D. Luther would like to break out his insanity with the crowd, who would not understand the matter. But I have put it to the knowledge of the princely councils and the university, where they consider it reasonable that the physicians, legists 2c. should also judge, then I hate it to happen; but where they recognize this to be unreasonable, then they reject Luther from his unreasonable proceeding. But Luther did not want that to come to their judgment.

Caesar Pflug suggested my gracious lord, Duke Georgen, E. C. F. G. Cousin, whom we both accepted, and he also recognized that they should not be present, and that is how it is. Brother Luther speaks,

The angular truth fears the light. Is that feared, if I want to appear in so many universities in all Christendom? And if D. Luther confesses, as he said even more explicitly in Leipzig, that the theologians everywhere are against him, how would it be possible that he would be right, because he wants to be more learned than all the theologians in the world out of stubborn hope, and thus deceive himself and other people.

It lifts and moves on me D. Luther, I want to suffer only the theologians and canonists as judges; why did I want to suffer the sovereign prince Duke Georgen earlier? Most gracious sir, I still insist that the pious Christian prince would have had costs and much trouble with the disputation, together with his judges; I indicated before all, when I was asked, that the choice was with D. Luther. Luther, but if it were up to me, I would want my gracious Lord Duke George to decide on our disputation according to the advice of the scholars, and I would not give him any measure or form as to whom he should advise or send; H. F. G. would certainly know what was needed for the matter, much more than I would indicate. Therefore, there is no help for Luther, as I presumably know that my Lord Duke George 2c. will judge according to the advice of the theologians. That he still wants to have the whole university, by his cause and the high lordly prince's decision, his will can have no progress.

For the sake of two universities, he indicates that he had to let Basel go; this is one that I did not want to have; he also never reported it in the election. He does me an injustice with Freiburg, as is his custom. I have indicated how there are no more than three Doctores Theologiä, one is D. Luther's order, which I could not stand; with the other two I like it well. But I tell him beforehand that I am Doctor Freiburgensis, and that one Doctor, Johann Brisgoicus, was my promoter and preceptor. Luther now wanted to admit that [he] did not want to seek a plea for the sake of the sentence of the things, and that such would now be written out; therefore D. Luther fell on Paris.

Finally, when I excused D. Peter Burkhard against E. C. F. G., D. Luther made a fable out of it, and it had been a dream to me, so that I could clearly show how the people of Wittenberg had let this get to Mr. Caesar Pflug. The pious gentleman told me this himself; I give him more credence than twenty Lutherans. There are letters in the city in which D. Peter complains how he is suspected because of the booklet; thus

I have also read a letter in which someone from Wittenberg complains how he is suspected of having given me the booklet. Now go D. Luther goes there, and out of his presumption he says that I dreamed it.

Lastly, D. Luther does not like that I wrote that it would be quite praiseworthy, E. C. F. G., if they burned D. Luther's little books in a heap. Luther's books in a heap. He thinks it is not a respectable theological piece, not to see a book, and yet to condemn it to the fire. Most gracious prince and lord, I am still of the opinion more than before; for the little book is full of blasphemy, heresy, insanity, and quite seductive. But that he says: it is not honorable, if I have not seen it, I say: although I have not read it at that time, but I have seen the apples from the tree; as he read the argument from the booklet on the chair, I heard well what was in it, was enough for me to judge. As I complained about it on the first day of our disputation, as such is written out by the notaries.

Hereby, most gracious Lord and Elector, E. C. F. G. has true rejection of what D. Luther has invented against E. C. F. G., and I will make all this true and reject it, if E. C. F. G. desires it; and I still ask in all humility that you be at it, and not spare the expense, so that by scholars and by assembly Synodi provincialis D. Luther's teaching may be justified. Luther's doctrine be justified, so that if his doctrine is erroneous and contrary to the Christian faith, as I fully believe it to be, that it then be dismissed, so that the common man in Saxony is not deceived; for that would be a difficult thing for E. C. F. G. to answer for against God, and would obscure E. C. F. G.'s noble and widely renowned honor. Such errors looked licentious, but are evil to be rooted out, if they are a little.

But if it were found that Luther's teaching and doctrine were acceptable and not contrary to the holy faith, it would be strengthened. Luther's teaching and doctrine were acceptable, and not contrary to the holy faith, then the same would be promoted accordingly, and I and others would withdraw the spit. For God be my witness, and my soul's blessedness my pledge, that I am against Luther, for the sake of truth and Christian faith, and it is high time that this be done before the vermin get the upper hand. Please in all obedience, E. C. F. G. will not receive such letters from me in disgrace. For it would be a special pleasure for me to serve her; and E. C. F. G. long life, happy regiment from God, I will not forget. Also, I almost had to hurry, and hardly talked to the messenger, that he has waited half a day for my sake, therefore E. C. F. G. can well respect the haste 2c. Date Ingolstadt, on the 8th of November, gratias 1519.

D. Eck.

That E. C. F. G. knowingly understands that D. Luther saves the truth, 1) in that he writes, they have not suggested Leipzig to me, so I send hiemit Copei D. Luther's letter.

According to the following copy of Document No. 359, Eck added:

Go now D. Luther, and concordire his letter to E. C. F. G. with the letter from his new theology or grammar.

F. On the condemnation of Luther's writings by the theologians at Cologne and Louvain.

420. action of the University of Leuven against Luther. 1520.

This writing, a description of the proceedings of the University of Louvain against Luther, appeared in quarto in 1520 under the title: ^cta Lcaclcmia" i-ovanonsis contra l,utūoruw (compare St. Louis edition, vol. XVIII, inset, p. 30). It is printed in the Latin Wittenberg edition (1551), tow. II, toi. 34d and in the Jena (1579), tow. I, toi. 464.

Translated into German.

Hail to the gentle reader!

What is happening now, I will gladly report, because it is important for everyone to know. Hieronymus Aleander has arrived these days, a very great man in his thoughts, not only because of the languages he understands excellently, since the Hebrew is his mother tongue and the Greek grew up with him, but he has learned Latin through the many years of 2) professorship, but he also appears wonderful because of the antiquity of his race, for he was born a Jew, and this people boasts of the fact that he is a Jew.

1) Not Luther, but Eck conceals the truth, namely that Luther had suggested Wittenberg as the place of disputation. Cf. appendix, no. 53.

2) Wittenberger: diutiua, Jenaer: divina; we have assumed the former. The latter would mean: through the spiritual state.

intemperately because of the ancient Abraham from whom it originated. But whether he was baptized is not known. This much is certain, that he is not a Pharisee, because he does not believe in the resurrection of the dead; for he does not live differently, as if he would perish completely with his body, and leaves all his evil desires in check. He is angry to the point of insanity, and rages at every opportunity. He is excessive in his presumption, of insatiable avarice, shameful and insatiable pleasure. He is an arch-slave of vain fame, though he is so paltry that he cannot gain fame by any competent writing, and too bad to do anything in a good cause.

But this is to know that his hypocritical apostasy to Christianity succeeded very well. For he has thus had the opportunity to praise his Moses and to belittle Christ's honor, which has begun to arise again in this century, when superstition and harmful human statutes have fallen. That is why he came the other day with papal letters, so that, as much as there is in him, he may spoil all that is good. Fare well.

This is what I wanted to announce to the readers.

Action of the University of Leuven against Luther. 1520.

Now the tyranny of the foolish and foolish people rages to the highest! Aleander publicly burned several books in the marketplace of Louvain by the common executioner and promoter on the very day that the king left Louvain, so that I can well say that it was done in the presence of the king. They wanted to do the same in Antwerp, but in vain. Hoogstraten has been reinstated in the office of inquisitor and threatens all who do not worship that animal. The theologians in Louvain threatened Dorpius publicly that they would expel him from the synagogue of the theologians if he did not recant the speech he had recently published in which he praised the science of languages.

The matter happened as everything tends to happen with theologians. The university has been summoned under oath to the rector's house, in which the university did not even have room. For the Rector Rosemundanus is ill, who now shows who he was before.

When the university was gathered to hear what the apostolic nuncios had to say, only two little bearded and feminine servants appeared to read the terrible bull that had been issued in Louvain.

with a copy, and say: Hold it against each other. 1) So they read the bull; sat there for two hours and the university judged only this much: the bull is now considered to be read.

The next day the theologians proceeded by deputies as if the whole university had done so, since Aleander had neither shown his authority, nor had the bull been examined by those who had to do it, nor had it been approved by all, as it should have been in such an important matter. Several books were burned in the marketplace, but everyone laughed about it.

On the day of Dionisii [Oct. 9], Edmundanus made a speech before the people that was worthy of him, that is, a mad and foolish one. He said more against Erasmus, who was present, than against Luther himself, with impudent lies. He said: Luther would have fallen into the terrible errors, because he would have been a lover of the innovation; while Luther took everything his own from Augustine, from Bernhardus, from Gerson, from the Cardinal of Cusa. He said: Erasmus would have fiercely supported Luther, although he never mixed in his cause, but only disapproved of the way in which they attacked him; by shouting against him among the unlearned, whom they did not want to or could not refute. And the like much, in that he went through the languages and the New Testament in a hidden way 2) at which almost all laughed.

The next Sunday he repeated the same and showed the bull to the people. Behold (he said) the seal! as if with it the bull was approved, if one showed its seal from afar. He also said, among other things, while taunting Erasmus: They will also be put to the stake if they do not stop; as if the bull was not enough. There was also an order from the Rector, which added many things that were not included in the bull: namely, that one should not sell books that were written to the disgrace of the university and honest men. This they opposed to the speech of Dorpius and Mosellanus.

7 The jurists have grumbled against it, who are now completely at odds with the theologians. Very few theologians appeared at a jurist's hearing. At his subsequent promotion to licentiate, no one but Dorpius and Erasmus appeared. For the theologians had

1) In the Wittmberger: contörrs instead of: contsrts.

2) Wittenberg: held:

The government banned the promotion of licentiates that very day, but they immediately appealed against it and showed that they could not defend themselves against it. However, they did not want to revoke their ban. In this, however, they conspired that no theologian should be present, except Dorpius, who had not been told about it. And they decided never to invite Erasmus to the solemn acts (acta). O a heavy revenge!

Who can admire the foolishness of the people enough? They have so foolishly and imprudently started such a terrible thing that could disrupt the whole world. It is known that in Rome the matter was handled without order, since the Cardinal of the Holy Cross and many others were very much against it. The bull that was hatched at Cologne and Louvain was printed before it was promulgated, and what was printed does not correspond at all to the bull that Aleander brought with him. The scholars who have read the bull affirm that there are many things in the bull that give rise to the suspicion that it was fabricated. The writing is entirely after the manner of the [monastic] brothers, and not at all after the Roman manner. There are many gross blunders in it; no one believes it to be correct but the theologians; it has never been examined; it also does not distinguish the errors of which it thinks.

9 Now see 1) also the executors of this excellent trade. The first was Cardinal Cajetan, about whom nothing is more proud and godless; and he is a preacher [monk]. He was followed by Carl von Miltitz, and by Marinus; 2) finally, he who is not ashamed of anything, the magniloquent Hieronymus Aleander, whom the common rumor, the face, the language and the faith clearly show to be a Jew, and whom the Jews also recognize for their own. It must always happen that Christians have to suffer from Jews. Thus a Jew incited Pope Julius to the ruin of the world. This is how Pfefferkorn at Cologne set Christendom into turmoil. Aleander, Judas' relative, surpasses his ancestors and should betray the cause of the Gospel by two or three pennies. He has already been found in Padua and Paris so in his life that he himself, who burns other people's books, is worthy of the fire. For he cannot be called a heretic who believes nothing at all. One has through one or the other the order from the ignorant or at least badly reported king.

1) Wittenberger: fide instead of: vide.

2) Marinus and Aleander came to Germany as papal nuncios at the same time as Eck.

3) to execute the bull, which was done, for example, by the arch-shalk Rimaclus.

Now let us also consider the origin of the matter. The thing has arisen first from the hatred against the languages and beautiful sciences against Reuchlin. It was all driven by the mad Hoogstraten and the at the same time mad and foolish Edmundanus. In addition, Latomus, the not unlearned but perverse Frenchman, has come; also the mendicant orders have joined in, all of them worried that they might be called to hunger or manual labor if the kingdom of the pope fell, through whom they now reign in idleness. It is not a theologian who by himself condemns all the articles mentioned in the bull, but, as Octavius, Lepidus, and Antony, when they wished to suppress the common liberty, joined their troops together, and so compared themselves that each of them should allow some to be killed to whom he was otherwise favorable: so also these have caused one another to condemn something, if only the one would also cause to be condemned something which he did not like to see, or found obstructive to his things. For the people of Louvain do not condemn what Luther hates most, namely, that the Pope's supreme authority is not divine right. And Turnhaut, since he set out to refute Luther's conclusions, testified that he wanted to leave this untouched. They thus sufficiently indicate that they hold with Luther in this, and yet have had it condemned in the bull. And there are some in Louvain who have opposed that some things should be condemned. Behold, there are but two universities, which have even conspired together, yet are not one.

(11) Since they also confess that in Thomas, Scotus, Peter Lombard, Augustine, and the rest there are all errors, the very ones they condemn in Luther, and yet are not offended by them, they sufficiently indicate that they do what they do out of hatred for Luther and not out of zeal for the faith, which the arch hypocrites, who love only themselves and want to rule alone, cannot have. No one has fraternally reminded, instructed or refuted Luther, who nevertheless wanted to be consecrated. Finally, they began to argue against Luther in the schools, but in such a way that the baccalaureates were not allowed to talk to a theologian who presented a reason that they could not refute. For they became very angry and held a concilium to expel him.

3) Instead of imxerturn in the editions will probably read inaxetratura.

Turnhaut and Latomus began to refute him in their lectures, but hardly finished two pieces, only that with the fools there would be a pretext, and in the meantime they did what we see now.

If it comes to the point that the theologians are free to say without reason and cause: this is wrong, this is heretical, this is offensive, then one can find something in all books to blaspheme in this way, and everyone who resents Hoogstraten will have to be held up to the fire. And the beautiful sciences and honest people will be handed over and betrayed to the will of an unlearned, foolish and malicious man. In his grandiose prefaces he promises the beautiful conclusions of reason, by which he wants to force us, we want or do not want, to obey. And soon after that he brings forward the executioner with his bundles of rods, he himself the executioner in the robe!

Everything that has been written against Luther so far is obviously mad and foolish. All of them hypocritical to the pope in the most shameful way. Among these, the first was Cardinal Cajetan, then Silvester Priérias, the third Thomas Todiscus, the fourth Augustine, a Minorite. For those of Leo will not (if I am not mistaken) expose their lumpiness to the light. Christ did not refuse to instruct the poorest rabble; but these will not instruct an honest and learned man. If all the bishops keep quiet about it, as some are doing now, it will finally come to the point that the mendicants will get the rule and go over their heads, and also exercise tyranny over them through the pope.

(14) Would anyone say, "But what will become of it? To resist the pope is a difficult thing. First of all, it is best to believe that all this happened without the knowledge, or at least without a sufficient report, of the pope. Question Aleander properly, and he will be found to be a wicked Jew! If one examines the bull rightly, one will find it fraudulent! Even if it came from the pope, one should not have proceeded immediately until the pope had been better informed; otherwise it is to be feared that great noise will arise from it in Christendom.

Luther can soon be removed from the book halls, but not so easily from the hearts of the people, if his indissoluble reasons are not refuted and the pope does not present the opposite with testimonies of the Scriptures. The world has been deceived long enough; it wants to have now henceforth right knowledge. And there are enough people who can be drawn by truth, but cannot be frightened with dazzle. Truth cannot be suppressed, although Luther is suppressed. 1)

421 The doctrinal condemnation of Luther's books by some magistri nostri at Louvain and Cologne with Luther's response to it.

In October 1518, a collection of Luther's writings had been published by Johann Frobenius in Bafel, which seemed to the theological faculty in Louvain to be "annoying and harmful to the church of Christ" already at first sight. For this reason, the faculty immediately prohibited the sale of this book at the University of Louvain in 1518, but saw itself compelled to take further steps because, despite this prohibition, the book was read all the more eagerly and Luther's followers increased. In February 1519, a second, increased edition of the book was published. They sent it through a baccalaureate to the theological faculty in Cologne for review, and only a few days later, on August 30, 1519, the faculty passed its verdict of condemnation. The Löweners took a little more time. Allegedly "in order not to rely on their own wisdom," they turned to the bishop of Liège, to whose jurisdiction they belonged, but in fact to find out the position of the bishop, who was suspected of leaning toward Luther (compare the 166th document). To the three magistrates who were sent to him, he gave the assurance "on his priestly word" that he had not seen Luther's writings, let alone read them, and advised the faculty to turn to the Bishop of Tortosa, Cardinal Adrian, for an expert opinion before publishing their verdict. The latter had formerly been a member of this faculty, and later became Pope, the successor of Leo X. Now, on November 7, 1519, the Faculty decreed a verdict of condemnation identical to that of Cologne, also to the effect that the books were to be burned, but that the author was to be ordered to recant. This was sent to Cardinal Adrian for review, who gave a favorable reply on December 4. These three documents appeared in quarto under the title: Lpistola Uini. Oni. oarck. Luther sent this writing to Spalatin on March 19, 1520, and at the same time told him that he was busy with the answer to it; on March 25, he wrote to Seligmann that the printing would be finished the next day, and on March 27 his writing was sent. Before it, the aforementioned writings of the opponents were printed. The first edition has the title: Conckoninatio 6oatrinaii8 likrorn Martini Imttiori, per ^nosckarn MaZistro8

In all the Latin collective editions of Luther's works, the opposing writings precede Luther's reply in the order given above, namely in the Wittenberg (1551), toru. Walch, too, has arranged these same writings chronologically before Luther's reply; we have retained this. Only Luther's answer has been newly translated according to the Weimar edition, the other pieces have been improved according to it.

a. The condemnation of the teachings of Brother Martin Luther by the theological faculty of Cologne. August 30, 1610.

To all and everyone who will see or hear our present letter, we, the Dean and the Faculty of Sacred Theology of the University of Cologne, send our heartfelt greetings.

(2) Although all believers in all places are bound to help in the common defense of the faith, not only with their goods, but also with the loss of their own lives, those are especially bound to do so before others, who are appointed by the church as public teachers and are considered masters of sacred theology, all of whom (as the Scripture says [Hohel. 3,8.]) should wear their sword on their hip, because of the fear in the night, namely the errors and heresies, which often grow up in the church at times when the people are asleep, in that the devil sows all weeds through evil and false Catholic people. Because a few days ago the venerable and highly learned gentlemen, dean and faculty of the sacred theology at the high lordly university of Louvain, our confreres, out of zeal for the faith, sent us through their own messenger, a baccalaureate of theology, a book printed under the name of a brother, Martin Luther, and demanded that we, out of love, go through and examine the very same book, which they had heard was offensive to the ears of many believers in Christ, and would bring new, unusual, unheard-of, and harmful doctrines and errors of faith to the readers, and, if it deserved such, condemn it by our judgment as teachers: then we have justly, so sacredly

The request and demand of our confreres, to read the aforementioned book, which contains four hundred and eighty-eight pages, 1) according to the number printed on it, has been entrusted to some of our magisters.

(3) And because we have found it clear after its examination that, as far as the matters and things treated by the brother Martin Luther, which he (as they say) published, are concerned, it contains many errors in faith and life, and doctrines that are not at all in agreement with the holy teachers, and in particular

4. disparaging man's works that are holy and worthy of eternal life, and adding guilt to them as if they did not happen without sin,

5. to pervert the holy scriptures and the sayings of the holy fathers and turn them to a harmful mind,

6. destroy the sacrament of penance with harmful teachings and introduce annoying errors of repentance,

7. of the confession against the general church old doctrine wrong council introduce,

8. to abolish all satisfaction that is due for mortal sins that have been remitted, in that God (as he says) also remits the deserved punishment to the one to whom he remits the mortal guilt,

9. to stubbornly reject the treasure of indulgences, which not only the decrees of the Fathers from ancient times, but also the holy Conciliarities, have approved, for impious and unjust reasons, by propositions that are completely ungodly and blasphemous against the saints and their merits,

10. about the punishments of purgatory and the state of the souls after this life. The author of this book has spread abominable errors for vain motives, namely, that in purgatory no soul suffers anything for mortal sins, but only for venial sins; that the souls in purgatory love God in a sinful and unjust way, and sin without ceasing, and seek their own more than the fulfillment of the divine will, which (as he says) is contrary to love; that the dead are almost as well able as the living to deserve eternal life,

(11) Likewise, against the prerogative and sovereignty of the Roman Church over the other churches on earth, erroneous propositions that were condemned as heretical long ago have been reinstated.

1) The Weimar edition notes: Only the collection of Luther's Latin writings published by Johann Frobenius in Basel in February 1519 can be meant, although the faculties were mistaken about the number of pages.

The pope, who is a disgrace to the faithful of Christ, publicly disrespects the Holy Apostolic See and is angry with it in the eyes of the world; disgracefully belittles the authority of the pope, since he can only issue canonical or arbitrary punishments, but none due to sin according to divine justice, by the power given to him by God, because (as he says) to issue such punishments would be as much as to change divine law, to annul God's commandment, and to be a wicked adversary of God,

12. and much more, which is just as annoying, even more harmful and corrupting:

Therefore, last Tuesday, the thirtieth of August, after all and sundry had been duly called together, we unanimously judged and doctrinally discerned in our public assembly, after use, in the monastery of the preaching brethren, after previously held mature counsel and deliberation:

14. that the said book, which is full of such great aversions, errors, and heresies condemned already in ancient times as harmful to the unity of the faithful, is rightfully to be taken away, its use to be forbidden, it to be forbidden and suppressed, yes, to be publicly burned with fire by those who have a right to look at it, and its author is to be reasonably urged to a public recantation. For the authentication and further confirmation of which we have added this judgment by our sworn notary to the said book, and have ordered it to be marked with the seal of our faculty (as well as this letter of ours), and to be attached to it. Given and done Cologne, in the year of Christian salvation 1519, the thirtieth of August 1), by me Henrich von Vorda from Cologne, sworn public notary and above-mentioned University of Cologne sworn Bedell.

b. The doctrinal condemnation of Martin Luther's teachings by the theological faculty of Louvain. November 7, 1519.

To all and everyone who will see and hear our present letter, we, the Dean and the Faculty of Sacred Theology at the University of Louvain, send our heartfelt greetings!

2. although all Christians call themselves by Christ, by whom they have sworn,

1) Walch has here the 29th of August, likewise in his introduction to the 18th volume, p. 69. But it should be the "thirtieth of August". According to this, our information recorded by Walch, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 29 b, is to be corrected.

If they are bound to defend the faith and the holy doctrine, it is certain that those who are even more bound to do so as professors of holy theology are even more obliged to do so. For these are to be mighty in deed and in word, that they may punish the gainsayers by the holy doctrine, and stand as a wall against it for the house of Israel. Therefore, in order to fulfill this duty to the best of our ability, we took care that in the past year 2) a certain book by Brother Martin Luther, a doctor (as they say) of the University of Wittenberg, which at first sight seemed annoying to us and harmful to the church of Christ, as much as it is to us, would not be sold publicly at our university. But since experience has shown that this would not be enough, but that the book and its author have many patrons and defenders, who say that the teaching of this book is quite Christian, by whose advice and reputation many of the simple accept this book all the more eagerly, and are turned away from the integrity that is in Christ, it has seemed necessary to us to use our judgment.

3. We have therefore found, after careful and diligent examination, that the said book, which contains ninety-five theses with their explanations and the answers against Silvester Prierias, Master of the Holy Palace, likewise a sermon on penance, one on excommunication, one on indulgences, one on the preparation for the Lord's Supper, 3) besides a great disparagement of philosophy and of all teachers who have been around for 400 years, also contains many false, annoying, heretical and heresy-smelling sentences, such as the following:

4. that a good work, however well done, is only a venial sin. 4)

(5) Likewise, when he says that in all good works the saints do less than they ought, and that no saint in this life is without sin

2) According to the words "in the previous year", the edition of Luther's writings published by Frobenius in October 1518 is to be understood in any case, although they used the edition of February 1519 when writing the verdict of condemnation, because in that edition the sermo de prusaputione HäeueNaristiani mentioned here is missing.

3) The pratzoeptorium is to be understood as Luther's writing: "Die zehn Gebote, dem Volk zu Wittenberg gepredigt", Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. III, 1132 ff. from which several of the condemned sentences are taken.

4) Cf. St. Louis edition, vol. X, 1227. vol. III, 1187. - We have taken these references from the Weimar edition. For the sake of brevity, we have not added "St. Louis edition" each time in the following.

He concludes that the merits of the saints are nothing, nor do they help anything, but they help us who have been idle: so he wants to make it clear that there are no merits of the saints that can be shared with us, indeed, the saints themselves need the pardoning grace.

(6) Not content with simply saying this, he added these words: "And that I may be bold for once, I testify that not only do I not doubt what I have said, but I am also ready to suffer fire and death for it, and to declare all those heretics who teach otherwise. 1)

7 Likewise: The indulgence is nothing else than a remission of the punishment imposed at the discretion of the priest or the penitential canones; of which (canones) he himself also admits that, if they were not used (per non usum), they would thereby be abolished. 2)

8 Likewise, he spreads errors about the sacrament of penance, such as that man cannot even have the desire to seek forgiveness without God's grace, which first remits guilt. 3)

9) Likewise, that it is a heretical opinion, according to which one says that the sacraments of the new law give the justifying grace to those who do not put a bar; 4) he also explains this elsewhere about baptism.

(10) Concerning repentance, he gives this advice: If you want to confess, consider first of all what you would do if there were no commandment of confession, and whether you would then confess, repent, or do penance. If you do not find yourself doing this, know that you are not repenting out of love of righteousness, but only out of habit and fear of the commandment. 5)

(11) Likewise, since Christ's word is held to be true [Matt. 16:19], "All things thou shalt loose," 2c., faith is more required in sacramental absolution than repentance, and [faith] alone is enough, so be it with repentance. So much, he says, have you than you believe, and adds, I put the case, though it is not possible that he who has confessed has no repentance, or that the priest absolves not in earnest, but in jest.

If he believes that he is counted out, he is truly counted out. And further on he says: Therefore the confessor is to be asked more whether he believes that he is absolved, than whether he has true repentance. 6) Likewise, he says the same of the one who wants to go to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, in the sermon on the preparation for the Lord's Supper.

12) He also rejects the way of inquiring the conscience against C. quem poenit. and the Canon of the General Council in C. omnis utriusque sexus, de poenit. et re. 7)

13. confession: it is not necessary to confess all mortal sins, because it is impossible for you to know all mortal sins; but no one is required to do impossible things. Whereby he adds that they alone confessed the public mortal sins in the first church, according to the words of Paul [Gal. 5:19 ff.], "Revealed are the works of the flesh."

14 And of sloth he says: I do not know whether it is a vice that must be confessed; I do not think so, because it is a spiritual defect that must be revealed to God alone, who alone can help you. Similarly, elsewhere he says: "Although it is not necessary to confess to the priest, if you have not excused your brother, who has been accused, implicated with false testimony, and oppressed by hypocrisy or slander, thinking that it would be enough if you had not done such things yourself. But before God you will certainly be guilty of such ungodly silence that you did not use your tongue, which was given to you for your brother's need. 8)

But of satisfaction he says that God does not require punishment when the guilt is forgiven, that the priest can take it away or reduce it, because such a punishment, which is due according to divine justice, does not exist, or if there is one, man cannot take it away, which (he says) would be as much as changing divine right. 9)

16. speaking of the commandments of god, he says: god binds man to the impossible, and because the divine commandment holds us to have no tinder of sin, we always sin because we have such tinder and cannot get rid of it in this life.

8) Cf. vol. XII, 1226 f. Vol. III, 1352. 1340.

9) Cf. vol. XVIII, 112 f. and the following letter of Cardinal Adrian, ? 5.

(17) Likewise, that all the children of Adam are idols. And further on: If we kept this commandment, there would be no hope, that is, no root of sin, no beginning of sin, and consequently no sins, but peace, beloved. To which he adds, "Which is not to be hoped for in this life, therefore we must always remain sinners and transgressors of this commandment, and are blessed only through this sacrifice, that we recognize and do not deny such transgression. 1)

18 Likewise, he says that the moral virtues and sciences that are in human knowledge are sins and errors in sinners, because they necessarily come from an evil heart that grace has not yet healed. 2)

(19) And many other things he adds here and there, which are equally or even more inconsistent and erroneous. Likewise, he adds various suspicious and dangerous propositions about purgatory, such as that the souls in purgatory find it without interruption, that they have a shudder before the punishment and seek rest. 3) And in order to confirm his erroneous propositions, he drags the sayings of the Scriptures to his wrong sense; in the same way, he falsifies and twists the sayings of both the old and the new teachers.

(20) Therefore we hold that this book and all its writings, in which these and similar things are written, are to be condemned. Therefore, we also doctrinally condemn such book and writings as harmful to the congregation of believers, contrary to true and wholesome doctrine, and deem them to be put away and burned with fire, and the author to be ordered to recant and abjure them. In witness whereof we have caused the present letter to be executed and sealed by the notary public named below, and with the attached seal of our theological faculty to be preserved. Thus done in Louvain of the Liège district, in the collegiate church of St. Peter in Louvain, in the lower collegiate town there, in the year of Christ 1519, in the seventh indiction, November 7, between nine and ten o'clock in the morning. c. The letter of Adrian, Cardinal of Tortosa, to the theological faculty of Louvain, in which he approves of their proceedings. The December 4, 1519.

To the respectable and worthy Magistris nostris, the Dean and the Faculty of Theology in Lions, as friends and brothers, wishes 4) their friend and confrere Adrian, Cardinal of Tortosa, Hail!

Worthy and respectable Magistri nostri, beloved friends! I received your letter of November 7 on the 26th of the same month, in which you clearly show what love you bear for Christ and what zeal you have for his most holy faith. I have seen the errors which the masters of sacred theology have noted from various writings and little books of Luther and which you have sent to me, which in truth seem to me to contain such gross and palpable heresies that hardly an apprentice of theology, who has only just begun to study it, could have done so and stumbled; and in this he proves himself especially to be a heretic, that he pretends to be ready for fire and death for it: he is ready to suffer fire and death for it, and that he may declare all who believe the contradiction to be heretics.

I will pass over the causes by which all the articles might be shown to contain heresy, so as not to make many words in such an obvious matter.

I am very surprised that such a man, who so obviously and stubbornly errs in faith and spreads his heresies everywhere, is not only allowed to err with impunity, but also to draw others into the most harmful errors with impunity.

4. You certainly do commendably and well that you counter the poisonous teachings of man (as much as there is in you) by opposing them with the antidote of a doctrinal condemnation, so that his errors do not also ensnare you, or you will not become guilty before God of the souls that are lost through his wrong doctrine, as would happen if you did not expose such doctrine to falsity and ruin through your judgment and through revelation of the truth to the world, according to the word of our Savior [Luc. 11:23], "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth."

1) Cf. vol. XVIII, 348. vol. III, 1341 f.IS58f.ai90.

2) Cf. vol. III, 1186 f.

3) Cf. vol. XVIII, 158.

4) U.?. V. can be resolved either by Lxoptat klurimum Vaternv, or by Lt katribus VouSraucilis.

5) Wittenberger: "16."

(5) But above all you must take care that in your condemnation, when you make it known, you do not let any word be put differently than the author himself has written it; as in the article of satisfaction 1) instead of: immutare or mutare [change the divine right] has been put: imitare jus divinum [imitate divine right], (as I believe) by error of the writer, as if 2) man also could not by divine power annul a liability which has sprung from divine and natural right:: 3) then vows, oaths, and other things could never be dispensed with, for any cause whatsoever that would make the assumed obligation dissolvable. This is obviously wrong and against all church statutes.

I am not writing anything else now, because of very big business. God grant that I may soon be able to talk more extensively orally with your dignity about these and other things! In the meantime, however, I will not fail to assist the faith that is in danger, in the things that can happen and be decreed by me in these evil times. May God make your reverends well at all times, and may they commend me to the Lord in their prayers. From Pavia, December 4, 1519.

d. Martin Luther's answer to the articles which the Magistri nostri of Louvain and Cologne have published in the Explanations and Theses on Indulgences. and their assertion stripped and condemned as heretical. The March 26, 1520.

To the respectable Mr. Christoph Blank, 4) of both rights Licentiate, to his in Christ [beloved friend] Hail!

I send you, most respectable friend, the doctrinal destroyers of Luther's teaching, namely the Löwen and Cologne theologians. If I were to say that I am not moved by their unfortunate actions, I would be staining my conscience with a great lie. For that which these same two universities reproach Reuchlin with before others,

I have attributed this to chance or to a certain temporal fate of men, or at most to the human condition, according to which it is necessary, as is said in Proverbs, that all once commit a folly, by which they have brought themselves great disgrace, exposed the whole theological name to the greatest ridicule, and caused all universities irreparable damage to their credibility, reputation and esteem. But since I see that they, not only not amused by this evil, but have even become angrier (be it in order to restore their honor, or to excite a still greater mourning), undertake to condemn even the express sayings of the holy Scriptures, even their own, I can assume nothing else than that the wrath of God has finally come upon them, as the apostle [1 Thess. 2, 16.] says of the Jews. Moved by this fear, I am compelled to lament these people, who are as it were desperate and lost, because of the danger to the entire Christian people, who must have these unfortunate magistrates as leaders of their lives everywhere.

It is said that the gospel of Christ must not be preached among the Turks. But if these doctrinal condemnations should stand their insolence and such presumptuous pomposity, what tyranny of the Turks could be compared with this? For, I pray you, what cause do they bring for this condemnation of mine, since I have fortified mine with so many scriptures? Or what does this condemnation contain but this water bubble of the most hopeful insolence: we are the highly respectable magistri nostri and theologians of the high university; all that we say is gospel, all that we condemn is heresy? If this is the way to condemn, to set, to teach, why do we not, after the Gospel and all the Scriptures are destroyed, go to Louvain or Cologne to hear what the magistri nostri either race in fever, or let them give us a new Alcoran after the example of the Turk instead of both Testaments? For who can even imagine what use the Holy Scriptures are if it is necessary to believe the Magistris nostris without them? Thereby I am moved to the highest to believe that the Antichrist either already reigns or will reign soon, since these people begin to exalt themselves above the Word of God, while no heretic has ever presumed such foolishness, 'nor even until this time has the devil dared to do anything in the Church without the Word of God, which nowadays both the popes and the magistri nostri presume to do with such great tyranny (but under the name of the holy church, soon the Roman, soon the Catholic, soon the representative, 1) soon the doctrinal), so that they immediately condemn with a thousand heretic names the one who should deny that they have acted rightly, yes, out of God's power, and condemn him to both fire, the temporal and the eternal. But even so, nowhere can people be seen who stand up and hold the Lord (as Isaiah says [Cap. 64, 7]) and mitigate these terrible abominations of divine wrath with bloody tears.

I, who had directed the impetuosity of my spirit against Eck and Eck's followers, am so broken and changed by this miserable and cursed condemnation that I would rather weep than write anything. Now I no longer boast of the profit of the persecution. I thought it was human iniquity, which is God's wrath, and a wrath so great that not only behest greatness and quantity is not recognized, but also as grace and mercy (alas, the wretched Adam children of this time) is most persistently and forcibly praised and glorified through the death and destruction of many. O, a worthy reward for our ingratitude!

But I want to have said this as if this condemnation was in fact that of the theologians of Louvain and Cologne, then also the letter of the Cardinal of Tortosa, whatever it may be about this man. For my nose senses some deception and, as they speak, a strong suspicion that this Cardinal is a pretended one (personatum), not as if I wanted to attribute something to a Cardinal's hat that is far from a human being, that is, the truth of God, but that the manner of speech used suggests something other than a cardinal. I also do not yet know sufficiently whether it is to be believed that there are theologians somewhere who should be so completely nonsensical that they take no account, neither of what is proper, nor of things, nor of words; then condemn with naked words everything that they like, especially since I have been informed by letters that have been addressed to me from there, 2) that this condemnation has not been made with the consent of all of the faculty of Louvain.

However the matter may be, it must be answered, and first of all the magistris nostris, whether real or pretended, must be deprived of the impudence in speaking judgments, and it must be shown how great, strong reasoning is necessary, so that one can believe those who have rarely judged well, but have frequently and almost always made evil pronouncements, so that they may cease to think that their condemnations have been in the essential substance (in materia naturali), which have rather been in the accidental (in contingenti) and still more frequently in the remote (in remota), so that I too may make use of something of them [in the way of speaking]. Yes, since according to the rule of law he who is once evil is presumed to be always evil, any magistris nostris will nowhere, never, and in no matter be to be believed, whose judgment has been known for many years to have been not only inconstant and precipitate, but also erroneous, heretical, sacrilegious, and blind, whom no one should believe but he of whom God in His wrath commands to be heard through powerful errors. To prove this matter, examples must be given.

Was not William Occam, without doubt the most distinguished and astute of the scholastic teachers, rejected, condemned, banished, expelled from all synagogues, especially those in Paris, and declared quite worthless to be read, by the judgment of so-of the popes as well as of very many theologians? But what a fickleness is this, that they let the damned rule in Paris and in the best schools today! Or why do the doctrinal reprobates not condemn him to the fire? Why do they like the falsehood they once disliked? Or do the magistri nostri presume that they are not made by the eternal truth, but that they make the truth according to the time, as the Romans once arrogated to themselves the arbitrariness as to which gods should be worshipped?

Then, how many articles has the school of Paris condemned, which it has recanted anew and defended as quite true! Or who does not know how the articles of Paris have become a proverb, since the English say: they do not go over the sea; the Italians: not even over the mountains; the Germans: not even over the Rhine, as it is said of the reputation of St. Thomas that it does not go out of the monastery fence of the preaching monks and is not quite safe even in it? Who should not laugh, therefore, that these articles of condemnation of the Louvain and the Cologne, who have so often erred hitherto, dare to go naked and unarmed even across the Elbe?

With how great a noise have the propositions of John Picus, Count of Mirandola, been condemned, only so that the highly respectable Magistri nostri received that their errors were right! But who is there nowadays who does not admire them, except for some old sophists who gnaw away in their corner in raging silence, whom nevertheless, after the truth has been recognized, no matter how obstinate they are, no doctrinal reprobate considers to be heretics, sacrilegious and erroneous people? And yet they do not fear that, after this example, they will again run up against the same truth.

Laurentius Valla, either (in my opinion) a remaining spark or a new tinder of the first church, - which of the theologians and the popes would not have liked that he would be destroyed? This man is also blasphemed as completely unlearned by those who would not have been worthy to give him a night harness in one respect only.

while meanwhile their books like the Chrysopassus 1) or the glassy or rather icy nullities, compared to the books of this man, are a complete disgust. But now Laurentius is such a man and becomes more so every day, whose equal neither Italy nor the whole Church has had in many centuries, not only in every kind of doctrinal subject (disciplinarum) (which no highly respectable Magister noster has yet accomplished), but also in constancy and unfeigned! zeal for the Christian faith. What did the condemnation not only of the doctrinal condemners, but also the proven condemnation of the proven people (autenticorum autentica) achieve here, but that it made a mockery of itself and glorified this man more?

After these Johann Reuchlin, on whom (by God's providence) the theologians of five universities have been caught, what they hold, what they have in mind, what the doctrinal bastards seek. And it is not hidden that the people of Louvain and Cologne, moved by the awareness of this disgrace, which they received from Reuchlin, seek the restoration of their honor through this new story (fabula) to Luther, since they were proven perpetrators of that, not only doctrinal, by burning his books; Now that the matter is quite badly arranged, they are somewhat broken, since they have remained neither doctrinal nor proven, and pose with fictitious humility as if they were only doctrinal, hoping that they will also come out of it as proven. But by their crude cunning and their unhappily restored honor, they make it so that henceforth I will more easily join a godly and simple-minded layman, who condemns or approves, than all such magistris nostris of Louvain and Cologne as a whole, even if they were assembled into a unity by a general sign of war, personally, absolutely and essentially presupposed, expanded, limited, named, interpreted and explained.

Far be it from me to respect their condemnation even in the slightest, since they are

have not only once been invented as such obstinate and public enemies of the truth and burners of harmless books. Yes, it has come about that, after the light of truth has been absorbed by God's mercy, and the Jews have been cast out and the pagans accepted, the large number of citizens, the craftsmen, and indeed the further they are from the studies of these magisters, judge all the more correctly and more certainly of Christian things than the theologians, the doctrinal reprobates, and the Lord has again separated that what was not a people should be a people, and Israel should not be Israel, the theologians should not be theologians, the popes should not be popes, and he lets those blow themselves out with the quite trivial name, but lets these rejoice in the whole fullness of the thing. And so we see it happening before our eyes, yes, we can grasp it with our hands, and yet the highly respectable Magistri nostri do not yet fear God, the people with iron neck and iron forehead, the wretched and mournful people.

I pass over the one of Wesel, 1) Faber Stapulensis, and that ram hanging with the horns in the thorn bush, the Erasmus, 2) and many others besides these. For what has ever come forth of excellent spiritual gifts and learning that these lazy drones have not immediately attacked? as it is written, "His food is sweet," likewise of the same Behemoth, Job 41:9, 25: "His eyes are like the eyelids of the dawn, he despises all that is high," and that in Proverbs, Envy touches the high.

Now see, whoever will, through the histories and tell, if he can, that ever even one of these magisters was overcome by the weapons of God and the salutary teaching with which Paul commanded to destroy the fortresses and heights that had been against the knowledge of God. If they, I say. I will allow them to infer the general from a particular piece with reverse dialectics, to make summer out of a warm day, and conclude: We have won once by the Scriptures, therefore we never err, even if they begin with the Concilium at Constance, at whose time the reputation of the heretical judges and the magistrates was most tyrannical. They have never acted on the basis of reason or testimony [from Scripture], but according to the sense of their head and their opinions, or at most with decrees decreed by men, so that it is obvious to all that these unfortunate men are not suddenly carried away by their judgment, but by mere audacity, nor are they angered by falsehood, but are inflamed by novelty, of which they afterwards, when the rage has gradually subsided, also acknowledge that it was true.

The way they overcame John Hus and Jerome of Prague at the Costnitz Concilium is sufficiently known and admitted, not to mention the letter of Florentine Poggius, and also the extremely strong rumor, which neither all popes nor all universities can dampen, since even the Magistri nostri privately talk to each other about it.

I think that these examples show superfluously how great fear is necessary for the condemning magistrates and how anxiously they should strive; that the terrible and wonderful judgments of God are not far from their face, as it is written about the ungodly, especially since they see that they have so often run to the most shameful and have suppressed the truth, so that they are not finally taken for apostles of the Antichrist after their iniquity and their ungodliness. But I am very surprised that the theologians of Louvain and Cologne, who are always the first to enter the battle line of iniquity before the theologians of all universities, are not put to shame by these examples and consider all other people to be such senseless lumps that they do not think of the fact that their ignorance and iniquity are the apostles of the Antichrist.

1) VuesalikM (not Vnssslurn, which the Erlanger offers). "Luther means Johann Ruchrath of Wesel, not Johann Wessel of Groningen" (Weim. Ausg.). - Only the Basel edition has the correct reading apart from the Weimar one.

2) At that time, he had to endure various hostilities and objections from the Löwen theologians. Compare St. Louis Edition, Vol. XVIII, Introduction, p. 29b.

The people of the city are so disgracefully stinking everywhere that no other university, no matter how small it may be, has less reputation and respect. But (as I have said) this is God's wrath, which has struck them with blindness and nonsense, as it has hardened and made thick the heart of Pharaoh.

But let us assume, my dear Christoph, that all the judgments of the highly respectable magisters have so far been sound, correct and confirmed with God's word, and let us meanwhile put out of sight the great confidence and audacity or impudence with which they have so far acted more like robbers than that they have been proven by scholarship and dignified conduct. But let us come to my cause. If they had found me in error, they could have dealt with me in two ways, either according to love or according to Christian law.

It would have been in accordance with love if they had advised the people in this way when they published their note: "Dear brothers, do not be offended by Luther's writings; many things he said in a disputatious manner, some things he perhaps said too subtly for everyone's understanding to grasp. Even the holy scripture has its dangerous parts, how much more the scripture of a man. This rule of love, I say, even of natural right, they would no doubt have me keep against them in a similar case; this I would also do, if, as is their custom, I took care not to attack both the doctrine and the name of anyone. For I have never called anyone by name as often as I have attacked doctrines. In doing so, they would have done neither harm to me nor to the truth, but would have benefited everyone in the best possible way, and would have brought honor and love to God and man.

But who should not now hate these masters of the nations, who teach others, but do not teach themselves and make the saying in the gospel true [Luc. 4,23.]: "Physician, help thyself!" in that they, more morbid than capable of judgment, suddenly fall into the violation of love and natural right and, as the gospel says [Matth. 7,3.], take heed to the mote that is in mine eye, and are not aware of the beam thereof; and [Matt. 23:24] they swallow cameos, but they feed gnats? But who has ever written or spoken so purely that it has not given room to the deceitfulness of the envious to twist? If they bring such a raging with them when reading the holy scripture, which syllable in the same will not be heretical? Is this what the magistri nostri learn in so many years, with so many costs, with so many worries in Louvain and Cologne, that they become astute slanderers in the books of others and, if there is no opportunity for slander, violent distortionists? What do you think I would be able to do with their dialectics, philosophy, theology, i.e. the larvae of human conceits, if I wanted to use only the tenth part of the same kind? Or which angry whore would not surpass the highly respectable Magistri nostri also in this art?

See, therefore, how their dialectics, philosophy, and theology are stagnant with errors, nay, are a kind of swamp of errors, how cheap, how amiable interpreters they are against each other, in such a degree that they would rather honor the sayings of the exceedingly godless Aristotle, the renounced public enemy of truth, as much as they are contrary to Christ, are always honored by an interpretation that is willing to serve, would rather expose Christ to shame and all his altars than not cover this pagan, the executioner of souls, and his disgrace entirely in purple and gold. And they treat me, a Christian brother, who was dragged into the public by my imprudence and foreign violence, in such a way that they not only do not clothe me where I am naked, but rather deal with me in such a way that, even where I am very well equipped and fortified, they uncover me and expose my shame by their exceedingly fine doctrines.

So much of love.

Now the way of right would have been that, according to Christ's command [Matth. 18, 15.], they would have reminded the sinning brother beforehand, even if I had let persistence be seen, since there are twelve hours of the day, in private letters-as they did against Reuchlin, so that I would either explain myself, or improve myself, or give up my stubbornness. This they would undoubtedly have wanted me to do against them; then, in obedience to the commandments of the gospel, if I had not heard them, they could have done what follows.

But now, without sparing God and men, they dare to boast that they are driven by zeal for the faith against me, as if it were possible that one could believe that the Holy Spirit is with his despisers. This they should rather have feared, lest at last he should suffer this zeal of disobedience and sin to be imputed to him by the blasphemers. But we are a strange and new kind of theologians, who do not take care of what is God's until God has been angered in all His commandments, and yet we promise ourselves I do not know how many golden crowns in heaven for these merits, and boast with a full mouth to men about our zeal for the faith. When we say mass or want to read or do something, we confess our sins and reconcile God; when we want to defend the truth of God, where a reconciled and merciful God is most needed, we irritate God, even mock Him.

Therefore, it is not surprising if those exceedingly wretched magisters seem to want to heal me like the one who, when he wanted to pull the brother out of the mud, only sank him deeper and suffocated him. Our time is worthy of this, that, as Micah says [Cap. 7, 2], one brother chases another to death, and he thinks he is doing God a service by doing so [Jn. 16, 2], who, after first despising the commandments of God, sacrifices the poor man to his net [Hab. 1, 16]. Against these so atrocious crimes there is no zeal in the lions and colognes, here is no Cardinal of Tortosa, no Rome, nowhere a doctrinal condemnor, but here the sinner is praised in his lusts and the ungodly is blessed. But let go, the judgment of the wrath of God drives them so.

But we also want to credit the magistris nostris with this injustice and inequity.

The most holy Lord, the Pope Leo, what has he sinned against the Löwener and Kölner Verdammer, that these snorting magistrates snatched the book, which is dedicated to his name, 1) laid at his feet, and which awaits his judgment, from his hands and subject it to their foolish zeal? Do they want to accuse his holiness with a secret sting of sloth, ignorance, negligence, yes, of impiety against God and the Church? Or are the Louvain and Cologne the sole and first of the mortals in the whole world? But I am by far the most noble, that I am surprised that this venial sin is free to the highly respectable Magistris nostris. How should they hold the pope, a man, in honor, who trample all the commandments of God underfoot and rage against their neighbor? It is enough if they honor God and the pope, a man, according to words and appearances, and desecrate everything divine and human under the pretense of zeal, in praise of God and in honor of the holy apostolic see and in defense of holy theology and philosophy.

But this is enough of the guilt of the impudence. Now let us look at the ignorance (wisdom I wanted to say).

The first main thing is that in my books there is a great disparagement of philosophy. Do you see here the source of the zeal? Namely this, so that the profit of the faculty would not dry up; no doubt either the whole book or much of it would have been spared if I had not touched this ulcer. But I answer the highly respectable Magistris nostris that not Luther, but the Louvain and Colognians are the disparagers of philosophy. Do you expect me to prove what I have said? This is not necessary; for as these theologians only say everything and condemn everything and prove nothing, so it is probable that they will not suffer a proof of the adversary, since they will want to measure everything by the same yardstick. For it is enough that one argues here after the manner of women only with words of contradiction: Yes! No!

1) Luther's Explanations of the Disputation on the Power of Indulgences, Vol. XVIII, 100. The dedication letter to Pope Leo in this volume Document No. 127.

It is! It is not! It is so! It is not so! In such a way! Not like this! You are mistaken! I am not mistaken! so that we do not violate the statutes and the custom of the magistrates. But by special favor and permission of the eminent lords decans and magistri nostri, which has been requested and obtained before, I briefly prove what I have said. I consider that they are the degraders of philosophy, harming both the young and the old and the whole church, since they call philosophy what is not philosophy, and under the name of philosophy they capture and corrupt the best minds of young people with their dreams and errors. But since they teach nothing except Aristotle (in whom there is almost nothing of philosophy), and then never understand him, and since they try their conjectures instead of correct interpretations, and yet boast of being philosophers, -what more atrocious thing can they do against philosophy? If they should deny this, I would say to them that they should interpret the preface to physics (which none of them has yet understood) or to what follows it, or to metaphysics, according to the true meaning of Aristotle, as a testimony to their philosophy.

But I fear that they would gather the faculty anew and again condemn Luther with mere doctrinal, reliable (authenticis) words and say: Luther has disparaged the Magistri nostri by denying that they are philosophers and understand the prefaces to the books of Aristotle. For after they have learned this art of saying nothing but, "We condemn," and are not bound to give a reason, the more I would prove, the more I would offer them to condemn. But you may firmly believe, esteemed Magistri nostri, that Luther is familiar with your philosophy and theology, with which he, not exactly with the worst head or with the greatest diligence, has occupied himself for more than twelve years and has well acquainted himself with it among your fellow fighters: you will not persuade me that philosophy is that babble of matter, of movement, of the infinite, of space, of the Emptiness, of the time, which we learn almost alone in Aristotle, such things, which improve neither the mind nor the attitude nor the common life of men, but are only good for sowing and maintaining strife. No matter how much they might be able to do something, they are still confused by so many opinions that the more certain a man thinks to do something, the more uncertain he is made and follows will-o'-the-wisps, and finally regrets too late that he has had to do with a Proteus. These storms you, Magistri nostri, call philosophy. It would have been enough that the Christian youth, who are, as it were, servants in barbarian Egypt, learned this so that they could talk with their tyrants, not approve of it until they were freed: so I care to instruct the young people.

I have known for a long time, my dear Christoph, that you ridicule these excellent doctrinal bunglers, and murmur this joke of yours: With such doctors I would also dare to fight. For this is how you use to salt these titled water bubbles that presume everything. But setting aside this salt, of which they are worthy, rather bear with me sorrow for those who under these tyrants are forced to give away the best spiritual gifts. For there is no one of all who should not condemn and ridicule that they have condemned mine without giving any reason. By this frivolous and sacrilegious condemnation, they have given my little books no little promotion, especially among those who are not entirely stones and blocks.

But I suspect that they, out of very wise counsel, did not want to prove anything or give the reason for anything, because, bearing in mind what the people of Cologne had done against the jurist Reuchlin and how powerfully he had destroyed their completely unrhymed stuff, they feared that they would also run against a bull. They feared that they would also run against a bull with horns and claws that would rage much more terribly, since they knew that I was a theologian and, not inexperienced in their arts, had so fortified mine that they despaired that it could be overturned with luck and yet did not want to suffer that it would remain unharmed.

And it is, of course, since, by working with

1) boast with more than peripatetic hope that they are the sixty men from the strong in Israel, who stand around the bed of Solomon, each of whom has his sword on his hip for fear in the night [Hohel. 3, 7. f.]. It is their primary duty to protect the faith and eradicate error with the holy Scriptures. But afterwards, as they prepare for the work, and the Zuschaners eagerly look around to see where the sword shines or the holy Scriptures flash, they hear nothing but this. Verbum of the first conjugation: Damnamus doctrinaliter [we condemn doctrinally], namely the crepitem of a rotten idol; and thus Solomon's proverb is fulfilled: "He who speaks much and does not keep, he is like clouds and wind without rain. Who is such a Thor that he should not laugh at these childish inconsistencies of the magisters? I would like to be instructed by these highly respectable magistris nostris whether the sword at the hip and the holy scripture at Lion and Cologne, in the wrong order of things, are the same as the verb "we condemn" and the adverb "doctrinally".

I therefore confront you, you highly respectable Magistri nostri of Louvain and Cologne: Execute what you promise, protect the faith by the holy scripture, drive out fear in the night with the sword at your hip! Why do you promise what you do not keep? Why do you boast what you do not perform? Do you make this distinction, that promising belongs to the public condemnation note, but keeping to the secret corner of the assembled faculty, and that you triumphantly publicly challenge fear in the night, but after it has been challenged and has set in, you womanishly seek a dark corner? Or do you like it that the word of Horace 2) is held against you:

Nec sic incipias, ut scriptor cyclicus olim: „Fortunam Priami cantabo et nobile bellum." Quid feret hic tanto dignum promissor hiatu ?

[Nor begin as a cyclic poet once did, "I will sing of the fortunes of Priam, and of the famous war." What right will this prompter, who takes his mouth so full, accomplish]. Namely, you thought to bring forth smoke from lightning, not light from smoke, and it is after the example of Moab [Isa. 16, 6/ your presumption is greater than your valor, in that you, as Isaiah fCap. 33, 11. Vnlg/ you conceive with fire and give birth to straw.

Now if you should ask what Solomon's bed was, what the strong in Israel, what the fear in the night, what the hip, what standing about the bed, they will so skillfully expound this, and treat the word of God, that you would rather they were no less dumb to discuss it than they are to prove theirs. For with the same erudition, fidelity, and skill with which they have adapted this passage of Scripture to their presumption, they would undoubtedly have refuted what is mine and proved what is theirs, which they knew very well, and therefore they did not dare to do so, however much impudence they were driven by. This is the meaning of what the wise man says [Wis 17:11]: "A frightened conscience is always afraid of the worst."

These are the Magistri nostri. Eck urged at Leipzig that these people should be chosen as judges in holy matters, otherwise he would not dispute. I knew their ignorance and sacrilege very well and hesitated not without cause. And what should he not overcome, what should he not obtain from such learned, such clever people of this ilk, who have "we condemn" in their mouths and nothing else, instead of "we prove".

But now we will come to the rest in order and only briefly indicate it, so that it will not be necessary to write explanations again until they have refuted mine. In the meantime, we do not want to regard their condemnation any differently than if a drunken woman had reviled us. Even if, while I am alive, they should be subdued by force and crowd, which is the only way they do against me, after the death of both of them, it cannot be prevented that the rumor spreads that it is

1) This goes against the condemnation of the theologians at Cologne.

2) Horatii ars xostiea, v. 136 8y<z.

They have done violence to me, and I have never been convicted. In the meantime, the foundation of my doctrine is quite firm and has this seal [2 Tim. 2:19]: "The Lord knows His own" and what is His. If it is of God, it cannot be dampened; if it is of men, it cannot be preserved [Apost. 5, 38. f.]. Yes, I rejoice in this very special way, that while I live, both my works and my words are condemned by those who are led by force, not by reasons. For as long as they do not win by reasons, and fight by force, they rather increase the confidence of the conscience than frighten it, and prove mine to me more strongly by this force than I have ever proved it by reasons. Therefore, whoever wants to hate me or love me, my Christ lives, and I will also live as long as the unlearned and ignorant violence fights with me. Fine is the word of Chrysostom, that the Pharisees arm themselves with the multitude, confessing that they are destitute of the truth, and again: Wickedness is sometimes put to shame by the reason of truth, but never ameliorated.

To the same piece 1) belongs that the disparagement of all teachers from four hundred years ago is contained in my books. Here the magistri nostri, after having been philosophers, have gradually advanced and become jurists, and gain strength for their doctrines by the lapse of time from the length of time, not by testimonies and reasons. Also I say: If to contradict someone's doctrine is as much as to belittle him, then the Magistri nostri are lions and Cologne belittlers, not of the teachers who have been for four hundred years, but of Christ and of the Holy Spirit who has been from eternity, whose doctrine they condemn and blaspheme, not unlike the Manichaeon Faustus the God of the Old Testament.

First, they condemn as heresy these four propositions: A good work, though well done, is a venial sin. The saints do less than they should in any good work. No saint has lived without sin in this life. The saints need the pardonning mercy of God in good works. 2) And so Isaiah is condemned as a heretic, who says [Isa. 64, 5. f. Vulg.], "Behold, thou art angry, and we have sinned; therein have we ever abode, and we shall be saved. And we are all become unclean, and all our righteousness is as the garment of an unclean woman." But the opinion of the magistri nostri is thus proved: We are magistri nostri; so we will, so we command, instead of a reason shall be our will. But here the Cologners, as more astute people, indulge their lions, and come ahead by refuting all my reasons, past, present and future, at once and briefly in such a way, 3) that I pervert the holy scriptures and the sayings of the holy fathers and twist them to a harmful sense. So the magistri nostri must refute heresies magisterially, and to the Scripture and the attracted fathers throw up the trunk and say with a curbed nose in reliable manner (authentice) and doctrinally: You pervert the Scripture; we alone understand it rightly. And if you should ask how they prove it, with a wave of the hand they imperiously impose silence upon you and say: It is enough; we have spoken our mind!

Therefore, may they now burn or drown my books, I repeat what I have said, and say again: in this opinion I am so bold that I will suffer fire, death and everything, even the raging of these wild beasts, under God's assistance, and will consider anyone who stubbornly teaches the opposite to be a heretic, even if the Magistri nostri of the synagogues at Louvain and Cologne should all hold otherwise down to the last man, of whom I also confess by this writing that I consider them heretics and enemies of God's mercy.

However, I have never denied that we are helped by the merits and prayers of the saints, however imperfect they may be, which wretched people deceitfully try to pin on me as a brand. But that they can help us through

1) Col. 1341, § 3.

2) Col. 1341 f., §§4.5.

3) Col. 1339, § 5.

The Magistri nostri will only prove to those who will say that the power of faith, hope and love, which is the communion of saints, which can be given by any priest and brother through the ministry of the word, can be given and communicated by human will: The Magistri nostri have said so, and have brought it to pass in a time of four hundred years.

In the second piece, since they want to rejuvenate the wretched and already corpse-like indulgence and bring it back to the strength of the former fraud, they declare me a heretic, because I said that by the indulgence only those punishments are remitted which are imposed by the will of a man and the canons.

Here, with the permission of the venerable gentlemen Magistri nostri, the warning of the Cardinal of Tortosa has not been heeded, who has precautionarily reminded that they should conscientiously indicate mine from word to word, fearing perhaps what would happen that they would make a mockery of themselves if they were convicted that they had condemned other things than I had written. The book 1) exists; they also cannot deny that I have disputed and investigated this matter; that I have not dared to establish and assert anything even in the German sermon, as I also do not assert today, although not any magistri nostri together, may they be taken individually or collectively, on both sides, will be able to neither prove nor disprove, unless from the statute of limitations and the use, rather the abuse of the indulgence merchants or those who send them out. Therefore it is necessary that "heresy" in this place means the same to the Magistris nostris as disputing, first, about a completely uncertain matter, second, about a useless and unnecessary matter, whereas "catholic," if you should also doubt whether faith is necessary in the matter of the sacrament, and repentance begins from the love of God. And it is not to be wondered at, because if they are had disparaged philosophy, as I have done, and not rather made it equal to Christ and preferred it, as much as is in use, how could they have invented such an astute and new meaning of heresy? Who should not justly suspect this philosophy, for which, if you have learned to speak according to grammar, and wish to speak grammatically, you must invent a grammar unknown to you and to all?

But the excellent gentlemen of Cologne say, 2) that the indulgence is confirmed by the Conciliar, therefore it is heretical that I have spoken against the Conciliar, namely, so they speak from the erstell of unessential things, 3) since they, as they learn their dialectics for rhetoric, so they consider the question "whether something is" and the question "what it is" to be one and the same. For how could I doubt or deny whether the indulgence is, that I should hold it in this piece against the Conciliar, since I have written so much about the indulgence? Or what corner is there in the whole world that does not complain that it is deceived by the indulgence? So much is lacking that any man should not know or deny that indulgences exist, much less that a man could thereby become a heretic! But this has been asked, but not yet found, what indulgences are or are worth. Here the highly respectable magistri nostri should have opened their eyes to philosophy and not done such ridiculous and childishly inconsistent things with the question "whether it is" instead of the question "what it is. Nowhere does one find anything about what indulgences are, neither in the concilia, nor in the synagogues, nor in the conciliabulis, except that in the last hundred years it has been begun to extend them to purgatory and to heaven and hell, by impudent knaves and seducers of souls, among whom nevertheless the zeal of the magistri nostri has not found a heretic, an irreligious man, if he has not found one. Among them, the zeal of the Magistri nostri has not found a heretic, a fool, even if he deceived and debauched the whole world with the most harmful error. But I must be a heretic, although an error in the indulgence is harmless.

2) Col. 1339,? 9.

3) ex i. posteriorum, that is, on the basis of a council. The Basel edition has the marginal gloss: Hueretius ex xrimo xokteriuui.

1) The Explanations of the Disputation on the Power of Indulgences, St. Louis ed. vol. XVIII, 100; the "German Sermon" on Indulgences and Grace idib. Col. 270.

There would be no danger to salvation if there were no indulgences anywhere: so prudent and righteous is the zeal of the Magistri nostri that they have eaten cumin and anise, but have left judgment, faith and mercy behind. But I think it should be credited to the Cologne people because they lacked a Cardinal of Tortosa who would have warned them not to condemn what no one had said, otherwise they would become a laughingstock to me and to everyone.

And what shall I poor man do? Christ, the meekness and kindness himself, saw Marc. 3, 5. looked at the Pharisees around with anger and was grieved over their hardened hearts, and Paul Apost. 16, 18. suffered after the same example because of the soothsaying spirit of the maiden, and Cap. 17, 16. when he was in Athens, his spirit was enraged in him because he saw the city so idolatrous. What shall I, the most wretched sinner, do, since I see in the masters of the nations of Christ such gross blindness that they understand neither Christ nor Aristotle nor their own opinions, and cannot treat them otherwise than to suck, entangle and disgrace themselves?

I beg you, you rough ...1) (it almost escaped me), refrain from judging or treating Luther's things; you are not up to this matter, neither in Aristotle nor in the holy scriptures. Take up your [with you] related things, and a matter that is appropriate to your powers. You have shown enough in Neuchlin and Peter of Ravenna and others how you know nothing at all and sacrilegiously presume everything. He who is weak, let him eat herbs [Rom. 14, 2]. Do not deceive yourselves: your judgment and condemnation has long since ceased to be respected and believed.

Testimonies of the same blindness and nonsense are those which follow: 2) Likewise, he spreads errors about the Sacrament of Penance, as that man is without God's grace,

1) Luther suppresses an expression here. The gap is only indicated in the Weimar edition. According to Luther's words in his letter to Spalatin of March 19, 1520: "I send you the donkeys of Louvain and Cologne", "donkey" will have to be added here.

2) Col. 1342, 8. 9.

who first remits the guilt, cannot even have the desire to seek forgiveness. Likewise, it is a heretical opinion to say that the sacraments of the new law give the justifying grace to those who do not put a bar.

Of these two errors Luther still claims that they are not errors, and does not care about the Louvain Scotists and the Cologne Thomists, that is, Pelagians, who dream from their own heads by raging against the grace of Christ, and confidently expects both the refutation and the proof of both [faculties]. But he also sets them at war with themselves. For even they themselves are not united in this matter, except so far as Pilate and Herod and the Pharisees were united against the Lord and his anointed.

It follows: 3) Regarding repentance, he gives this advice: If you want to confess, consider before all things what you would do if there were no commandment of confession, and whether you would want to confess even then; and what follows.

Here Luther confesses that he has spoken the truth, even according to the testimony of the highly respectable magistri nostri, who constantly claim that everything is sin that is not done out of love. Unless the Magistris nostris are free to condemn and approve the same thing at a different time and place just because they are Magistri nostri, which I, a heretic, have not yet been free to do. For I hold that the magisterial distinction of moving grace and love, which they have invented out of their brains, is like a play, since it is certain that justice (that is, the law of God) will not be loved nor desired unless love precedes it.

It follows: 4) He also rejects the way to inquire the conscience, against C. Quem poenitet, and the Canon of the General Council, Omnis utriusque sexus, de poe. et re.

Here the Magistri nostri do their promise well enough. The sword on the hip and the holy scripture, with which these sixty strong men in Israel are girded, will be used after understood these words to be c. Quem poenitet and c. Omnis utriusque eexus, namely again according to a new grammar, to speak doctrinally. Does not this mole hear then the pattering of a brazen little stone?

3) Col. 1342, A 10.

4) Col. 1343, A 12.

The Canon Omnis utriusque sexu contains that each one should make confession of all his sins. Here the highly respectable Magistri nostri understand by "all sins" the examination of the conscience, that is, the torture of consciences, by which they have hitherto burdened many souls with sins, as the apostle foretold 2 Tim. 4, 3 [1 Tim. 4, 1. ff]. This view is similar to the one according to which some scoff at this very chapter: All of both sexes, that is, only those of both sexes, namely the hermaphrodites, must confess all their sins. This is a quite deserved mockery of this canon, if they had wanted it to be understood as the Louvians understand it. For who can know all his sins, let alone confess them, since it is written [Ps. 19:13], "Who can know how often he sinneth?" And Jer. 17:9: "The heart is a stouthearted and desponding thing; who can search it?" and again the same says [Cap. 10:23], "It is in no man's power how he shall direct his course." I can hardly restrain myself here, lest I bring out against the quite unlearned insolent foreheads of the sophists; but I will spare them for the fear of God, and freely confess this: if this Canon required confession of all sins par excellence, it would be to be condemned as ungodly and exceedingly harmful. For these books have come from the way of confession, where sins are divided into mothers, daughters, sisters, granddaughters and grandchildren, and innumerable other kinds, out of no other concern than that no sin should be omitted in confession, which is quite impossible. For if the strictness of the Canon is to hold, even a forgotten and unrecognized sin is excluded, because it says: He shall make confession of all his sins. But of this more extensively in the "manner of confession". 1)

But I have not rejected (in order to convict the respectable Magistri nostri of lying) the examination of conscience, nor will they be able to prove that this has ever been done by me, but the fearful torture, by which, whether by the death-bringing decree of this canon, or by its interpretation, the wretched Christians are urged to the impossible, in that they are to ascribe nothing to the promising mercy of God, unless they have made the confession of all sins, that is, that they are never to have peace and trust more in their unhappy confession than in God's mercy. And here I would have wished my lions that they had had another Cardinal of Toptosa as a warner. For they passed by this one with their usual insolence, reminding in vain that they should denounce all that is mine from word to word.

Now, if I wanted to pursue the other things that these quite unfortunate people have put forward, both the dreams that have been put upon me and the things of mine that they have misunderstood, I would become more expansive than they deserve and than a godly reader could bear.

I say only one thing, that I could not be persuaded even by many very wise people (Nestoribus) that those at Louvain and Cologne are such coarse theologians that, although they have raced quite extraordinarily in Neuchlin's cause, they have nevertheless made it less so than with their nonsense in this cause of mine.

Therefore I despise the other and estimate it according to the pattern of these things, so that it does not seem as if I am moved by the air to pursue them when I go through everything in detail. I want to sound the retreat and praise you, dearest Christoph, both the Löwen and the Cologne theologians in no other respect than in this, that they presume and say many things which they will never be able to prove or disprove. You can easily recognize what kind of people these are, since there is no common cave or tavern, no matter how drunk people may be in it, in which you could not find such judges and assessors.

that God makes His wrath known to us through this work, in which He has made these children and women princes over us, as Isaiah Cap. 3, 4, in that our sins and our ingratitude, which is finally also intolerable to God, deserve this.

It would not have been necessary for them to say in bare words that mine displeased them and seemed to them to be erroneous; I knew that this would happen and for this very reason suffered that it would be printed. I also did not seek that they refer me to their experts, as if they were unknown to me, but that they might show by testimony of the Scriptures or by acceptable reasons that theirs is true and mine is false. For what is this petitio principii 1) (which is also forbidden by their Aristotle), that I am answered precisely with what I dispute. It is not the question what they have learned, heard, read, ever held, but with what supports they can fasten it. Otherwise, why should I also resist my Secte, namely that of Occam or the Moderns, which I have taken up and held entirely, if I had wanted to be dampened by words or force? But this is enough. Meanwhile, be well, my dear friend in Christ.

The Hussites in Bohemia and other lovers of the truth corresponded with Luther around this time. The prizes of the former are congratulatory letters because of his disputation.

422: Johann Poduschka, pastor of the main church of B. Virginis ante latam curiam in Prague, wrote a letter of congratulation, consolation and encouragement to Luther, assuring him of his and the Hussites' prayers. July 16, 1519.

The names of the two Hussite letter writers are variously given: Poduska, Paduscka, Paduschka; Rozd'alowskh, Rosäiatovinus, Rosdalowsky; we have followed Köstlin in his spelling. This and the following letter are found in the Jena edition (1579), tona. I, toi. 366 scp; in Löscher's Ref.-Acta, vol. III, p. 649 ff; in the Erlanger, opp. var. tom. IV, 78 8<itz. and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 75 ff. What else might serve as an introduction here is found in the introduction to the 18th volume of the St. Louis edition, p. 386 f.

Translated from Latin.

(1) Although I, dear Martin, most precious brother in the Lord, am unknown to you until now and absent in body, you are known to me, although I have never seen you. For since many and various of your writings come into our hands, from which we can fully recognize you, who and what you are: it happens that we have to admire in you almost only this, that you, among so many enemies of the evangelical truth, nevertheless do not shy away from preaching the doctrine of Christ and the apostles freely and publicly, and do not pay attention to all shame, blasphemy and evil talk of many people, to whom everything that does not look like them must be called heresy, people who have broken senses and are incapable of all good work, who do not understand (as the apostle says [1 Tim. 6,5. Tit. 1, 16. 1 Tim. 1, 7.]), neither what they say, nor what they put. I therefore wish you, dear brother Martin, and your Christian godliness happiness from the bottom of my heart, that you alone in Germany have not been both found and invented, who finally teaches purely what is to be taught, that is, the law of Christ and the pure theology of the ancient fathers in its purity, which is absolutely without all taint of man's statutes, which unfortunately has been very much despised today, and that you also admonish from what Christ's spirit does not approve of, nor perhaps recognize. This is no wonder, since Christ cannot be divided in Himself, nor can He want what He wanted and advised at the time of His preaching.

(2) Therefore I exhort, urge and encourage you, who are already running, by the mercy of Christ, not to neglect the grace of the Lord that is in you for your salvation [1 Tim. 4:14]. God has made you the guardians of His people [Ezek. 3, 17]; what is necessary for this salvation, do not hide, but bring it more and more to light, as you are doing. You know Christ's voice [Matth. 5, 15.]: No one lights a light and hides it under a vessel, or puts it under a bed, but on the lampstand, so that those who come in may see the light. Pursue the enemies of God and the adversaries of the freedom of Christ, as you began, and seize them, of whom it is full everywhere, so much, that already now perhaps Christ's words will be fulfilled, and that very much [Matth. 24, 24.]: "False Christs and false prophets will arise, and do signs and wonders to deceive, where it would be possible, even the elect," and the word of Peter [2. Ep. 2,1. ff.]: "There will be false teachers among you, who will introduce pernicious sects, and many will follow their destruction, and will handle you by avarice with fabricated words." And I do not know whether in Bohemia they are as mean as among you, whose curses and blasphemies you have long since lain upon your heads. O! how truth is now hated, how Christ is so hated everywhere! You, my brother, because you preach Christ and not men, are called heretics not only by your own, but also by some of ours. 1) But, beloved, bear this reproach gladly with Christ, and in the meantime remember what he says in Matthew [Cap. 10:25], "Did they call the father of the house Beelzebub, as rather his household?" Likewise what Lucas Cap. 23, 31. tells us that he said near his end, "If this be done in the green wood, what shall become of the dry?" [Matth. 10, 24. "The disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord." What greater praise can the servant have than to suffer shame and strokes for the Lord's sake? Therefore, my dear brother Martin, be strong in the Lord, and be a mighty hunter of false apostles. Christ, the prince and master of truth, chases the buyers and sellers out of the temple as an example, so that we follow his footsteps. You will not lack help from above. There are many faithful and God-loving people in Bohemia who will help you day and night with their prayers. Only do not let yourselves be lacking. I only ask you to be careful that when you save Christ from the Antichrist, you do not get caught by him. He has a thousand ways to harm, and lies in wait to shoot the upright in secret [Ps. 64:5]. Christ keep you unharmed, my Martin, for whose law you do not shun men and assume great danger. But be of good cheer, the truth will set you free. Farewell and accept these knives graciously as a small gift, as a pledge of sincere love and goodwill among us. Farewell again, and the grace of Christ be with you always. Prague, Saturday after the Apostles' Meeting [July 16], 1519.

1) Compare St. Louis Edition, Vol. VIII, 1130, § 85.

1) Soon after, the Utraquist Consistory in Prague complained to King Louis about the Lutheran preachers that the nobility had (Eri. Briefw.).

423: Wenceslaus Rosdalousky, 2) the head of the Emperor Charles College at Prague, writes to Luther, in which he also congratulates him on the disputation held with Eck, and at the same time sends along a book by Johann Hus.

Translated from Latin.

(1) Since I, my dear Martin Luther, have been thoroughly occupied with your writings 3) and have considered with good friends who you are, what you do and what you start, yes, what the Spirit of God is working through you in the church, behold, a certain organ maker (or organ player, organarius) Jacob, 4) who is very well disposed toward you, has come and told everything that has happened publicly between you and Eck and some other of your enemies at this time. I cannot say, my dear father, how pleasant, how sweet the narration was, and how it pleased me when I heard that you had obtained a glorious victory over the war trumpets of your adversaries, and especially over Eck's more scholastic and Aristotelian than Christ's theology. You and the most illustrious Prince Frederick have been highly praised in this narrative. You, because you prove yourself worthy of admiration, but he, because he honors the virtues of which the greatest proofs are seen in you every day, so that it annoys the enemies, but quite heartily delights your friends and patrons. Is this not more precious than gold? I therefore wish you, venerable father, happiness, and thank God in Heaven that He not only keeps you safe under so much danger and among so many wicked enemies, but also makes you gloriously victorious over the enemies in such a righteous struggle.

By the way, Jacob just said that you would very much like to have the books of John Hus, the apostle of Bohemia, so that you may recognize and judge what kind of man he was and how great, not according to the rumor of the common rabble, nor from the ill-consulted Costnitz Concilium, but from the true image of the mind, namely his writings. I therefore gladly send you, venerable father, from the bottom of my heart a booklet which he wrote about the church.

2) In the Erlanger, correspondence the name is written: "Rozd'alousky".

3) lucudraioni6u8. This will probably be the lucubrationes published by Frobenius in Basel in February 1519.

4) Nothing else is known about this Jacob.

I am all the more confident about this now, because I have read several sentences that you have published and recently defended in Leipzig against old and new errors, which are also approved in this booklet: a small and bad gift at first sight (as they say), but perhaps not entirely unpleasant, especially if it can meet your wishes and desires, and then because this booklet was probably the only one for whose sake he, while still alive, had to suffer all the shame, hatred, cursing and blasphemy of all prelates, in short, as a heretic at last, oh, how unjust! was burned at the Costnitz Concilium, the otherwise innocent man and excellent preacher of the divine word. But enough of that. For I will gladly send you the entire course of his case one day, if it is necessary and you request it, along with many other things. Only this I add with good deliberation: What Joh. Hus was in Bohemia, you, Martin, are now in Saxony. What is therefore necessary for you? Watch and be strong in the Lord, then beware of men; do not despair even if they call you a heretic, if they call you an exile. Then remember what Christ suffered, what the apostles suffered, what all who want to live godly in Christ suffer today. Now be well, my dear Martin, and love me, though I am unknown to you; for, be assured, we love you. Prague, in the great college of Emperor Carl, July 17, 1519.

425 Letter from Joh. Frobenius, printer in Basel, to Luther, in which he informs him of the strong outflow of his writings to France, Spain, Italy, Brabant and England, and at the same time encloses the favorable verdict of the Cardinal of Sion in the Walliser Land about him and the then still future Leipzig disputation with Eck. February 14, 1519.

This letter is found in the Jena edition (1579), tom. I, fol. 367 k; in the Miscelianoa GroniQAonsia, tom. III, p. 60; in the Erlanger, opp. var. arZ., tona IV, p. 82 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. I, p. 420.

Translated into German.

Johann Frobenius wishes Martin Luther Heil!

Blasius Salmonius, a bookseller in Leipzig, presented me at the last fair in Frankfurt 1) with some of your books, which I immediately reprinted because they were approved by all scholars. We have sent six hundred copies to France and Spain. And now they are sold in Paris, also read and approved by the theologians of the Sorbonne, as our friends have assured us. Some scholars there have also said that they have long wished that those who treat the Holy Scriptures would make use of such freedom.

2 The bookseller in Pavia, Calvus, a very learned and scientific man, has had a good number of such books brought to Italy and wants to distribute them in all cities. For he does not seek profit from them, but rather to help the resurgence of godliness and to promote it as much as possible. He has promised to send out from all learned men in Italy short praises which they have made in your honor; so much is he favorable to you and to the cause of Christ, which you take up with such great steadfastness, so manly and honestly.

You may wonder about our edition of your (Augsburg) actions, because it partly coincides with the Wittenberg one, but partly deviates from it. But hear what the cause of this is. One of my good friends sent me your answer from Augsburg given to the Cardinal (Cajetan). This had to be printed, because Calvus, when he returned from Nuremberg, had brought only a single sheet of the Wittenberg edition, namely the first one, which I printed immediately as it was, and appended the rest, which had been sent to me from Augsburg. Now that I have received a copy of the Wittenberg edition through Blasius, I will, as soon as possible, add what is missing in mine. For, as I understand, it has pleased the scholars what you have appended at the end of the compulsion of the decrees. 2)

I have also sent your books to Brabant and England. From the replica of the Silvester I have only three hundred copies printed. The scholars think that it would do you no harm. Here, everyone, depending on how good he is, also thinks highly of you. In particular, our bishop 1) is very fond of you, as is his auxiliary bishop, the bishop of Tripoli. 2) When I offered your work to the Cardinal of Sion, he immediately said: Luther, you are indeed Luther. The other day, someone sent him Eck's sentences and added that he would soon bring news of the victory that Eck would win over the new teachings at Leipzig. To this the Cardinal replied: Eck may argue as much as he wants, Luther writes the truth.

1) In September 1518. Already in October, Frobenius' collection of Lutheran writings was published in Basel.

2) This is Document No. 226 in this volume.

All but ten of my copies have been sold, and I have never experienced a happier sale for any book. The New Testament, which Erasmus has very carefully overlooked and increased with strong additions, I intend to complete with the help of God within ten days. Farewell, venerable father. Basel, 14 February 1519.

426: Letter from Joh. Botzheim (Abstemius), Doctor and Canonicus at Costnitz, March 3, 1520, to D. Matt. Luther, in which he testifies how he is so pleased with his writings that he is quite happy to live at such a time when the thick darkness has been dispelled and the light of pure divine truth has risen brightly again.

From Kcrpp's small Nachlese nützlicher Reformationurkunden, vol. II, p. 420, in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 348.

Translated into German.

To the excellent man, Mr. Martin Luther, the Holy Scripture Doctor and exceedingly vigilant Reformer, his warmly beloved master and patron.

Hail! With short words, the friendship is satisfied, if you can not write more expansive, as it is everything, even what is not even beautiful,

1) Christoph von Uttenheim, resigned 1526, died 1527 (Erl. Briefw.).

2) Telamonius Limpurger, bishop in partibus of Tripoli, who assisted the bishop as auxiliary bishop since 1502 and later formally converted to the Reformation (Erl. Briefw.). - The Cardinal of Sion is Matthaeus Schinner, Bishop of Sion, Cardinal priest, later a staunch opponent of the Reformation.

laid out for the best. Accordingly, I will write briefly what I have in mind. For after you have made friends of the whole world, or at least of the greater part of it, I mean true and righteous Christians, you will also be my friend, whether you want to or not. Your writings please me in such a way that I rejoice over nothing so much as over my kind fate, to which I have to thank that I live at such a time, in which not only the human, but also the theological sciences regain their former splendor. There is no science in the world that has not begun to cast off the defect of gross ignorance in these years. But divine learning, which was supposed to be completely pure before others, was in the thickest darkness. But now you lay your hands on the holy theology, your remedies are the most powerful of all, they heal not only the sciences, but also the souls, which until now have been all too depressed by scholastic opinions. I pray to God that He may make your endeavors happy, and that Christ, who (I have no doubt) inspired them, may promote them. Farewell, from Constance, March 3, in the year 2c. 1520.

Your most devoted

Johann Botzheim Abstemius, 3)

Doctor and canon of Constance.

Urban Regius sends you his greetings, highly learned Martin, whom you should consider all the more faithful a friend, because he was moved to love you not out of rashness, but with good deliberation.

I wish the very learned Philipp Melanchthon well.

427 Caspar Hedio's letter to D. Luther, June 23, 1520, in which he commemorates Luther's teachings and writings with special praise.

From Kapp's Nachlese, vol. II, p. 4x3, in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 422.

Translated into German.

3) The name Abstemius was given to him by his friends because he did not drink wine, did not hunt, did not gamble 2c. In 1524 he was summoned to Rome because of his reformatory attitudes, but he did not appear. In 1525, as it seems, as a result of the Peasants' War, he changed his mind and became a strict papist again (Erl. Briefw.).

To Martin Luther, the true Christian and righteous theologian, his highly honored teacher, Caspar Hedio wishes Heil!

I see that your teaching is from God, beloved man! It cannot be dampened, it becomes stronger day by day; it wins many souls for Christ every day; it leads away from vices and towards true godliness. But what do I call your teaching, which is not Luther's, but Christ's! For I see nothing that you do not treat thoroughly and concisely from Scripture, nothing that does not have its strong and insurmountable foundation in the Word of God. If antiquity was right in saying that a God is he who is useful to men, you may rightly be called a God for us, because you have rendered such an immense service to the whole of Christendom. All honest people who read your writings diligently and grasp them faithfully wish you all the best. Your German books are of great use, because through them the common people, who are very obedient and observant, come to the right judgment, they learn to see the deceit, they wish to be admonished, they recognize the good deed, which is the duty of gratitude. So you must not let up, O helpers, but strive with all your strength to restore to us the easy and gentle yoke of Christ. You should be our leader, we want to be constant warriors, if otherwise we can do something with our services.

I have been able to benefit from this, either in public sermons, which I now preside over, 1) and explain the Gospel of Matthew, or in private conversations with the citizens of Basel, or finally through letters to good friends. The arrival of the excellent Mr. Egranu 2) has been very dear and pleasant to us all. He has told us much about you, dear God, to what great comfort and delight of mind! that I feel as if I see Luther present before me with great desire, and that he is speaking to me in a friendly manner. And, oh, that I would one day have the happiness that I wish to have! At present I do not want to be too burdensome, because you will hear about the studies, about the academy and about the Magistris nostris (M. N.), the theologians, through your Theseus 3).

I want to assure you of one thing, that Hedio will always remain yours. Beloved brother, I wish that it may always be well with you in Jesus Christ, and that you may remember us from time to time. Your letter, however short it may be, will be a treasure. Basel, 1520, June 23.

1) Hedio preached at St. Theodor, where he was vicar, and at St. Martin in Basel on St. Matthew (Erl. Briefw.).

2) Johann Sylvius Egranus, actually Johann Wildenauer from Ezer.

3) Probably Melanchthon, to whom Hedio also seems to have written (Erl. Briefw.).

Translated from Latin.

Grace and peace from our Lord Jesus Christ! It may well surprise everyone that I, most gracious Lord Emperor Carl, may presume to write to your imperial majesty. For who has ever seen or heard of a more unusual, clumsy thing than that the King of kings and Lord of lords on earth should be addressed by the least, most despised of men?

(2) But anyone who diligently considers the greatness of this highly important matter, and understands that it concerns divine truth, will not be surprised at such greatness. For if it is worthy to come before the throne of heavenly, divine majesty, it is much more worthy to address an earthly and mortal prince; Let it be said that, just as earthly princes are a model of the heavenly, so it behooves them to follow the same model, namely, that they too, seated on high, yet look upon the lowly things of the earth, and raise up the lowly from the dust, and lift up the poor from the mire [Ps. 113, 5-7.].

Therefore, I, poor and miserable human being, fall at the feet of your most noble imperial majesty, as the most unworthy one, who brings up the most important and worthy cause.

I have let several little books go out in print, so that I have incurred the envy, wrath and disfavor of many, even great people, since I would have well deserved thanks and twofold protection. First of all, that I was forced to come out against my will; I would also not have intended to write something where my adversaries, both by force and cunning, would not have urged me to do so. Therefore, what I have written, I have done through caused them to do so. For for my person nothing better could have happened to me, as I also desired with all my heart, than that I might have been and remain hidden in my corner or cell.

On the other hand, I have been diligent to bring to light nothing other than the evangelical truth, against the superstitious opinions or delusions of human tradition, to which only my conscience and the judgment of many pious people bear witness. I now suffer almost three whole years of 1) anger, blasphemy, driving and all kinds of evil, without stopping, which my adversaries can only think of.

(6) It helps me nothing, however, that I ask for mercy and forgiveness; it is in vain that I offer to be silent; it has no standing that I propose means of peace; it helps nothing that I desire to be told better. This alone is done, that I, together with the gospel and divine truth, which remains forever, may be destroyed and eradicated.

Since everything I have tried so far is in vain and in vain, I have ultimately considered it good to appeal to the Imperial Majesty, according to the example of St. Athanasius, to see if perhaps the dear God would help his cause through her, not mine. Therefore, O Lord Carol, Prince of Kings on Earth, fall at the feet of your most noble Imperial Majesty, and ask in all humility and submission that they do not want me, but the cause of divine truth (for the sake of which alone E. K. M. of GOD has given me the right to be a part of). K. M. is given by God the power to bear the sword, to avenge the evildoers and to praise the pious [Rom. 13, 4. 1 Petr. 2, 14.]) under the shadow of their wings, and not to protect me in this matter any further, except until I, according to the indicated cause and responsibility of my doctrine, am either recognized that I have won or lost the cause.

If I am then found to be an ungodly man and a heretic, I do not ask for protection. One thing I ask, that neither truth nor falsehood be condemned unheard nor unconquered.

1) Luther could not have written this in January 1520; it confirms the timing we have assumed.

(9) For this is fitting for your royal and imperial throne, adorning their majesty's empire, and giving cause to all descendants to praise and extol the present time of their reign: namely, if your holy majesty does not permit the wicked to devour him who is more pious than he, nor let men (as the prophet says [Habak. 1, 14.]) go like fish in the sea, and worms that have no master, when judgment and contradiction abound.

10 Thus I behold, thus I hope, thus I pledge myself to your holy majesty, which the Lord Jesus upholds and exalts us to the eternal glory of his gospel, amen. Given at Wittenberg, in the year of the Lord 1520. 1)

B. Luther's letter to the bishops of Mainz and Merseburg, and their reply.

429. D. Martin Luther's letter to the Elector of Mainz, Margrave Albrecht, that he should not believe his detractors. Wittenberg, February 4, 1520.

This letter, which Luther wrote at the request of the Elector, is found in Latin in Aurifaber, vol. I, p.233; in the Wittenberger (1551), tom.II, fol. 45; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 398 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 308. German in the Wittenberger (1569), vol.IX, p.896; in the Jenaer (1564), vol.I, p.2146; in the Altenburger, vol. I, p. 345 and in the Leipziger, vol. XVII, p. 292.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To the most reverend in God Father, your most noble Lord, Lord Albrecht, Archbishop of the Churches of Magdeburg and Mainz, Primate of Germany, Margrave of Brandenburg 2c., his most gracious and reverently to be feared Lord and Shepherd in Christ, 2) commends himself in the Lord in all submission and reverence [Martin Luther].

Jesus.

I lowly man, in exceedingly lowly position, would never have dared to high-light.

1) This is followed by the "Erbieten," No. 433.

2) Already here the heading stops in the editions, then "Jhesus" is written in the middle, and the following forms the beginning of the letter.

Most worthy Father in Christ and most noble Prince, to speak out to E. C. F. G., even not by letters (to which much is conceded that one does not take the liberty of doing face to face out of shyness), if I were not compelled by the consideration of a greater cause, namely the confession of the Christian faith and truth and the care for the salvation in Christ common to all: if these are threatened by my cause, then I would be an exceedingly godless man if I remained silent. I have been informed by credible men that disfavor and hatred are also being aroused against me by E. C. F. G., most reverend Father in Christ, perhaps also by those who praise and protect me in others.

Now to speak here with my most gracious Lord according to the confidence of my conscience: Is it not so, that if what I am accused of is false, 3) both I, who am nothing, and you, most reverend father and most noble lord, are in the greatest danger? Once upon a time (as we are human beings) some flatterer Ziba would also turn away the completely innocent David, the chosen man according to the heart of God, from the poor and lame Mephibosheth, as we read in the second book of Samuel, Cap. 16, 3. Which prince can be sufficiently safe from false and treacherous ear-blowers, since David, such a great and holy man, was so deceived by the One Ziba?

Of course, this was not the least cause that I dared to write this letter, because I was aware that I owed you, most reverend father, this diligent and faithful service, that I would not suffer my lord to be exposed to so great a danger, yes, that I would not allow the evangelical truth to be reviled under the name of ungodliness by such a great prince to the great harm of so many people. For it is not the same thing if the truth is spoken evil of by any common man, and by a bishop over so many souls, which-

3) That is, if the accusation is false. We were prompted to make this trivial remark by the fact that the old translator gave the contrast Hiezu thus: "But if my doctrine, about which I am accused, is right and true" 2c.

The truth is that, whether he is rightly reported or deceived, many will necessarily follow him; but to follow against the evangelical truth is the source of all evil.

But if the accusations they bring against me are right and true, the grace of my Lord allows me to complain about my misery. Why do they not teach me better? Why do they not denounce the error? Why do they condemn me before the great ones rather than convict me? Especially since I so often promise that I will give ear to a better one, since I am so ready to renounce my sense, yes, so urgently ask that they remove me from the teaching office and that I be hidden in a corner.

I am forced to teach what I have learned and what I read in the Holy Scriptures, and I am accused because I teach what those either will not or cannot punish. And would to God that my most gracious Lord had so much leisure that he could read or hear my writings; I have no doubt that you, most reverend father, would recognize by God's grace how even their accusations which they have brought against me are groundless. For I have not yet heard that mine has been condemned by anyone, except by those who have neither read it nor heard it, except for a few who not only let their spitefulness remain that they do not read it, but even, when they read some things, immediately falsify them and invent such things against me that I have never even thought of. Such is the case of both forms and of the power of the Roman pope, in which, if they want to confess the truth, they themselves in fact hold it with me, as much as they may pretend to be of a different opinion. He who has read mine will easily recognize this.

Therefore, most reverend Father, I implore you, for the sake of your praised kindness, appreciated by all, towards all good sciences and learned men, you, most reverend and most illustrious Lord, may also consider me worthy of a kinder opinion and a better name than those pretenders seek, not only with regard to me but also to your own salvation and that of many.

of others, indeed, for the sake of Christian truth, which must necessarily be offended if I am unjustly either cast out after having been heard or despised as one who should be instructed and heard.

I call upon Jesus Christ, the Judge of all, as a witness over my soul, that I am not aware that I have taught anything other than what is according to Christ and God's commandments; again, that I am not so stiff-necked that I do not want to be taught and, having recognized my error, change my mind. And yet God wanted me to learn this service from you, most reverend Father. For since I have so far been sought with many lies in various ways, and yet later, after the light of truth has been revealed, I am found innocent, I am compelled to suspect that even those who still and in other ways attack me do not act sincerely, especially since they do not want to instruct the one who is willing to be instructed, but only accuse him.

This, most reverend father and most noble prince, seemed necessary to me to present against either evil or deceived pious people, so that I also aligned my office, who recognize myself as a piece of your army, born and raised in your area, so that through the guilt of my silence a more serious voice is not heard against the soul of my most gracious Lord. May you graciously and patiently recognize this according to your great gentleness, and let my humble self be commended to E. C. F. G., in Christ our Lord, who, most reverend Father and most noble Lord, reigns over you and sustains you forever, amen.

Wittenberg, February 4, 1520.

Your most reverend father, most devoted son
Martin Luther.

430 Answer to Luther's letter from the Elector of Mainz. Dated Calbe, the Feb. 26, 1520.

This letter is found in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 235; in the Wittenberg edition (1551), toni. II, fol. 46 (wrong 56) and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 337.

Translated from Latin.

To the highly honored and to us in Christ beloved clergyman (religioso), Martin Luther, Professor of Theology 2c., wishes Albrecht, by the Grace of God, of the title St. Chrysogoni of the Holy Roman Church PriestCardinal, of the Holy Churches of Magdeburg and Mainz Archbishop, Primate of Germany, Elector, Administrator of Halberstadt, and Margrave of Brandenburg 2c.,

1. salvation in the Lord! We have received. Worthy and spiritual, beloved in Christ, we have received your writing, in which you take pains to warn us that we should not give credence to false flatterers, and you complain most highly that out of envy you are described to us as stiff-necked 2c. But we are particularly pleased that you let us hear you say that you want to be instructed where you would be taught better, and that you are willing to desist from your presumption.

2 Although we confess that out of the duty of our office, the matter concerning our holy Christian faith and godliness is very close to our hearts, we have not yet had so much leisure to read your writings and books (with which now and then many are carried), and even to look at them badly. For this reason, we neither approve nor reject them this time, but entrust such knowledge to those of higher standing and dignity. To whom we then give the honor, and yield to their judgment, who have also recently taken this matter to themselves, to move and discuss it.

(3) But we would heartily desire that some articles of thine, and of others who take up the cause, be dealt with honestly and modestly, as befits God, without any disorder or indignation, without envy and dishonor or blasphemy.

(4) For we experience daily, not without great sorrow in our hearts, with great displeasure that some who publicly claim to be teachers of the Christian religion, who also have a great reputation, argue most vehemently about their petty opinions and questions, namely about the authority of the pope, whether he is the head of the Christian churches from the Word of God or from the order of men? about free will and other such things (so that a true Christian does not worry much), as about a matter in which the pope is the head of the Christian churches.

The result is that each one fiercely defends his delusion with great pride and presumption, not without his opponent's great iniquities and disgrace. It follows from this mischief that many useless and overly presumptuous opinions are spread among the common fickle and unintelligent rabble, by which they are not without great danger aroused to disobedience, so that they finally persist in it.

(5) Moreover, other things are imagined by the common people, not without great annoyance, contrary to the custom long ago adopted by the church of Christ by public authority, such as the use of the reverend sacrament, since it was better to administer it under both forms, without distinction, to both laymen and priests. About this, we hear from some that they also hold the authority of the common conciliation in low esteem and despise it, so that they may preserve and defend their delusion and opinion all the more strongly.

(6) Whether such things and the like, which are done either by you or by others, are useful, beneficial to the Christian faith and conducive to the church, so that it remains pure and unoffending in its former dignity, peace and tranquility, as before, we cannot at all see.

(7) This disorderly nature could perhaps be recognized and put down in a more convenient place and at the best time by scholars, especially by those who are commanded to discuss this matter, with ease, without burden and danger, indeed with great benefit, without arousing disobedience and envy, moreover also without annoyance of the common rabble, also without some people's injuries and disgrace, because it is acted so carelessly among unlearned people and the wild, insolent rabble.

8. but that you continue to pretend that you teach the truth as you have read and learned it in the holy Scriptures, we cannot punish, but provided you do so with godliness and meekness, not with reproach and blasphemy, not arousing nor giving cause for disobedience to the common power and authority of the church.

9. if you comply with this, your counsel or work is from God and will undoubtedly be praiseworthy and beneficial, and that I speak to you as Gamaliel spoke to the Jews in Acts 5:38 will remain firm. 5, 38. with the Jews, will remain firm, so that no one will be able to dampen it. But if your work is out of envy, presumption and pride, to revile and blaspheme others, it is certainly out of men, and will easily perish by itself. For we know that that no one has ever gone without certain blessings, if he has abused God's graces and benefits, and has set himself against the truth and God Himself. May the same God grant to us, to you and to all Christians, that we may act justly and sincerely. Fare well in Christ. Given at Calbe, February 26, Anno 1520.

431 D. Mart. Luther's letter to the Bishop of Merseburg, Adolph, with the same content, dated Feb. 4, 1520.

This letter is found in Latin in Aurifaber, vol. I > p. 237; in dex Wittenberg edition (1551), vol. II? p. 466; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 401 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 311. German in the Wittenberger (1569), vol. IX, p. 91 d; in the Jenaer (1564), vol. I > p. 216; in the Altenburger, vol. I, p. 350 and in the Leipziger, vol. XVII, p. 295.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To the venerable in Christ Father and Lord, Lord Adolph, Bishop of the Church at Merseburg, his exceedingly kind and especially gracious Lord,
1) Martin Luther commends himself in all submission and reverence.

JEsus.

I have been informed, most reverend Father in Christ, most noble Prince, 2) how badly I am talked about in front of others among you, most reverend Father, because of some who, whether out of zeal for God or driven by another attitude, carry out everything that is mine in a different way than they wanted yours to be carried out by someone: therefore I have not been able to take into consideration, neither your highness nor my lowliness, that I should not have dared to come before the throne of E. F. G. with this letter. F. G. with this letter. And this for no other reason, lest my conscience should one day torment me, if, on account of my silence, either the truth were in danger there or the salvation of men, where it should be most certain and certain.

For if what they charge me with is false, it is not believed without danger, because all those who believe such pretenders are turned away by this faith in an ungodly way from the faith of Christ, whose falsely charged truth they consider to be a lie.

And it is not difficult that 'even princely men are deceived by the exceedingly apparent flattering compunction, since David, the exceedingly righteous king, seduced by the One Flatterer Ziba, raged against Mephibosheth [2 Sam. 16, 3. f.], and Jehoshaphat, a pious king, could not be dissuaded even by the right prophet Micah, that he, carried away by the multitude and reputation of the false prophets, went with the godless king Ahab to the precipice of danger [1 Kings 22:11 ff].

But if what they tell me is true, it is astonishing, even lamentable, that no one can be found who would deign to teach me, since I have so often promised that I would be taught better and change my mind. Yes, to this day I wish to be able to step out of the public and leave the teaching office, which is extremely dangerous both with God and with people. I know that I do not live what I teach, and therefore I am weary of this office: so much is lacking in it that I should seek honor, as many impose upon me. Therefore I dare to call the Lord Jesus Christ, the future Judge, as a witness over my soul, that I neither know nor can teach other than what I have taught. I am also not aware that I have ever taught anything that is not according to Christ and God's commandments, and no one has ever convicted me of anything else.

What therefore shall I do? Profit is not sought, and if I sought it, I could not find it in the face of so much hatred of many, much less honor in the face of such evil rumors about me. I would truly be the most senseless of all men who have ever been, if I pursued these things, for whose sake I continue to suffer harm instead of gain, dishonor for honor, censure, violence and death instead of enjoying protection and life. If I were mistaken, after these evils, I would also have to go through the eternal fire. Although such a stubborn person might be found, I hope to be of a different mind, at least in that I am a teacher against my will and serve the ministry of the word. For those who seek honor as stubborn people do not teach unwillingly.

1) Here, as in the letter to the archbishop of Mainz, the word "Jhesus" is inserted in the middle and the following is drawn to the beginning of the letter.

2) Bishop Adolph was Prince of Anhalt, of the older Zerbst line, which died out with him in 1526.

This, venerable Father in Christ, I write to your Reverence with confidence, first, because I take many things for granted because of your innate goodness, which I know well and in which I have absolute confidence that it will receive this writing of mine graciously; Secondly, because I believe that I would be guilty if I left your reverence alone among these false tongues that do evil against me, indeed, if I did not stand by the evangelical truth, which may be evil spoken of for my sake. I have not yet heard of those who have read and condemned what is mine, except for a few who can be assumed to be moved by envy, namely from the fact that they have so often been found to have invented their lies against me, even under the holy name of the Roman Pontiff. For what should they not be subject to, who, under the name of the pope, cite me with false breviaries, admonish me, accuse me, condemn me, declare me a heretic?

This, however, awakens in me the belief that what is mine is wholesome and right, that those who are with foreign nations and do not adhere to either party, the most astute and learned people, wish me very much happiness; I firmly believe that this would also happen to your reverence if she had leisure before business to either read or hear my writings.

Therefore, since I cannot be injured, unless the truth is injured at the same time, if I am rejected when I am heard, or despised when I want to hear (for what more can I do than to promise to give ear to a better, if that is not good in which I am heard): therefore, Reverend Father, I have wished to render you my due service by this letter, lest my Lord by a Ziba or a false prophet Zedekiah [1 Kings 22,

11. ff.] and after such a great bishop's example very many would have the same opinion, and so I would allow by my silence that, admittedly not my good name, but Christ's honor would be profaned. Then I humbly and with all my strength wanted to ask you, reverend father, to let my fewness be commanded by your grace, and, if you know or believe that I have erred somewhere, to fatherly rebuke me and denounce the error.

For the fact that they make such a great point about the authority of the pope and about both forms of the sacrament against me, I am certain that their own conscience bears witness to me, and that in this matter there is no discord among us, except in the name alone. But God will also put an end to these things; He will preserve and govern you, Reverend Father, for eternity, Amen. Given at Wittenberg, February 4, in the year 1520.

Your Reverend Poor Intercessor Brother Martin Luther.

Translated from Latin.

JEsum Christum, who is a lover of love and peace, in greeting!

Worthy father and respectable doctor, I received and read your writing last night, and I do not deny that I have often been sad for you and for your sake, since I have heard through many, even great people's letters and announcements, how the simple people, even some of those who are entrusted to my care (as the least of all), have in part fallen into remorse from the writings that have recently come to light about the use of the reverend sacrament.

2, Nor do I see at all what use is made of the spiteful jabs of violent attacks that are interspersed everywhere.

3 Whether your writings and books please some in foreign lands, and whether they are according to the teaching of Christ, I will let others judge.

I wish with all my heart that you and all others who are teachers of the Christian religion would not stab each other so much with poisonous thorns, but rather lead them neatly out of a zeal of divine love.

(5) I also cannot grasp the cause of such great hatred against the pope; indeed, I have a great displeasure with it. Also, you know very well the audacity with which you are making such a statement, and with what kind of an ear one may pass over it.

In my opinion, according to your great skill, you could have written something more conducive to love and salvation instead of these things.

(7) I exhort you, therefore, to do this now and at all times, and to cease from reproach and abuse, and even to speak it.

(8) But what further you desire to be told in your writing, and request that you hear and be instructed, I will, because this cannot well be done in writing, deal with you more extensively in both our presences, since perhaps one day an opportunity will present itself for us to speak to one another, by the grace of Christ.

Fare well and be blessed in Jesus Christ, who is the lover of peace, for whose sake you should temper your pen. Given at Merseburg, February 25, 1520.

To the venerable Brother Martin Luther, Augustinian, professor of sacred theology at Wittenberg, for his own hands.

6 Luther's printed protestation and public offer of inheritance.

433. Luther's Protestation and Erbieten, in which he testifies that he has knowingly written and taught nothing but divine truth, is an obedient son of the Christian church, and will willingly remain silent if he can before his adversaries. Printed at the end of August 1520.

This "Erbieten" was written at the same time as Luther's letter to Emperor Carl (Document No. 428). Luther wrote both documents at the behest of the princely court, so that the newly elected emperor, who was now

The Reformation was to be crowned. Although there is no explicit testimony to this, it can be concluded that Luther sent both documents to Spalatin, through whom the Elector mostly communicated with Luther, for correction and a more refined, i.e. diplomatic, formulation. On August 23, 1520, Luther wrote to Spalatin (annex in this volume, no. 57): "Behold, I send you the 'Erbieten' (eloKion) and the letter to the emperor for correction," the next day: "I believe that my letter with the Erbieten and the other things has reached you. You, I beg you, take care that you smooth everything with a careful file," and on the last of the month: "I send you the printed hereditary offer and the letter to Franz Sickingen and to Emperor Carl." The letter to Sickingen had been sent by Luther to Spalatin for his disposal. In Sickingen's answer to it, dated November 3, 1520 (No. 492), it says: "I have received your last letter here in Cologne, have read it together with your posted apology and offer of inheritance, and have also heard Magister Georgen Spalatin's offer." Spalatin's "request" must have been that Sickingen hand over Luther's letter (No. 428) to the Emperor, with whom he was in special favor. From what has been said, it follows that the date added to the letter in all Latin editions (except Weimar's), "January 17, 1520," is wrong, and that it was written and published towards the end of August.

There are two significantly different redactions of the "Erbieten". One will be Luther's handwritten draft (No. 434), the other the form produced by Spalatin's assistance and approved by the court, which was then printed in the last days of August, our writing. The first printing has the title: "Doctor Martinus Luther Augustiners Erbieten." 2 leaves in quarto. The Weimar edition then describes three reprints. After that, the "Erbieten" is included in "Martini Luthers mancherley büchlin vnnd tractetlin" from October 1520, namely (because the printer had received it too late) before the preface. On it in Cyprians deorZii Spalatin! 'nnal68 kekorinutionis, 1718, p. 7. Further, in the Wittenberger (1554), vol. VII, p. 97; in the Jenaer (1564), vol. I, p. 339b; in the Altenburger, vol. I, p. 343 (a translation of the Latin text); in the Leipziger, vol. XVII, p. 290 (the same); in the Erlanger, 1. Äusl., Vol. 24, p. 9, second ed., Vol. 24, p. 12, and in the Weimar, Vol. VI, p. 480. The Erbieten is also printed in Latin, together with Luther's letter to Emperor Carl. We have already given the title at No. 428. In the collective editions: in the Wittenberg (1551), torn. II, lob 44; in the Jena one (1566), torn. II, col. 255 (wrong 257), in the Erlanger, opp. var. ar^h, tönn V, p. 4 and in the Weimarsche, vol. VI, p. 482. According to Walch, we have retained Spalatin's text, here and there improved according to the Weimarsche AusgaM

Before the Imperial Diet at Worms, on January 25, 1521, Luther again sent the Elector a printed copy of the "Erbieten" with the promise to do and leave everything he could with God and Christian honor. Whether this is the document that Emperor Carl, according to Aleander's report, tore up and threw to the ground is still in question (Weim. Ausg.). Compare Brieger, Quellen und Forschungen, 1st volume, 1st section, p. 55.

JEsus.

I, Martin Luther, Augustinian, deprive all those who will read or hear my writing of the grace of the Almighty God and my poor prayer, and I have no reason to know that, after what has come to light through my books, I have incurred the displeasure, disfavor, wrath, and displeasure of many people. Thus, for almost three years, I have endlessly and ceaselessly suffered persecution, abuse, driving, and all the evil that my opponents might think and imagine, seeing that I have gladly, and against my will, given myself up to them, And not otherwise, than by the other's consent, painted, and urged by the other's urging, have I written, all that I have written, 1) and nye nothing more serious and lesser desired, than that I, as a man who has passed, may remain in a Winckel secretly and unknown.

Also, that I with God the Almighty, and my conscience, may testify truthfully, and with much righteous, Christian, High Gelarians, and understanding people, that I may never otherwise resolve, and be vindicated, as I would not like to do otherwise, than to give the evangelical, divine truth against the doubtful, unbelievable opinion, 2) error and misconception of human law and order, yes, of the constitutional, ferocious order. Then God knows that I should be heartily sorry if I should act unchristianly with my will and my deeds, or if I should teach, preach, scream, speak at all in the church or in school, which would be contrary to God and the soul. In addition to this, I have offered myself at times as a faithful, obedient son of the Holy Christian Church, which I, by the grace of God, want to "die", if I want to, for the sake of my own repugnant knowledge and desire.

and to stand in judgment, to "learn" and be taught better and more Christian mayuug from the holy scriptures, to allow myself to be heard in public disputation, to be recognized by all unrighteous university judges, by the same spiritual and secular judges, on a free, safe and sufficient basis, to come forward willingly and humbly, and to accept their interrogation and judgement, and if, after a reasonable referral, I am able to do so, with the best foundation of the Holy Scriptures, I have been found guilty and convicted, I will only allow myself, and my offer, to speak truthfully, to praise God all the time, and for the good, comfort and salvation of common Christianity, according to my oath and duty, as a poor doctor of the Holy Scriptures, to obediently refrain from any search for God's praise, benefit and advantage. But all this is considered so futile and unfruitful by my opponents, that they have accused me of being a heretic, a detractor of Christianity, an angry, discreditable, erroneous, cursing, and of many other ways, secretly and publicly, that I have forgiven them all from the bottom of my heart. Therefore, for God's sake, I ask you to consider that I am once again of my former will and desire, and that I am aware of the offence of hatred and evil, and whether I have hitherto written too earnestly or scoldingly for the sake of your concern, or whether I would also write to you to kindly forgive me for it; Considering that all this has happened, and is still happening, all for the sake of Christianity, and not for the sake of my praise or enjoyment, and that I have been so highly and noticeably wronged by manifold, shameful, and unfortunate things, vnfounded, vnskillful, vnchristian, God's lesterly screaming of my counterpart, and to have excused myself, where I am carried into it in other ways, for God's sake. This I am, above divine emphasis, willing to do for the sake of them all, and one in particular, with my poor commandment toward God. May God's will be done on earth as it is in heaven. AMEN.

434 Handwritten draft of the foregoing inheritance. August 1520.

From Luther's own manuscript in Cyprian's Useful Documents, vol. I, p. 493; in the Supplement to the Leipzig edition, p. 115; in the Erlanger, 1st ed. vol. 24, p. 12; 2nd ed. vol. 24, p. 14; and in the Weimar, vol. VI, p. 476. The latter says: "This text bears a sharper stamp of Luther's own character" than the print.

Jhesus.

To anyone who reads or listens to this book, I declare Martin Luther Augustine, called Doctor of the Holy Scriptures, as I have now three years ago offered myself for trial and interrogation, that my matter had been put before the disputation and several universities, and that as far as I was able, I was glad to have found out about the past, that I had the trust and the love to reprove and to keep quiet. All this has been done by common man's cunning and wickedness, and it is not yet open to eyes to tear me more and more into deceit. Then I may say on my conscience that I have never yet conceived anything of the papacy or of all its powers: it would all have remained the same, had not the nepotism and honor pretended to obtain a prize from me. I am by all means, and as many adversaries as I am so greatly offended. Now that they no longer know me, they "drop the matter" and begin to revile my life, saying that I am peyssig, vengeful, and many other names. Now it is not my intention to measure or protect my life and my family (of which I myself am too unaware). Yes, I had provided that I should be placed among the learned men of understanding, and that I should assume such a name as that of which a man would know himself better, for I had wanted, with divine help, to have acted more preciouslly in my life. Now I see that my own great contempt, which I have all judged to dismiss me quickly from my fiefdoms, is not measured at all correctly, and the great fiefdoms, which I do not dispute, have by such nerrish humiliation and my contempt been used to the detriment of my good lere (which I have not provided myself with). For this reason, I ask all my friends and friends, who still want to rebuke me, and where I have been too busy, I have to put on the best. Considering that I have had to fight all those who have jumped out of no fox, rams, as many as large, learned, ruthless people, at my will. It should not be surprising that so many reyssewolves bark at a dog, and also bark at it. I have also barked at one with the same measure that I measured with. I also offered to listen to and accept the best of all: then I, that God knows, would not like you to act unchristian, or to learn, speak and scream, that God, and he, would be blessed. But if I do not want to be left in peace and reprimanded, I ask that no one may cause me to be tired or weary: Then God will give me my heart, so that I may be weary before the whole world. My foundation, on which I build, will stand firm, and my heart will not waver nor sink, even though all the infernal gates there are rams, that I know for certain.

It doesn't matter to me that some of them give my school, I want to presume greater art than all the world has, and all of them are lux mundi. If I had been left in my own home, they would have been good for my remaining master of Israel, and I would have been what I was. The Christian warheytt stood one time on St. Panel: But one time on St. Athanasii, item on St. Augustini: Yes it has one time eyne Eselynnne Widder the Propheten geredt. Who knows what God wants to do through us. He is the same God who, though we may be sinners, must remain his creature, and is terrible in his judgments of men.

I have laid it down for the good opinion of the man, that he should guard himself against evil, and against hatred and envy. I am very humble and honest, and I do not want anyone to be afraid of my hatred or disfavor, because my courage is too good and too great for me to be kind to anyone. Nor have I anything for eyes, for the matter of the marriage to yourself, which I hold in my heart: and if for your sake I am too willing or would be too free and fresh, I will freely give it to you. I know him no more to do. May God's will be done on earth as it is for you. Amen.

The second section of the sixth chapter.

Like D. Eck, after taking bad honor from the Leipzig disputation, set out and traveled to Rome.

436: D. Joh. Eck's letter about his legation and action against Luther in Rome. Dated May 3, 1520.

This letter, which was published in Latin in Wittenberg in a single print, has the heading: "Letter of Johann Eck, the Papal See's nuncio, as he writes, Against his will. Copied from his handwriting, which will show how true the letter is that he wrote from Leipzig to Wittenberg, in which he says that he took upon himself the office of the legation against Luther against his will. It is found in Latin in the Wittenberg (1551), torn. II, col. 48; in the Jena (1579), toiri. I, toi. 473 k and in the Erlanger, opp. vur^A. arK., torn. I V, p. 256. German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 94; in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 223k; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 357 and in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p. 303. Johann Fabri is named as the recipient of the letter by the Weimar edition. In the old German editions, the marginal glosses are missing, which probably proves that they do not come from Luther.

Hail and all welfare! When I traveled to Rome, venerable Lord Vicari,^a) John Ulrich, your relative, came to me on the way, so both came to Rome fresh and healthy at the same time. There I presented my booklet, which I wrote about the Primacy and Superiority of Peter,^b) to our most holy Father Pabst; but how graciously and kindly his Holiness has let himself be heard towards me,^c) likewise also the most reverend Cardinals, I would rather indicate to you now than write about it in silent letters.

a) Vicari. Note, here he used the old vocative violari in Latin and made it himself, since it is not common.

- b) Petri written. However, this will probably never see the light of day.
- d) have them interrogated. This is how one murderer talks to another.

2 This papal bull^d) against Luther has now been briefly drafted and conceived, and will be executed in the next council of the Cardinals. And if papal holiness will follow my, the Eck's, advice,^e) by sending the bull in Germany, all cardinals and bishops^f) will undoubtedly agree to it and sign themselves. Truly, it has been good and highly necessary,^g) that I have just now come to Rome; otherwise you would have known little about Luther's erroneous and seductive teaching^h). You shall hear from me in due time at our meeting all that I have done in this matter. ⁱ)

- d) The papal bull. The papal bull is called minutu by him in Latin. And so he rightly calls it something contemptible. For what is more contemptible than a papal bull?
- e) my, the corner's, council. Certainly, such a gentleman had to have such a counselor.
- f) all cardinals and bishops. Namely, so that Luther would be overcome by the number of votes.
- g) would have been necessary. Otherwise, it would have been over for the papists.
- h) erroneous and seductive doctrine. Namely, that the corner should or can be judge.
- i) had acted. And nevertheless he writes to the University of Wittenberg that the order had been imposed on him against his will.

Pontifical Holiness, two Cardinals, a Doctor from Hispania and I, have been together for almost five hours, and there have not had the same concerns and advice; it was also requested that each one in particular indicate his opinion and discretion. ^j)

- j) and discretion. It has been only a dazzle, and the others have been abused, that it has been desired of them to indicate their opinion and discretion.

4. the form of the bulla^k) will please pious people,^l) as I see myself, because it gives much and manifold information about custom and habit, both of the old and new conciliarities,^m) also of popes; besides that, also about the

The forty-one errors of Luther are explicitly condemned inside. ⁿ⁾)

- k) The form of the bulla. The bulla is also nothing more than a mere form, that is, a dazzle and sham.
- l) pious people. Namely, that one has already tuned according to the bull.
- m) new concilia. He even rightly invokes the new concilia.
- n) be condemned. But who are those who condemn them?

5 As far as my parish^o) at Ingolstadt is concerned, I could justifiably receive nothing, as I am reported by my good friends, if I were not to receive it by papal authority.

- o) my parish. See the Christian intention from which Eck came to Rome.

Now, however, Papal Holiness both for their person willingly 1) and with great earnestness,^p) also through the intercession of many most reverend Cardinals, graciously and fatherly offered,^q) not to let me go from then on, unless I was completely assured and satisfied for the sake of the parish. Yes, he also let himself be heard not only to leave it at that, but also to graciously give me more and greater gifts. ^{r)})

- p) with great seriousness. Here it is written in Latin: per suuur peetus, for the pope sets before himself nothing but holy things in his heart.
- q) offered. As the high priest Caiphas offered Judah thirty pieces of silver to betray Jesus. Matth. 26,15.
- r) to graciously bestow. How much more generous Leo is than Caiphas!

Yesterday I talked and acted in all sorts of ways with our most holy Father Pope about Luther's matter, reported to His Holiness and indicated what the Cardinals, who were drawn to this matter to discuss it, had done; I will also ask His Holiness tomorrow,^s) and actually inquire on the day when a consistory is to be set up again.

- s) Request holiness. Here Eck praises himself.

8. from Rome^t) I have heard evil things, as I now see and experience. But if something evil happens here, it has therefore a greater reputation, that from all places, as far as Christianity reaches, the basic soup^u) of all vice and stank of the worst boys is found here.

- t) From Rome. Note here Eck's gratitude for such a fat parish.

- u) the basic soup. Note here his own words: Rome is the basic soup of all vices and stank of the worst boys, who are found there from all countries, as far as Christianity reaches.

(9) Things are much more gruesome and terrible at the Roman court, as can now be seen at the bishops' courts in Germany, as well as at the courts of many princes^v) However, so that I do not praise Rome too much, I will leave it at that until I come to you again from Rome. For it would be a great disgrace if you were to promise and destroy that which you have previously praised.

- v) Courts are used to happen. Note its proof that it happens elsewhere as well.

I would like you to give Urban my letter to read. ^{w)}) If I could be helpful to your cause, I would gladly do so. So much I hear, if I desired a reservation, even if it concerned a good summa, I would not be denied it. But I do not want to get involved in such an evil matter^x). Farewell, and be greeted very diligently. Given from Rome, May 3, 1520.

- w) to read. That is not Eck's habit, that he lets others read his letters, except when it pleases him.
- x) into such evil thing. How pious must not Rome be, which promises evil things? And how true does not Eck speak herewith when he praises this city?

I cannot write enough how graciously and favorably some Cardinals^y) show themselves against me, especially Cardinal St. Crucis, Anconitanus, Aginensis, St. Quatuor, Jacobitanus, St. Sixti, de Salviatis, Campegius 2c.

- y) Some cardinals. Does any ruler or Pharisee believe in him? But the people who know nothing of the law are accursed. Joh. 7,48.

Luther's thoughts on this in a letter to Johann Lang.

See Appendix, No. 56.

C. About the correspondence of Valentin Teutleben with Chursachsen, which was conducted during the stay of D. Eck in Rome and was quite dangerous for Luther, and what the Pope himself, as well as the Cardinal St. Georgii wrote to Chursachsen.

438: Elector Frederick of Saxony's reply to Valentin Teutleben dispatched to Rome, as he had so far given Luther no encouragement at all, and had also let him answer for his teachings himself; just as he would have liked to see Luther leave his lands long ago, Luther had also wanted to do this, if Miltitz had not been against it. Sept. 1, 1520.

This letter is found in Latin in the Wittenberg edition (1551), torah. II, tot. 49; in the Jena (1566), torn. II, iol. 2551) and in the Erlangen, opp. var. ur[^], tora.v, x>. 7. German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 93; in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 222; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 352 and in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p. 297. In all with the incorrect date "den 1. April." Because the letter mentions the "printed hereditary offer" (No. 433), it must be placed either in the last days of August or later. We assume that 8spt. was read in Xpr.; according to this, our time determination. See Weimar edition, vol. VI, 475 f.

Dear faithful! That you write, since it might be the case that these and other our matters and affairs would be troublesome to the most holy father, the pope, and would remain stagnant and unpromoted, that in your opinion all this is to be attributed to the immodesty and presumption of Doctor Martin Luther, because he, as you say, I do not know what new doctrine he has spread against Papal Holiness and the Holy See and Church at Rome, and has not shown and humbled himself against the most venerable lords, the Cardinals, with due modesty and reverence, and is especially protected, promoted and graciously held by us, as the common rumor should testify 2c.

2 Recently, in your gracious opinion, we do not want to reassure you that we have never undertaken or undertaken to promote or defend Doctor Martin Luther's teachings and writings for us with our authority and reputation, as we still do not do today. For we do not presume to judge what he has done rightly or wrongly, taught Christianly or otherwise, and still teaches.

3 Although we cannot and will not deny that we nevertheless hear how this man's teaching is considered and approved by many scholars and persons of understanding to be godly and Christian, we nevertheless leave this in its value. And just as we do not prejudge anyone, nor pass judgment on his teaching, so we leave him, as the master, free to defend his teaching himself on his own merits, especially because this whole matter is now placed on a right and proper footing.

In accordance with the recognition to which he has subjected himself, so that he has offered to appear obediently before Papal Holiness Commissars, who has been chosen for this purpose, on a reasonable condition, namely on sufficient assurance and escort, to show cause for everything that he has taught and written; also with attached, superfluous, submissive and obedient protestation, since he has reported and taught other and better things from God's words about the smallest part of his doctrine, and has been convicted and overcome of some error with true testimonies of the holy Scriptures, then he will gladly let go of his opinion, change it and revoke it; as can be seen from the note! of his Protestation or Erbietend, 1) which he has publicly printed.

(4) Although there are not sufficient reasons, after he has thus offered himself, to lay out something further and difficult about it, we have, before and before the matter comes to this condition and means, also had this done with him, D. Martin Luther, and have brought it about that he has offered and promised to leave our lands and university voluntarily. And he would have been ready to do so, if the papal legate, Carol von Miltitz, had not interfered, and had sought us with many requests, and had urged us not to let him come from us. For he feared that if such a thing happened, Doctor Luther would go to the Oerter, where he would be much freer and safer to write and act as he wished, than he had been until now, when he would still have had to shy away from us and our university. In order to prevent this, it is considered more advisable to keep him with us. And for these and other many reasons we should, in our opinion, be so well excused by everyone that no one should have reason to have any bad suspicions against us, much less to complain about us with secret slander and false blasphemy.

Therefore, we are confident that our affairs will not be hated or hindered by papal sanctity. For we may well say with truth and certainty, and we highly trust, that nothing more distressing, painful and painful 2) can happen to us, than that during our life and government, and under our protection, some damaging or harmful events can happen to us.

1) Document No. 433.

2) In the Wittenberg: "Werfers"; in the Jena: "weersers". In Latin only: triktius st aosrdius.

The first thing we have done is to confirm and root the errors that have been spread. As we have written such our mind in writings to the most reverend Cardinal St. Georgii, our dear Lord and friend, after the length, and have given him to recognize.

(6) However, for the sake of the common kinship of the fatherland, with which we may act more freely, we do not want to keep this from you, as our countrymen, which we note and hear from the common speeches of the people; namely, that many good people say for certain that Doctor Martin Luther, as it is said that he publicly confesses both in writing and orally, did not come to these controversial matters and disputations from the papacy intentionally or willfully, but against his will, and was even dragged to them by D. Eck with his hair and often provoked and provoked by some writings that publicly went out against him in Rome and elsewhere. Eck by the hair, and often provoked and irritated by several writings that have gone out publicly against him in Rome and elsewhere, and forced him to answer. Since they would have been satisfied, these things, which are now being discussed, would never have been brought up, but would have remained completely silent and buried.

(7) And because Germany now has many fine, skillful, learned and understanding people, experienced in all kinds of languages and arts, and now also the laity are beginning to become wise, to have a desire and love for the holy Scriptures, to recognize them rightly, many people think that it is very much to be worried and feared, if such a cheap condition and means, to which D. Luther offered himself, were to be avoided, and if he were to be beaten only with censures and banishment without rightful recognition. Luther has offered, would be neglected, and he, without rightful recognition, would be beaten with censures of the church and banishment alone, this quarrel and dispute would become much more violent and greater, so that the matter could not well be settled and brought to peace afterwards.

8. For Luther's doctrine is already so deeply rooted in many hearts in Germany that if it were not refuted with righteous and consistent arguments, reasons, and public, bright testimonies of Scripture, but were to be proceeded with and continued solely with the terror of church power to suppress it, it would not proceed in this way (as it is thought to do), but would arouse great, violent anger in Germany, and arouse terrible, cruel, harmful, and pernicious uproar; which would not benefit the most holy father, the pope, or others in any way.

(9) This we have, as both the church and the kingdom of common lands and people's welfare.

and would like to receive it with all my heart, for the answer, you 1) gracious opinion do not want to leave unindicated, and are inclined to you with grace. Date at Torgau, the first of September 2) Anno 1520.

439 Pope Leo X's letter to Elector Frederick of Saxony, in which he flatters him and requests that he either bring Luther to recant or imprison him for singing; he also reports that he had a congregation of cardinals examine Luther's abominable teachings and condemn them in a bull, a copy of which he sends along. Rome, July 8, 1520.

Translated from Latin.

Beloved Son, salvation and apostolic blessing!

1. Since it has come to us, through the testimony of honorable, honest people, that you, noble Lord, out of great special wisdom and godliness to the highest God, and right faith in him, and out of innate noble nature, from your forefathers (who always bore a special inclination towards the Roman Church and this Holy See), you have always been displeased and displeased with the (unjust) evil behavior of Martin Luther, the child of wickedness, and have never been helpful or favorable to him: We were very pleased to hear this from you, so that this message almost increased the rumor of your praiseworthy virtue, which was known to us before, and made our fatherly love for you greater.

But we cannot conclude for ourselves whether we should attribute this praiseworthy deed to your wisdom or godliness. For it is a sure indication of an excellent, special wisdom in you, that you know and recognize that this raging man, out of pure ambition, which does not rhyme at all with his profession, so obeys and

1) In the German editions: "auch"; Latin: vo5i8.

2) This is our Conjecture. In our template:Kalend. April.

He calls for humility, he agitates anew the old heresies of the Vilefites, Hussites, Bohemians, long ago condemned by the general church, he attaches the common rabble to himself, he gives the simple hearts cause to sin by wrong understanding of the Scriptures as he interprets them, he perverts and rejects the bond of chastity and innocence, but especially confession and repentance of the heart by unspiritual loose talk. Moreover, he who also holds with the Turk and complains that the heretics who received their punishment were wronged; in sum, he who presumes to mix the highest with the lowest.

(3) Yes, we say, that you certainly know that this man is not sent by Christ, but by the wretched Satan, who has got into such great pride and nonsense and is so exalted that he is allowed to say and write publicly: he does not want to believe the holy doctors' writings, nor the general conciliar commandments, nor the Roman bishops' statutes, but only him and his discretion or delusion; which presumption no heretic has ever submitted to.

4 Therefore, noble lord, you do very wisely that you have despised the fellowship of this harmful and poisonous man, who truly, as you can well judge, is a great stain on the noble house of Saxony, but especially on the German nation.

5. but to your godliness is to be ascribed this, that you never did not approve of some of his so great errors, but rather resisted them; that therefore no one is given cause by you to depart from the old and long-continued custom and order of the Christian faith, so much preserved a hundred years ago by the Holy Spirit.

Since we have heard this from you, and, as we have reported, it has come to us through much testimony, we have not only praised you for ourselves, but have also made known these praiseworthy deeds of yours to many brave, excellent men, and have unanimously exalted and praised your noble way with due praise in the Lord Christ, and have thanked the same Lord that through you and others he has put such obstacles in the way of and in opposition to the ungodly ways of the shameful, blasphemous man.

7 We have also been patient with him for a long time, because we wanted and hoped that he would improve. But since neither our gentleness nor fatherly exhortation will do anything for him, nor will it help, there is a great danger that a mangy dog will not get into trouble.

If the sheep poisoned a large part of the Lord's flock and also made them mangy, we have a sharp remedy at hand.

(8) As we have called together the holy assembly of our reverend brethren, the Cardinals and other men in spiritual rights, as well as all those who are very well practiced and experienced in divine Scripture, we have well considered and investigated the matter, and finally, by the help of the Holy Spirit, who in such matters is for and for advisable and helpful to this Holy See, we have made this decree, written it in a document according to the apostolic manner, and provided it with a leaden 1) bull.

9. In which Scripture, according to our command, out of many, indeed almost innumerable errors of this erring man, these are neatly listed, which in part of all things are heretical, and pervert the right faith; But in part, where the bonds of obedience, chastity and humility are torn in the simple hearts, they provoke and entice to all kinds of trouble and evil; but which this perverse man, out of gall and bitterness of shameful hatred, has poured out against this holy See, God, not we, shall be the judge.

10. We are sending you, noble Lord, a copy of this scripture printed in our holy city, so that, when you have diligently investigated the errors of this servant of the devil, you may first remind and admonish him, as written in the scripture out of apostolic meekness, that he should drop his disobedient and proud courage and return, so that he may be helped when he has recanted his blasphemous errors; for he shall experience God's grace and our goodness.

If, however, he persists in his raging nonsense, and the deadline is over, as expressed in the above-mentioned print, you would provide, as much as is in your power and authority, that he be imprisoned as a declared heretic and kept there until our further request.

12. in which you, noble Lord, do us the highest favor, namely, if you carry out the good name of your excellent virtue to the same end, and do not a little tarnish your, your praiseworthy family's, and the whole German nation's praise and good reputation, and obtain this great, glorious thanks both before God and man, that through your diligence and godliness the started fire of the harmful

The Holy See has turned away and extinguished the beautiful splendor of the true, pure faith and of the people who believe in Christ. Given in Rome, at St. Peter's, under the Fisherman's Ring, on the 8th of July, in the 1520th year of our Papacy, in the eighth year.

440 Luther's answer to Spalatin after the communication of Teutleben's and Cardinal St. Georgii's letters. July 9, 1520.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltische Gesamtarchiv. Printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 270k; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 461 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 428. German in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 95d; in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 280k; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 478; and in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p. 315. We have retranslated from the Erlangen correspondence, which printed the original. - From this letter Kolde, Martin Luther, Vol. I, p. 387 aa p. 266 wanted to conclude that the "Erbieten" (No. 433) was already written immediately after July 9, but wrongly. Compare Weimar edition, vol. VI, p. 475.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To his best and dearest Georg Spalatin, ducal court preacher, servant of Christ, his faithful friend.

JESus.

Hail! I have, my dear Spalatin, secretly read the Roman letters 1) with great pain, because I see such a great lack of understanding and godlessness in such great heads of the church. I fear that they are so disgraced by the light of their conscience and of truth that they can no longer have judgment and sound senses. They condemn what is mine, and yet at the same time confess that it is astute and learned; then without having read it, or desired that it should be read for them. The Lord have mercy on us all.

1) Namely, the one that the Elector received on July 6 or 7 *) from the Cardinal St. Georgii (Raphael Petrucci) and Doctor Valentin Teutleben, the Elector's attorney in Rome. The letter of the Cardinal, the original of which is in Weimar, is dated Homas 3. Xpr. 1520; the answer of the Elector to it, from Lochau, July 10, 1520 (not ex XuZn8ta 5. XuAustl 1518), we have already reported No. 155 in this volume. The answer to Teutleben's letter may be No. 438; but it would be striking that the Elector hesitated so long with his answer.

*Spalatin gives (in Mencken II, 601) July s., the Elector in his reply July 7.

What can I then advise the good Elector what should be written? and therefore I rather write to you. First of all, you know how much more just cause I have to complain than they do; my published books are witnesses to this, in which I so often confess and complain that I did not get into this matter by having had the air to do so, but that I got into it by force. Furthermore, I have so often offered peace and silence. But where do I not ask to be taught better and try to dissuade them? I am still of such a mind that I want to remain silent if I am allowed to remain silent, that is, if they are also made to remain silent.

It is known to all that Eck did not drag me into the matter of the Pope for any other reason than so that he would make a mockery of me, of my name, of all that is mine, and even of our university, and trample it underfoot. Now that they see that God resists this man, they accuse me of a nonsensical addiction to peace. How should I, a wretched man, seek honor, who desires nothing else than to be allowed to live my life in seclusion (privatus) and completely hidden, away from the public?

Let him have my offices who will; let him burn my writings (mea) who will: I pray thee, what shall I do further? But at the same time I say this: If I am not allowed to be free from the teaching ministry and the service of the word, I want at least to be free in the administration of my office. I am burdened enough with many sins, I do not want to add to them this one, which cannot be forgiven, that where I am put into office, I do not carry out my office and am found guilty of an ungodly silence, that I have missed the truth and so many thousands of souls. Let that Cardinal [St. George] boast that his Church does not need defending: why does he defend it?

I like it in every way, 2) that the

2) In this paragraph, Luther gives advice, even though he had rejected this before, how the Elector should behave towards the Romans and what he should answer them. It seems to us not thunlich, the sentence: 86 vsro, ut suäitorsm aMrs of P088it, ita that the most noble prince is a complete stranger to my cause, as he has done so far, and is pushing me out into the public, so that I am either instructed or convicted; but that he also, as he cannot give the instruction, does not want to be judge or executor, unless the verdict is passed and clearly stated. That he also does not see how he can punish someone, Turk or Jew, without knowing it, which they do not even touch with a word, unless the Romans want him to obey them, the people, more than God, and he should rage against him of whom he does not know whether he is guilty or innocent, which cannot happen with an inviolate conscience, and he cannot be urged to such a conscience by any commandments, not even by divine ones.

They may punish Silvester, Eck, Cajetan and others, who for the sake of their honor have caused this tragedy in the Roman Church without any cause; I am not guilty of it. All that I have done and do, I do compulsorily, I am always ready to stand still, only they shall not call the evangelical truth to stand still. And they will get everything from me, yes, everything that I have offered, they shall have of their own free will, nee juäitwm velle nee executorem as a request of Luther (so Walch, De Wette und der Erlanger Briefwechsel); they are rather words (suggested by Luther) of the Elector. If one does not understand it in this way, one gets into trouble with the translation, as it happened to the old translator, who gave the words: Nee viäero 86 like this: "I [Luther] do not see either" 2c.

if they want to let the way to bliss be free for the Christians. This is the only thing I desire from them, and nothing else. What can be desired more honorably? I do not desire a cardinal's hat, not gold, not anything that Rome holds in high value today.

Or if I do not obtain this, they may deprive me of the office, and let me live and die in the corner of the wasteland [of the monastery]. I, a wretched man, do not like to teach, yet I have to suffer evil for it, while others both like to teach and are honored for it. My mind, which is so minded, cannot by any means fear threats nor look for promises. Are they looking for me to imprint fear or hope on my mind, or to make me outwardly so?

Here you have my opinion. By the way, I hope that the most noble prince will write in such a way that these Roman heads may understand that Germany has been oppressed so far not by its lack of scientific education (ruditate), but that of the Italians, by God's secret counsel. Farewell, and receive everything locked up again, as you sent it. On the day after Kilian [July 9] 1520.

Section Three of Chapter Six.

He tells of Eck's return from Rome, of the papal bull of excommunication against Luther that he had brought with him, and of the difficulties that occurred during its publication, as well as of Luther's appeal to a concilium.

What Luthers did after he learned of Eck's arrival.

443: Luther's paper "Von den neuen Eckischen Bullen und Lügen. Mid-October 1520.

Mainly on Eck's initiative (cf. No. 436 in this volume), Luther was banned in Rome on June 15, 1520. Eck had been entrusted with the task of publishing the bull of excommunication in Germany. Returning to Germany, he had it posted in Meissen on September 21, in Merseburg on the 25th, and in Brandenburg on the 29th. On the latter day he completed also a book, which was directed against one point of Luther's writing "to the Christian nobility", but also emphasized several sentences, which were rejected in the papal bull. The title of this book is: "Des heiligen Concilij tzu Costentz, der heyiligen Christenheit, vnd hochlöblichen keiſers Sigmunds, vn auch des Teutzschen Adels entschuldigung, das in bruder Martin Luder, mit vnwarheit auff gelegt, Sie haben Joannem Huß, vnd Hieronymü von Prag wider Babstlich Christlich, Keyserlich geleidt vnd eydt vorbrandt, Johan von Eck Doctor." 8 leaves in quarto. Printed by Martin Landsberg in Leipzig. On October 3, this publication left the press. Carl von Miltitz immediately sent it to the Elector. In contrast, there appeared, probably under a pseudonym: "Dialogus aber ein gespreche. wieder Doctor Ecken Buchlein, das er zu entschuldigung des Concilij zu Costnitz 2c. außgehen hat, gemacht durch Chuntzen von Oberndorff." 8 leaves in quarto. Printed by Matthes Maler in Erfurt. In the meantime, the bull had arrived in Wittenberg on October 3, and with it probably Eck's book, to which Luther himself now replied with our writing: "Von den neuen Eckischenn Bullen vnd lügen D. Martini Luther. Vuittemberg." 8 leaves in quarto. Printed by Melchior Lotther in Wittenberg. Three reprints appeared in Augsburg and one in Basel. In the collective editions: in the Wittenberg (t 554), vol. VII, p. 133 d; in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 341; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 526; in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p. 318; in the Erlangen, first ed, Vol. 24, p. 14; second edition, Vol. 24, p. 17; and in the Weimarschen, Vol. VI, p. 576. We give the text according to the latter.

1. That Doctor Eck has come from Rome is confirmed to me by many brave reports, among which the strongest is that, although he was previously recognized and appointed as such a false man in Bavaria, Swabia, Austria, the Rhine, Rome, Bononia, and also now in Meissen and Saxony, who lies and is true to everything he speaks, writes and does, as his Canonici indocti, 1) and Eccius dedolatus, as well as many brave people, have proven to him, he has now wanted to prove his honest journey to Rome, and has undertaken to overcome himself with lies. For such people now exist in Rome, and no other.

2 First, he writes: I adulterate the sacrament of baptism, saying that it does not take away all sins, and that I do not want to water the children with it. There Doctor Eck says his own. It is found differently in my book 2); there I refer to. I must let lie, who does not want to let it.

3 Doctor Eck also writes that I destroy repentance and consider it unnecessary, curtail confession, and reject satisfaction. This he inflicts on me, for my books say otherwise.

Thirdly, Doctor Eck writes that I reject preparation for the Sacrament with prayer and fasting. This is not so, but I teach that they are not enough. But that to give both forms to the laity, and to believe Christ's flesh and blood under the natural bread and wine, is heretical, he says his own, for he knows otherwise.

(5) It is also of this kind that I should teach that it is enough for a sinner to refrain from sinning, if he has not already repented. Notice, dear man, what good would such a liar intend, who so brazenly against public books may freely lie to me so venomously?

After that he blames me for causing a riot and for arousing the nobility against the pope, and he cites my writing as if I had said: The nobility should not receive anything in the endowments and ecclesiastical goods. Behold, thou pious man D. Eck, I complain of the same thing in my little book, that the goods of the church, which the nobility has endowed for the benefit of their own, are being devoured by the Roman boys, and thus the German nobility is being deprived of its bread. 3) Thus says my corner, I do not want [it] to become the nobility. Thanks be to you, you pious Romanist.

7 He also reproves my hopefulness, that I exalt myself above the holy teachers and concilia. That I am hopeful and burdened with more vices, I do not know how to defend; I have never made my holiness famous in any way. If Doctor Eck is as humble and holy as he pretends to be, to reproach everyone for living, I let it happen. We are not dealing with life, but with teachings. Doctrine remains right in one, even if his life is evil. So evil teaching is a thousand times more harmful than evil living. For the sake of this doctrine, I do what I do and say that D. Eck spares the truth once again. I do not exalt myself above the doctors and concilia; I exalt Christ above all teachers and concilia. And where I

3) In the original: "ertzogen".

If I have a clear saying about it, I will also lift it above all angels, as Paul does Gal. 1:8. Therefore, it does not hurt me and Saint Paul that the lying mouth, an enemy of the truth, punishes both of us heretics in this.

He claims that I lied when I wrote that we did not offer him the disputation. That is not so either, and all that he writes in the same erroneous booklet; although that does not serve the purpose here, and his courage only seeks cause to lie everywhere. You will also find him with little searching.

(9) That I have attacked papal splendor is painful to my Lord Doctor, and he writes a lot about how the pope behaves so badly in the chamber and at home; just as if I had said that he wears his splendor every moment. Why does he not also say that he is naked in bed and bath? O cold apology, and foolish hypocrisy! I spoke of four thousand mules; how would it have been if I had said that some think that for Pabst's sake there are more than twenty thousand mules in Rome every day? Dear Eck, it does not matter to me how much or little the pope ranges. If he lusted, he would keep a hundred thousand muzzled horses. Here you should punish me that I complain [that] such splendor goes over our monasteries, nobility and poor people. Here you should excuse the pope, stay on the road, do not pull my words where your iniquity teaches you to pull. You are wrong in heart.

(10) That I do not hold the sacrament of consecration as they hold it, I have enough proven cause for; and Eck together with all Romanists shall not deny me that all baptized people are priests. You know that the Scripture teaches so 1 Petr. 2, 9, nor can you refrain from your lies and divine truth.

I do not like to see heretics burned, he says, I fear the skin. Why does the free hero now come to the monastery in Leipzig, who does not fear anyone, not even devils, with his writings and cries? I think that burning heretics comes from the fact that they fear they cannot overcome them with writings, just like the papists in Rome, when they are afraid of the devil.

they do not like to resist the truth, they strangle the people, and with death they solvitate all argument. My Doctor Eck would also like to be such a champion of truth.

(12) Further, you write, godly man, that I want to make room for the peacemakers and murderers, since I have taught that a Christian man should not defend himself nor take back what he has taken. Why do you not punish Christ who taught the same? [Why then do you complain that I stir up the nobility and the sword against the pope and the clergy? Why do you not write your books soberly? If a sovereign had thrown you into the water or into prison with your bull, I would say that he had done you justice. What do you think now? Have I not said publicly enough in my booklet that [the] secular sword is guilty. to punish the wicked and to protect the pious? But the whole booklet 1) goes out in such a way that it also distorts you at once; you are still so blind and do not see it. Nevertheless, every man shall suffer violence and injustice. But the authorities shall watch that no one is wronged; and though no one complains, yet they shall defend where they can, see, and know. Although St. Paul allows the imperfect to complain in 1 Corinthians 6:1 ff, he does not praise it, and almost punishes it.

You know, my dear Romanist, that you can do as much in the holy scriptures as the donkey on the lyre. You are not able to interpret three lines in a Christian way, and you pretend to judge, teach and reprove everyone, boasting and writing to the whole world that you know everything by heart and do not use books. You should not be so proud, it is more obvious, because you think that you write and teach everything without books. If thou wouldst turn thine eyes so diligently to the books, as thou didst keep them on the venereas Veneres at Leipzig, of which thou didst write to Ingolstadt, 2) and wouldst restrain thyself from drinking, then thou mightest at last recognize thy false, unlearned heart, mouth and pen. I hope it would also be better for you if you had a wife, because such a famously chaste wife would be better for you.

1) To the Christian Abel." Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. X, 266 ff.

2) In Document No. 396 in this volume.

Life; although you promise me that I have advised such wretched, fallen priests to marry, which you Roman tyrants and murderers of souls have taken from them, against God and right, and still keep, to great ruin of souls.

14 And if you had not recently come from Rome, how could you write so impudently that you believe I preached: pious married couples may not be saved, because they fell into hope through their piety? If you hear it, dear Eck, if you ever want to hear enough lies from my sermons, ask the raven 1) at Leipzig, and barefoot observants 2) next to him, and all who speak and write through him, the pots will be like the soups.

You also knew that indulgences are of no use, and that excommunication, as a punishment, is to be received with love; nor must your mouth speak otherwise than you think. So you also did in Leipzig with Doctor Carlstadt, when I first learned to recognize you.

16 You also write that I reject being obedient to the pope, as I have taught so many times to be obedient also to evil prelates, even to the Turk. Thus I have never thought of this pope's person with honor; but have generally spoken of evil popes and harmful pontificalism. But your manner shall thus pervert my words.

I am surprised that you are not ashamed in your heart, that you impose on me, as I would like, not to be a beggar. Your false hatred makes you so blind and mad that you write this out to the whole world as heresy, when you know very well that it is otherwise, and that everyone does not consider begging good, even the mendicant monks themselves. You wretched man wanted to load the mendicant orders on me.

(18) That I reject war against the Turks until we become pious beforehand, and then go against them with the fear of God, let no one reproach me except D. Eck, who has no love nor desire for truth in his heart. I also say: the nobility should strike with the sword at Rome in all those who do it with silk.

You should not think of the Christian who says that the Scriptures are under the pope, and the pope should go unpunished, even though he has led the world to the devil. Such teachings and sayings you honorable Christian man like to hear, they are not heretical to you, you do not write anything against them. But I must be one with you, that I contradict you and your like in such devilish teachings.

(19) I have also made fasting free. That was done by Saint Paul [1 Tim. 4:3], and not by me. But what wonder is it that you deny and revile me when you blaspheme St. Paul and Christ; and yet you are an honorable, pious Christian man?

20 O, how wistful you are, poor man, how you seek back and forth to help your Enidhart! Say: I do not want to suffer the scholasticos, but the ecclesiasticos; again, I do not want to suffer the ecclesiasticos either, now the pope, now not the pope, now Concilia, now not Concilia, but only want to have dealt with the Scriptures. I ask you for God's sake, my dear Eck, what have you done with such public lies, since you knew that [it] was otherwise? Do you think that I will be afraid of your lies? Or do you think that it can last, if you touch a part of the simple people with your lies, cause you a cry, me a disgrace?

Twenty-one years ago in Leipzig, in the disputation, you also did everything with lies and deceptions, as you well knew, and sought your fame and also obtained it; where has it remained? You see that God, who is truth, strives against your lies; yet you do not cease to storm against him with lies. I have mercy on you, and please, let there be enough lies, my corner, so that God will not let you see anything else in the end. You cannot harm me; do what you will while you deal in lies.

(22) Besides thee, all Leipzig must bear me witness that I have always referred to the Scriptures; not denying the doctors in all things, but because they have sometimes erred, I would not and will not hold them in all things, and where I had a clear saying of the Scriptures, there alone would I stand against them all, if they wrote otherwise. These have been my words, as you cannot deny; still you write and cry out

1) Hermann Rabe, Dominican Order.
2) Augustin Alveld.

I will reject all doctors, and stand on my own mind alone, without all scripture and sayings, and make a universal out of the particular. Ask your conscience how honorable and honest you are in this. Are you not the least afraid of some Leipzig ears?

(23) Nor are you ashamed to blame me for holding only to the Scriptures. How can you reproach yourself more highly than that you, Doctor of the Holy Scriptures, are not only ashamed or afraid of your craft, office and title, but that you blame me for wanting to go into the Holy Scriptures! Yes, I know where the shoe pinches you. I know that you know nothing about the Holy Scriptures, and yet you are called a Doctor of the Holy Scriptures, and you fear your honor. That is why you play with many of the teachers' names, so that your ignorance of the Scriptures will not be noticed; nevertheless, it will not help you. You, pope, doctors, conciliators, men, angels and devils, should and must go to the Scriptures and receive the same judgment. This and no other. Do you want to throw the holy scriptures to the wind and not let the doctors judge by them? Not yet, dear Eck. See, from this you can notice my inconsistency, how I now want to hear doctors, now not doctors, now Pabst, now not Pabst. I want to have the Scriptures most steadfastly and first, then take and leave everything else that the Scriptures teach me, let it be written whoever will. I will have no master, but only one, who is called Christ in heaven, as he has commanded us all; I will consider all others as fellow disciples [Matth. 23, 10].

24 After that, what you slander about the souls in purgatory and anniversaries, I let go; one knows well in all the world what I think of it, it may not be anything of your lies and malice. But whether I was more impatient than you, Emser, Prierias and your companions, I let the readers of our books judge. You can almost boast, I begrudge you that. Ecciana modestia, what that means, you know well. I boast of no virtue; I boast of the holy scripture truth, since you flee from it, like the devil from the cross, and fall away to dispute on my evil life, in which I soon

I am concluded; although before men, which I do not respect, no one, praise God, may reprove me. I hope you also should not be long inclusibilis in it, if you would not lie otherwise, as you are wont to do.

25 Finally, he comes to the Costnitz Concilium, and blasphemes it, as a true Romanist, recently come; says: it is the Johanni Hus and Hieronymo the escort and oath not broken 2c. Because my dear lord is so angry, I want to open my mouth about the Costnitz Concilium, and say:

First, that I, unfortunately, had not read Johann Hus at the disputation in Leipzig, otherwise I would not have held some, but all articles condemned at Costnitz; as I still hold them now, after I have read Johann Hus', highly intelligent, noble, Christian booklet, the like of which has not been written in four hundred years, which has now also gone out to print by divine counsel, 1) to testify to the truth, and to put all those to public shame who have condemned it.

(27) It is not Johannis Hus' articles, but Christ's, Paul's, Augustine's that are most strongly founded and irrefutably proven, as all who read them must confess. Oh, would God that I were worthy to be burned, torn apart, driven to pieces, even for the sake of such articles, in the most terrible way, as Doctor Lügner himself could conceive, and that it would cost me a thousand necks, they would all have to come. Not that I want to raise Johannem Hus and cry out for martyrdom. For I am not as sacrilegious in raising up saints as the pope with his blind papists. I know that God is strange and frightening in his judgments, may well let someone have right doctrine and be strangled because of it, and yet no one knows what he wants to do with him.

28 Therefore, for the salvation of my conscience from the innocent blood, I say against all who hold such articles condemned, that they should know how they deny and condemn Christ Himself.

1) Luther means the writing, which appeared at the beginning of 1820 under the title: vs eau8U Losmiea.?nu1u8 OoQ8tuntiu8, in August following as unfortunately 6Ar6MU8 de unitats soels8iÄ6 (Weim. Aug.).

and Doctor Eck, who knows well that they are unjustly condemned, but who, coming into the fray, is ashamed to sing the contradiction, wanted to blind all the world with his lies, so that only his fame and honor would exist, before he would let the truth be right. It is true that John Hus was burned before, because the pope is confirmed. The same is the complaint that the boys have ruled with their opinions before a right order of the papacy has happened.

He also excuses the nobility, which, and not the Concilium, should have burned the same Hus and Hieronymum. Dear Eck, this is one of the highest complaints in my booklet, that in the new Concilium the pope and his followers do not leave anyone free, but first bind them with oaths that they may only set and do what they want, and to carry out their evil deeds through the imprisoned, afflicted nobility. If the Emperor had allowed Sigmund and the princes to act freely, as he had in mind, Costnitz and Basel would probably have had many other concilia, and the lying Romanists would probably have been denied their wanton malice.

Therefore, Doctor Eck denies again that there was a free concilium [at] Costnitz; and I do not unreasonably strive for a free concilium, in which not only the most unlearned bishops and the coarsest, most foolish sophists, as at Costnitz, but also reasonable, experienced princes, nobility and laymen would sit in the council, since it has now come to this that married women are more capable of biblia and understand Christian things better than Doctor Eck and his fellow sophists.

As I also said that Johanni Hus did not keep the Christian escort, it is true, and Doctor Eck himself does not understand what he indicates in the Latin escort letter. 1) They are promised a Christian escort, as the words clearly express, which Doctor Eck wanted to cover up: Quantum in nobis est, et fides orthodoxa exigit. That is why I called it a Christian escort, which is how it is found in Scripture. Now one knows well what Christian action means. Christianity has never known of such right conduct, as I have in my little book. Thus, Christianity has overcome many heretics [in] fourteen hundred years, and has never burned any of them, without the papists at Costnitz, who give Christian guidance, and then make a human, legal guidance out of it, which is called more a sham than a right guidance, and is unchristian. The justice, since D. Eck bases his legal escort on, would nevertheless have been destroyed, so that one would not have been allowed to break the escort.

Why did St. Augustine not burn the heretics in Africa? Why not Hilarius and the holy teachers much more? but were against that they were also not punished by money? These were Christian ways of dealing with heretics, and fruit came from them; but what came from them is well known. And what was the need of the bloodthirsty, insatiable tyrants at Costnitz, that they dealt with the dead, burned Johann Hus in such an atrociously inhuman way, and had the earth with the ashes dug up so deeply and thrown into the Rhine? Do you want to know? Their conscience was afraid of his unjust cause, therefore they invented such a furious image to frighten the poor laity that the truth would be suppressed with violence and fear. It has not helped yet, the truth is still coming out, and the bladders of all papists should burst; the stones will still cry over the Hussian murderers. One has now resisted for a hundred years, and the more one resists, the more it emerges that it wants to be revealed that the Hussian cause was divine, the Costnitzer was diabolical; the truth will not and may not remain hidden.

33) I have heard that Andreas Proles, our vicar, 3) who was a man of great name and faith in German lands, also considered holy by many, said that at the time in our monastery he looked at the wall of St. John Zachariah. Johann Zachariä, with a rose painted on his beret, and said: Alas, I would not like to

2) This is to be understood in this way: The conscience of every one of them feared his unjust cause. The Jenaer offers: "his [Hus'] right cause".

3) The same narrative is found Walch, old edition, vol. XVI, 2562 and in the Tischreden, cap. 58, § 5, St. Louis edition, vol. XXII, 1404. Cf. De Wette, vol. II, p. 493.

1) Eck bases his justification of the Concil on the phrase: sustitia, sswxor salva, (Weim. Ausg.).

Wear the rose with honors. Was he then asked by a brave man of his fathers: what does this mean? He said, "When John Hus was publicly disputing at Costnitz, John Zachariah gave him the saying Ezek. 34, 10. ff: Visitabo ego ipse pastores, et non populus meus; Johann Hus denied that it did not say: et non populus meus. Johann Zachariä referred to Hus's own Bible, which he had secretly seen before in Hus's hostel, and yet did not warn him; since it came, it was found inside. And although Johann Hus shouted that it was false, that other bibles were not like it, because he had taken one with him, it did not help, and so he was condemned by a false bible. Then the rose was given to Zacharias in honor, as a conqueror of the heretic Johannes Hus. Now it is true that all the bibles in the world have said on this day what John Hus said, and not what John Zacharias said. From this it appears how the sophists despaired of their cause, used all cunning and deceit, and did nothing in the light.

34. This is so obvious to everyone that no one can contradict it any more, as Johann Hus has never been overcome with writings; when some acta themselves write, he has been condemned secretly, that the nobles have discussed it among themselves, placet, placet, placet, and thus he has been executed by the placet of the unlearned tyrants, without instruction, without proof, without overcoming; as I have heard from my tutor, Johann Greffenstein, learned and pious man, whom I may well call now that he is dead, and I heard it from him at the time when I still thought very little of becoming a priest, let alone a doctor.

Thus, in many places of the German land, the murmuring of John Hus has always remained, and has always increased, until I, too, fell in, found out that he had truly been a noble, highly enlightened man, whom even twenty thousand corners have not yet been able to overcome. And if they are learned, they still let themselves be seen, and give cause why Johann Hus should be condemned. It is not enough to say that the Concilium did it; one must show cause, to silence the adversaries and to satisfy ourselves, because it is known that a concilium may err. In spite of all the nooks, crannies and corners here, and all the papists and Romanists, that you knock over a sheet of Johann Hus' writings!

(36) Therefore, great enemy of the truth, if you had let your pen rest and let me also wait for mine; or if, meanwhile, you had let your book 1) edendum vel bibendum, aut etiam egerendum de primatu Petri, come to day, how long did you eat at it? Have you repented of the disgrace? you are of an insolent forehead, and see that God himself resists you, leads you into all disgrace, nor will you receive wit.

37 I also hear that D. Eck has brought a bull with him from Rome against me, which is so similar to him that it might well be called Doctor Eck, as full of lies and error as it is supposed to be; and he pretends to smear the people's mouths, so that they should believe that it is Pabst's work, if it is his game of lies. I let it all happen, must wait for the game in God's name; who knows what divine council has decided. Nothing is built on me yet, therefore nothing may fall with me.

The reason is that I firmly believe that there is nothing wrong with any bull: Firstly, because my appeal to the common council still stands unchanged, about which I have confessed nothing to the pope with all his people, but only amicable dealings. If, however, he goes over it by force, let him go, but he is not yet out of the woods; and he wants to have this appeal publicly conditioned before everyone, and to have it denied as best he can.

39. secondly, my cause, from my willing omission, of my gracious Lord Duke Frederick, Elector of Saxony 2c., is arrested by suggestion of Lord Carol von Miltitz, papal embassy, on interrogation of the most reverend in God father and Lord Archbishop of Trier, which, still un-makes me believe that the Roman See will not regard such two powerful Electors as idols, or let them try in vain, because we Germans would always have to remain fools. So I think I am only one man who cannot wait for interrogation or judgment in two or more places at the same time.

1) This is the book which Eck laid at the feet of the Pope in Rome: vs krivaatu ketri aäversns l'nääruva lidri tres. Even Wiedemann, a Catholic theologian, admits in his "Dr. Johann Eck", p. 518, "that Eck based himself on arguments that are devoid of truth".

40 Thirdly, who can understand that the pope should give orders over me D. Ecken, who does not know the measure of his hostile, public attitude towards me, when in all matters not the parties themselves but unsuspicious people should act, as nature and all rights dictate? Therefore, to assume that he lies, deceives, lies, and falsifies everything that his wicked hatred may indicate to him.

41) Fourthly, I want to be unconnected with all the bulls, where and when they come, I see the right main bull, I do not let myself dispute the copies and copies, and this for the reasons: I have seen the bulls of indulgences, against which I initially acted in this matter, and found noticeable defects and errors in them, and some, more understanding than I, have seen eighteen defects in the same bull. If the Roman boys were not afraid to deceive such a great bishop of Mainz and Magdeburg with the same bull, what should they not do against me, a poor beggar?

42) About that, the Cardinal St. Sixti at Augsburg deceived my most gracious Lord Duke Friedrich, Elector of Saxony, with a public, lying, false breve, as I have stated in Actis Augustensibus. 1) If then such great lords in German lands must be fools and monkeys to the Roman boys, by their false letters, why should I believe that they are honestly dealing with me 2) through Doctor Ecken, who has opened himself in his words and letters a land-fraudulent arch liar? Yes, it has become so mean to deal with false letters from Rome that very rarely one is found righteous.

43 Therefore, I will give the bull lead, wax, string, signature, clausel, and everything with eyes.

or do not give a hair's breadth to all the other complaints. Nor may anyone complain that he may not come or walk safely to Wittenberg; we have such a pious, honest sovereign and officials that the excuse may have no help where one wants to act with justice.

44 Hereby I will have warned everyone, that he does not, by Roman trade and doctor corners, approach me, and before that the Executores, so that, if they obtained a defeat. Know bear: I have admonished them before. Everything must still gain a much different nose, if it is to go out right. But if there is violence, if there is much more to be done, God will do it; I will cheerfully dare to do it in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, amen.

B. Of the Papal Bull of Condemnation itself, and how D. Luther and his friends examined and thoroughly answered it.

444: Pope Leo X's Bull against Luther of June 15, 1520. Bull against Luther of June 15, 1520, with Ulrich von Hutten's preface, glosses and postscript. Beginning of 1521.

This bull first appeared in Rome on June 15, 1520, printed by order of the pope by Jacobus Mazochius, in quarto. It has been reprinted many times. In German translation it is found in the Wittenberg edition (1554), vol. VII, p. 97b; in the Jena edition (1564), vol. I, p. 256; in the Altenburg edition, vol. I, p. 445 and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVII, p. 305. Hütten provided it with a note to the Germans, with glosses and a postscript addressed to Pope Leo. The title is: Bulla Domini Dsouis contra srrorss Martini Dutbsri st ssHuasiuru. Without indication of time and place, in quarto. This edition is then included in the Latin Wittenberg (1551), toru. II, col. 51b; in the Jena (1579), toru. I, tol. 474; and in the Erlangen, opp. var. arg., toiu. IV, x. 261. German in Walch.

Translated from Latin.

Bull of Leo X against the errors of Martin Luther and those who follow him.

3) On January 14, 1521, Luther reports to Staupitz the appearance of this writing. See Appendix, No. 20.

[Below it the Pabst's coat of arms with this inscription.]

Astitit Bulla a dextris ejus, in vestitu deaurato, circumamicta varietatibus.

[Among them:]

See, reader, it is worth the effort, you will feel and recognize what a shepherd Leo is.

[On the back of the title page, this inscription:]

Ulrich von Hutten, Knight, All Germans Heil!

Behold here, German men, Leo's X. Bull, by which he endeavors to hinder the rising truth, and opposes it to our so long oppressed freedom, so that it may never again gain strength nor grow. Should we not oppose this, and by general consultation prevent it from going further, and put a stop to the presumption of a restless man? I ask you for the sake of Christ: when has there been a more convenient time for this, and where has there been a better opportunity to do something worthy of the German name? You see that everything is leaning towards this, that there is such great hope as never before that this tyranny will be eradicated, that there will be a remedy for this disease. Dare at last; and carry it out.

Here is not Luther's matter, but it concerns all of you in general. The sword is not pointed at one in particular, but we are all publicly attacked. They do not want their tyranny to be contradicted, their deceit to be exposed, their false pretenses to be made known, their raging to be resisted, and an obstacle to its continuation to be placed. This is what they are indignant about, and that they clench their teeth in rage and show themselves so insolently.

Since you see this, what will you finally do? What advice will you take? If you want to hear me, just remember that you are Germans. This few remembrance shall be enough for you to avenge this. I am now willingly putting myself in danger for your sake and that of the common good. For first of all I am aware of a glorious deed, then I not only hope but am certain that you will all undertake the same with me. I have intended to make this bull known now, so that when you read it, you will also get to know the others. Farewell!

Now before we hear you, holy father, remember the apostolic words, since Paul wrote 2 Thess. Cap. 2, 3. f. says: "Let no one deceive you in any way, for the Lord will not come unless the apostasy comes first, and the man of sin is revealed, and the child of perdition. He who is an abomination, and exalts himself above all that is called God or worship, so that he sits down in the temple of God as a god, and pretends to be God." There you have it! Start the bull like this.

1. Leo Bishop, a servant^a) of all servants of God. In perpetual memory of the cause. O HErr, arise^b) [Ps. 7, 7.], arise, and judge^c) thy cause, be mindful of thy reproaches [Ps. 74, 22.], which go forth from the unwise^d) all the day long [Ps. 89, 51. 52.], incline thine ears^e) to our petition [Ps. 88, 3.]. For there are foxes^f) [Hohel. 2, 15.] risen up, that refrain from laying waste thy vineyard,^g) whose winepress thou alone hast trodden [Ezek. 63, 3.]. And when you wanted to go to the Father in heaven, you ordered the care, government and administration of the vineyard to Petro, as a head,^h) and your governor, and his descendants,ⁱ) like the triumphant church^k): the same vineyard a wild^l) cutting pig from the forest subdues to destroy, and a special wild animal to consume it [Ps. 80, 14.].

a) Why do you rule with such great power and splendor?

b) He will rise, but see that it does not happen to your destruction.

c) He will judge to our greatest desire.

d) Ah! not the foolish. He turns to blasphemy right at the beginning, and this is the roaring of the lion, of which the prophet Zephaniah clearly speaks [Cap. 3, 3.]: "Their princes are among them roaring lions, and their judges wolves in the evening, who leave nothing until the morning." St. Jerome there deals with it quite freely and clearly.

e) He would certainly do it if you would ask what is fair.

f) Brave men.

g) Cleanse from filth. But you, since you deprive the Germans of money, show yourself to be more deceitful than a fox. You move away from the lion's magnanimity and turn to a low and quite indecent craftiness. If you force us to do the same to you, we will have to say that you are not a fox, but rather an Arabian night wolf, because you take gifts, sell justice, and in you the Prophet's saying is fulfilled: "Woe to the shepherds who scatter and tear. h) Behold, on what he bases his tyranny!

- i) Here would be much to remember if it wanted to suffer the time. Christ hears you immediately not. Because you lie what he hates.
- k) The triumphant church, o, a beautiful little bundle! l) This you did, tenth, and you would be the fierce lion (Leo), because of which we decided to fight against you with united forces.

2. stand up, Peter,^a) and according to your guard and care, as reported, commanded to you by God, diligently consider this matter of the holy Roman church, the mother of all churches,^b) and the mistress of the faith, which^c) you have sanctified by God's command with your blood [Apost. 20, 28. Eph. 5, 26. 27.], against whom, as you said before, lying doctrines^d) will arise, who raise up pernicious sects,^e) who bring upon themselves swift condemnation;^f) whose tongue is a fire^g), a restless evil^h) full of deadly poisonⁱ) [2 Petr. 2, 1. Jac. 3, 5. 6.] who have a bitter, angry will and strife in their hearts, boasting and lying against the truth.^k)

- a) He calls Simon Petrum. But listen to what he says to you: "Feed Christ's flock to the best of your ability. Take heed to them, not forced, but willingly; do not look to shameful usury, but guide them with love. Do not exercise lordship over the clergy, but lead the flock by good examples" [1 Pet. 5:2].
- b) You say it; we do not recognize it.
- e) State: Do you understand the Roman, or the general Christian church?
- d) The defenders of truth against your lies.
- e) For they will destroy you because of your shameful merits.
- f) Christ let the fulfillment come on your head. g) It will burn you.
- h) A stimulation to future safety, as a general and very beneficial good.
- i) Filled with healing medicine.
- k) Do not revile; rather, we defend the truth against your oppressions.

3. *) Arise also, we beseech thee, Paul, who hast enlightened this church with thy doctrine and the same torture^a). For now stands up a new Porphyrius,^b) who just as the same in times past has unreasonably challenged the holy apostles: so also he the holy popes,^c) our ancestors, against your teaching, not with pleading, but with scolding, biting,^d) tearing; and because he despairs of his cause,^e) is not ashamed to resort to abusive words^f) according to the custom of the heretics,^g) whose (as St. Jerome^h) says) their last tax and help is that when they see that their things will be condemned and overturned in the future, they begin to pour out the serpent's poison with their tongues, and when they see themselves overcomeⁱ) they go over to words of reproach. For whether you even though you say that heresy must be for the edification of the believers in Christ, nevertheless they must be eradicated^k) by your intercession and help, so that they do not increase^l) and so that the foxes do not grow up, right at the beginning by your assistance^m).

- *If you want to be a bishop, may he also favor you against your enemies, that you also be such a one as he wants you to be: namely, one who has clean hands and is without fault, as a steward of God, not disruptive, not angry, not given to shameful usury and avarice, a lover of good sciences; that you seek not what is yours, but what is another's, who is strong in exhortation, according to the true and pure doctrine, and is able to convince the opponent.
- a) But the descendants have sullied and corrupted this teaching through infidelity and shameful deeds.
- b) Nothing less than Porphyrius. For the latter preaches Christ's gospel, but the latter resisted him ungodly.
- c) Say rather: Deceivers, ravaging wolves, and unworthy hirelings of Christ's flock.
- d) Yes, they should have been exterminated and killed. e) How can he become fainthearted who has a' ge has a right, good cause, and has already put you in fear? And he who defends the truth, how can he despair?
- f) More than cheap invective.
- g) Yes, rather Christ, who thus says: "Woe to you, blind leaders; woe to you, hypocrites, breeders of serpents and vipers" 2c. Should you not also be so reproached, who stumble so often and so shamefully?
- h) He is completely filled by Jerome. O great erudition!
- i) Gelt, they are overcome!
- k) He wants to teach Paulum.
- l) That is, so that they may not harm your usury and drudgery.
- m) Do not kill the innocent and simple-minded doves, you vulture of Pabst. 1)

4. finally, let^a) the whole assembly of all the saints, and the whole Christian church,^b) whose truthful interpretation of the holy Scripture is put in the background,^c) rise up, and let some, whose minds have been blinded by the father of lies,^d) according to the old habit of the heretics, wisely interpret the same Scripture differently,^e) than the Holy Spirit requires, only according to their own sense, out of ambition and for the sake of popular favor^f) (as the apostle testifies) interpret, yes rather twist and falsify;^g) so that now, according to St. Hieronymi's opinion, it is not the gospel of Christ, but of a man;^h) or what is still more evil, of the devil. Stand up! I say, you aforementioned holy church of God,ⁱ) and intercede together with the aforementioned most blessed Twelve Messengers to the

1) The old translator has given the words accipitr IVnitiksx so: "but the pope be seized".

Almighty God, that He may rest, after the rejection and purification of the errors of His sheep,^k) and after the expulsion of all heresies from the territories of the believers in Christ, to preserve the peace and unity^l) of His holy Church.

a) That you may kill, with the counsel of wicked men, b) Which you and your supposed holy ancestors have almost entirely destroyed and corrupted.
 c) Say: resumed.
 d) More correctly you would say, Leo: The Holy Spirit has enlightened him. For the father of avarice and lies has so blinded you that you are not afraid to do all evil.
 e) Rudder than it looks to papal ambition and self-interest. But stop accusing others of the vices of which you yourself are aware.
 f) Yes, rather for the benefit of common necessity, I say with your permission.
 g) On the other hand, all those with understanding see that this is done by you.
 h) How anxious he is to inflict his vices on others! For we have not yet heard of him dealing with anything else.
 i) It would certainly stand out if you did not suppress it. This some hinders it.
 k) Rather, that the shepherd's drudgery may be stopped, and the flock be snatched from their predatory teeth, that he may faithfully feed his sheep and bring them into the fold, seeking again that which is lost, healing that which is wounded and sick, but preserving that which is fat and strong, so that at last the pleasure-seekers may be destroyed, and not be shepherds feeding themselves, but scattering and tearing up the Lord's flock. For you, Leo, you (O misery!) have turned judgment into bitterness, and the fruit of righteousness into wormwood. Will you obtain what you ask for?
 l) He has not yet asked anything that he wanted to obtain, I appeal to the conscience of man. "Woe to those who desire the Lord's day," Amos 5:18. For you, Leo, where will you reign when the church of the saints, which has been completely sunk by you, shall rise again?
 5) For what we can hardly say because of fear of mind^a) and pain") has long since come to us through credible reports and common rumor;^c) yes truly, we have unfortunately seen with our eyes^d) and read 1) many and manifold errors; some already condemned by concilia^e) and ordinances^f) of our ancestors, also of the Greeks and Bohemians^g) heresy expressly (expresse) in itself; but others some according to that^h) (respective) either heretical, or false, or annoying, or hurting the Christian ears, or seducing the simple mindedⁱ) by the false^k) keepers of the faith,

1) "seen and read with our eyes", namely the 41 sentences which Eck probably collected for him from Luther's writings. So Leo can say: he has seen and read it with his eyes.

who, through the hopeful^l) diligence,^m) coveting the world'sⁿ) "honor"), contrary to the teaching of the apostle St. Paul [1 Thess. 2, 6.], want to be wiser than is proper;^p) whose loquacity (as St. Hieronymus^q)) would not have taken place and faith^r) without the respect of the Scriptures, if they did not seem to confirm the wrong^s) doctrine also with divine testimonies, however badly^t) interpreted, from whose eyes the fear of God^u) has departed, by inspiration of the enemy^v) of the human race, which 2) are recently awakened, and recently taught and spread among some reckless ones") in the highly glorious^x) German nation.

a) Listen to the Roman oratory.
 b) From pain, because of the lost usury.
 c) You have seen it clearly if you ever see anything.
 d) We know that you had to see it to your greatest chagrin; only because of that we cannot renounce the truth.
 e) Angular concilia (conciliabula).
 f) Which are very beautiful, and worthy of their creators.
 g) What, dear God, are these heresies?
 h) "expressionmh", "thatdepends"; beautiful! roman!
 i) In sum, the pure and unadulterated truth, which, however, is to be condemned for the reason that after this teaching we will no longer be free to rob the Germans in many ways. For those are taught, whose minds were easily accessible to us at the time of our robbery. From this it follows that we will lose a mighty profit, and it is to be feared that many in Rome, even of our creatures, will die of hunger. We will at least have to rule in great poverty.
 k) Who are removed from your falseness, and therefore united and devoted to Christ and the faith founded by Him.
 l) A brave one.
 m) For the love of truth and the fatherland.
 n) I say: Christ's, while you, on the other hand, belong entirely to the world.
 o) He confesses that if we overcome, glory awaits us, but it moves us little.
 p) How this is so beneficial to you and your Roman court!
 q) Does this Jerome speak? But why do you put on Jerome so often? Isn't it so that by this patched purple you may give a prestige to your badly patched rags? But it does not depend on each other. Therefore, refrain from protecting the reputation of this holy man with your sacrilegious lies.
 r) He shall not have it either, which we hereby testify.
 s) The evangelical doctrine that we confess has always been wrong to you, because it does not teach you to do what you do shamefully often.

2) This refers to errores (errors) at the beginning of this paragraph.

- t) Not according to your benefit, but according to Christ's and the saints' opinion.
- u) The fear of papal tyranny, and the superstitious worship of Roman tyranny.
- v) You are wrong, because the devil, as a father of lies, cannot enter truth.
- w) Why then so easily, since they soon began to fall so heavily to you, such a powerful tyrant?
- x) That is who sent us plenty of money, though otherwise she is stupid and barbaric.

Which pains us all the more, since we and our ancestors have always carried this nation^a) in the bosom^b) of love^c). For after the transfer^d) of the emperorship from the Greeks through the Roman church^e) to the Germans^f), our ancestors and we have always taken the reeves and protectors^g) of the Roman church from them. From these Germans, who are in fact right followers^h) (Germanos) of the Christian truth, it is known that they have always been the most fierce fighters against heresies. Witnesses of this are the laudableⁱ) laws of the German emperors^k) for the freedom of the church, and to hunt down and expel the heretics^l) from all German lands, at the most severe penalties,^m) also at loss of lands and dominions, against their harborers, keepers, or those who do not expel them, given in times past, and confirmed by our ancestors. ⁿ) Which, if they were held today, we and they would undoubtedly be relieved of this burden. ^o)

- a) He praises Germany, which is the some retribution of the many impairments. Accordingly, he still has hope to bring it back to his side, otherwise he would not stroke so gently.
- b) You have eaten it [Germany], but now you must spit it out again, and God will tear it out of your bowels by force.
- c) What love can there be for such a tyrant, who so deceitfully and treacherously, so violently and unreasonably extorts, steals, milks out, robs and appropriates the money of his friends!
- d) He reminds the Germans of the good deed they had done before and thinks that he has obliged them. O what a deception!
- e) Because this transfers secular rulers. Dear, say, by what right?
- f) For these [Germans] seemed comfortable to be made fools of.
- g) Meanwhile, what are you doing, lazy shepherd, when you put others in your place to protect the flock? Is the church protected by weapons, not by examples of blameless life and sound doctrine?
- h) If God had wanted it to be them, they would certainly have shown you the teeth long ago. But the sorcery of your forefathers, when they covered the minds of men with vain and loose talk and fables, was to blame for their not knowing the truth.

could not recognize. Christ seems to point to this when he says, "According to your ways he will deal with you, and according to your judgment he will judge you."

- i) There is much to be said here, but one wants to spare those who have not spared even their descendants. But tell me, what do you call freedom of the church? And what is it good for? Perhaps to steal unashamedly, to cheat, to deceive all men unlawfully, and to do good to no one?
- k) Germany will never deviate from the path of virtue of her forefathers, do not fear; she will also change some of the things that they introduced badly.
- l) But I believe that there are no heretics in Germany now than you yourself raise, to the general ruin.
- m) They have willed you enough.
- n) Must it be confirmed by you what our emperors set? Those are not worthy of this dignity who rule according to foreign regulations.
- o) We, of course, have decided to leave (the burden) alone and to assert our freedom, be it so, with great courage. And now we do not resist your violence as well as your malice. If you are too confident, think that there are also lions here, if there should be a lack of eagles.

7. The witness is the infidelity of the Hussites, Wiclefs and Jerome of Prague, condemned and punished in the Council of Constans; the witness is the so often shed blood of the Germans against the Bohemians; ^b) witness is the touched errors, or many from them, by the universities of Cologne and Leuven^c) as the divine field^d) most holy and God-fearing caretakers, not less learned and truthful^e) and holy^f) transfer, condemnation and damnation. We could also indicate many other things^g) which we, so that we would not be considered as if we were telling a story, have decided to pass over.

- a) O incomparable Concilium! which was not (as it should be) guided by public freedom, but (of which one must be ashamed) by your tyranny. And now you have to Rome, I know not what Concilium, in which your writers have recently established that the soul is immortal.
- b) Its instigators were the bloodthirsty bishops of the Roman church, not worthy that the Nordic peoples should remember them kindly, let alone that they should die for it of their own free will. You praise the deed, Leo, and yet you want to be considered Christian? Are you Christ's governor? For this is certainly an extraordinary cruelty, to approve that Christian blood has been shed, when, as Cyprian reminds us, it is the conscience of a bishop to take care that no one is lost through his fault.
- c) He praises the flattering little hairs.
- d) The Roman robbery, I say, and the papal rage.

- e) Where has scholarship, Leo, where has truth shone forth in them? Shame on you, to make such a serious judgment in such fool's land.
- f) How nice it is to caress the Roman pope! We are not concerned with the judgment made so lightly without all common sense. And the gossip schools of the bad teachers shall not take away our Germany after we have once undertaken to liberate it.
- g) The writer wants to let his erudition be seen here, and is full of old stories.

8.^a] Accordingly, out of concern^b) of the pastoral office, which is commanded to us by divine grace, which we carry, we can no longer tolerate the deadly poison^c) of the aforementioned errors^d) or overlook them, without stain^e) for the Christian religion and damage to the right faith. Some of these errors^f) but we have wanted to incorporate this bull, whose wording follows, and this is:

- a) Finally he carries out his office. But see that you do not abuse your power, not to build, but to destroy. According to Ambrosii, it is the duty of a clergyman not to harm anyone and to help everyone.
- b) Pay attention to the care of the sheep given to Leo.
- c) Rather, wholesome admonitions, which is also your opinion, and you would pronounce it, if you were not possessed by greed and completely taken in by arrogance. Therefore [Isa. 5:20.], "Woe to you who call evil good, and good evil; darkness light, and bitter sweet."
- d) For soon after you will starve, if you will endure.
- e) Say, I pray thee, what blemish is this, that the truth is restored to it [the Christian religion], and shameful laws are resisted?
- f) This is certainly violence, Leo, to condemn without prior knowledge what this [Lutheri] has undertaken to dispute, because it is not done with the advice and consent of the whole church, to which he nevertheless submits. But you can do nothing against the truth. You can do something for the truth if someone challenges it and you are ready to protect it, namely, if you, like the apostles, have undertaken to preach Christ, not yourself. If you care for the flock entrusted to you, do not follow your inclinations and desires, so that you walk deceitfully, look for gifts, and follow after the carcass, and by avarice handle us with fictitious words. Dearly beloved, if thou wilt hear me, be not a lion in thy house, driving out the members of thy house, and oppressing them that are subject unto him. Surely the Lord guards the truth forever, and avenges those who suffer injustice. You should have considered this before you condemned your brother. But as far as Luther's writings are concerned, everyone can read them, and at the same time your judgment about them; then they themselves may also judge freely,

1) This is a heretical opinion, but a common one: to give the sacraments of the new law the right-certifying grace to those who do not put a stop to it.

2) To deny that sin remains in a child after baptism is to trample Paul and Christ underfoot at the same time.

3) The tinder of sin, even though there is no real sin, prevents the soul that departs from the body from entering heaven.

4) The imperfect love of man who wants to die brings with it, by necessity, a great fear, which in itself is sufficient to cause the chastisement of purgatory, and prevents entrance into the Kingdom of Heaven.

5) That there are three parts of repentance, repentance, confession and atonement, is not founded in the Holy Scriptures, nor in the ancient, holy Christian teachers.

6) The repentance that is brought about by the reconsideration, collection, and detestation of sins, so that one reconsiders his years in the bitterness of his soul, considering the gravity of the sins, the multiplicity, the shamefulness, the loss of eternal bliss, and attainment of eternal damnation; this repentance makes a glorifier, rather a sinner.

7) This is a very true saying, and more excellent than all the teachers' teachings on repentance that have been given so far: Never doing is the highest repentance, the best repentance is a new life.

8) ^a) In no way shall you refrain from confessing venial sins, nor even all mortal sins. For it is impossible for you to know all mortal sins, therefore, in the beginning of the Christian Church, they confessed only the manifest mortal sins.

a) This, like much else, is cunningly picked out.

9) If we want to confess all sin purely, we do nothing else but leave nothing to the mercy of God to forgive.

10) No one's sins are forgiven unless he believes, when the priest releases him, that they are forgiven; indeed, sin would remain if he did not believe it to be forgiven. For the forgiveness of sin and the gift of grace is not enough, but one must also believe that sin is forgiven.

11) Thou shalt in no wise think thyself absolved because of thy repentance; but because of the word of Christ, "All things thou shalt redeem" 2c. Here, I say, you must believe that when you receive the priest's absolution, and firmly believe that you are absolved and absolved, then you are you truly absolve, be it about repentance, as it may.

12) If, which is impossible, a confessing person does not repent, and a priest absolves one not in earnest but in jest, if he alone believes that he is absolved, then he is truly absolved.

13) ^{b)} In the sacrament of penance and forgiveness of sins, the pope and a bishop do nothing more than the least priest; indeed, where there is not a priest, so does any Christian man, even if it were a woman or child.

b) Here he has finally fallen irretrievably. What profit will the Roman bishop lose if this is true? Further, who can presume to set right the chief priest, who is also the ruler of the temporal realm? Crucify him!

14) No one shall answer the priest that he has repented enough; neither shall the priest require it.

15) It is a great error of those who go to the sacrament of the reverend true body in such a way that they rely on the fact that they have confessed, that they know they are not guilty of any mortal sin, that they have prayed their prayer beforehand and prepared themselves beforehand; all of them eat and drink it for judgment; but if they believe and are confident that they want to obtain the grace of God through it, the same faith alone makes them pure and worthy.

16) I would be very sorry if the Christian Church, in a common council, decided and suspended the giving of the reverend Sacrament to the laity under both forms; even the Bohemians who take the Sacrament under both forms are not heretics, but schismatics.

17) The treasures of the Church, from which the pope gives indulgences, are not the merits of Christ and the saints.

18) Indulgence is a godly deception of believers,^c and remission of good works, and belongs to the number of things that may be used but are not useful.

c) Woe unto the servant of all servants, who spoils his stuff and deprives him of the hope of the most profitable gain. Hurry up with the fire!

19) Indulgences do not serve those who truly obtain them for the remission of the chastisement due for real sin before God's justice.

20) Those are deceived who believe that indulgences are beneficial and useful for the fruit of the Spirit.

21) Indulgences are necessary only for manifest great offenses, and are actually granted only to the hard and impatient.

22) Indulgences are neither necessary nor useful to six kinds of people, namely: the dead, or those who are about to die; the sick; those who are prevented by bona fide causes; those who have not committed offenses; those who have committed offenses but not publicly, and those who do better works.

23) The ban is only an external punishment and does not deprive man of the common spiritual prayers of the church.

24) Christians should be taught to love the ban more than to fear it. ^{d)}

d) You are completely in error and heresy, Luther. For, if in the future people should not desire indulgences and no longer fear excommunication, how will the Pope of Rome be able to maintain so many horsemen and footmen, a constantly armed army, so many musicians, so many halberdiers, and the two hundred Swiss specially appointed to his bodyguard? Will not the splendor and prestige of the church fall into the greatest contempt? Be wise for once!

25) The Roman Pontiff is a successor of St. Peter,^e) is not a governor over all churches of the whole world appointed by the Lord Christ in St. Peter's name.

e) You are not to be forgiven, Luther, for depriving the Roman pope of his rule. Where will you obtain forgiveness? I do not absolve you.

26) The word of Christ to Peter^f) [Matth. 16, 19.]: "All that you will loose on earth" 2c., extends only to that which was bound by Peter himself.

f) Jerome himself did not understand the words that deal with the given solution key, which the governor of Christ so often refers to in this bull. For thus he speaks in explanation of the Gospel of Matthew: "Neither the bishops nor the priests understand this saying. According to the arrogance of the Pharisees, they condemn the innocent and absolve the guilty, while God does not look at the pronouncement of the priests, but at the life of the guilty. Thus, Augustine was probably not of the same opinion when he wrote that the Church was not built on Peter, but on Christ Himself. How did Origen, Bede and many others not stumble here? Therefore, it is up to the pope (on whom the church is founded) to explain the holy scripture according to his liking and pleasing moods. Whoever contradicts is a heretic and devil's child, and must be burned. For this Leo of ours has become a lion who has learned to catch the prey and to devour men.

27) It is certain that it is not in the power of the Church or the Pope to make articles of faith, nor laws of morals or good works.

28) If the pope means one thing or another to a large part of the church, and should not err, it is not sin or heresy to disagree, especially in a matter that is not necessary to salvation until a common concilium has rejected one and confirmed the other.

29)^g) We are free to interpret the decisions of the conciliar authorities, to speak freely against their actions and to judge their decisions, and to confess only what seems true to us, whether it is rejected or confirmed by the conciliar authorities.

g) The reader should listen to Luther himself, who discusses this matter, and not worry about those who take it out of context.

30)^h) Some articles of John Hus, which are condemned in the Concilio of Constance, are completely Christian, true and evangelical, which even the whole of common Christianity could not condemn.

h) This is neither untrue, nor is Luther alone of the opinion, but here every pious person agrees. You, too, as I know, would approve of much about this man, and detest the badly put together articles, if the illness that now makes you insane would only leave you for a while.

31) The righteous sins in any good works.

32) A good work done at its best is a venial sin.

33) Burning the heretics 1) is against the will of the Holy Spirit.

i) "To burn the heretics." So we hold that it is not lawful for you to kill anyone, not even a heretic, as you were commanded first by Christ and then by Paul, who said, "If he does not hear the church, consider him a pagan and a tax collector, and avoid him." So we also think that it is of little use to you that you take such cruel counsel against them, lest, when your whole court, which is teeming with even more vile heretics, goes up in fire, you also be seized by the neighboring flame and perish.

34) To war with the Turks^k) and to quarrel is to fight against God, who visits our sin through them.

k) The Turkish wars have brought you popes unspeakable profit, since you have drawn as much money from Germany as you liked, so that the military campaign could be directed into action, which you were never really serious about. For

If the Turks were once to be completely subdued, what enemy would you invent to fight in the future? Therefore, dear Leo, you should not be so displeased with the Germans that they have not listened to your irritations against the infidels for two years. For it seemed to everyone a deception, and opportunity to satiate your avarice by this invention.

35) No one knows for sure that he does not always sin mortally because of the exceedingly secret vice of courting.

36) Free will after sin is a thing in name only, and if it does what is in it, it sins mortally.

37) Purgatory cannot be proven from the Scriptures, which are in the Canon.

38) The souls in purgatory are not certain of their bliss, at least not all of them; nor is it proven by reasonable causes or scriptures that they are outside the state of merit or increase of love.

39) The souls in purgatory sin without ceasing as long as they seek rest and are terrified of the punishments.

40) The souls who are freed from purgatory by the help of the living are less blessed than if they had done enough by themselves.

41) The ecclesiastical prelates and secular princes would not do badly if they got rid of all begging bags.

1) You certainly have concern for yours, otherwise you would be of the same opinion as Luther and us, if you were to be asked about your conscience. For "those who walk according to the flesh are carnally minded, but those who walk according to the spirit are spiritually minded. What is the use of going to so much trouble to condemn Luther, when you could do it with little? Namely, if you were to say briefly and in a single word (which is the difficult thing that happened to you from him): because he attacked your tyranny, and therefore he is a heretic, and something else more annoying. For you would easily overlook all other errors.

But, dear rude Leo, you must also consider whether it is also your office to suppress your brother and to deceive him in trade, because the Lord is an avenger of all this. We know that Luther will not give in to you, because such a brave mind cannot revoke the truth that he once undertook to defend. You, I fear, will resist. But what could you possibly do against the truth? especially since your whole cause is based on ambition and money. Now, according to Paul [1 Tim. 6:10], "avarice is the root of all evil, which some have lusted after, and have gone astray from the faith, causing themselves much pain.

To flee the honor of the world, and to renounce all ambition, Christ first taught by his example, in that he did not give in to worldly rule.

but humbled himself so that he took on the form of a servant. Then the apostles, John saying, "Love not the world, neither the things that are in it." And Paul instructs his Philippians thus [Cap. 2,3]: "Do nothing by strife or vain glory, but by humility esteem one another better than yourselves."

Well then, what are you allowed to desire in the worldly sphere, since Paul calls you a steward of God and commands you to suppress all temporal desires? Above all, you should be an example to the faithful in words, in conduct, in love, in faith, in chastity, and above all choose the way of truth. But [Ps. 119,30.]: "I have chosen the way of truth" (as Ambrosius says), no one can say with the psalmist, who seeks the temporal, and drives business. For this is not seeking the way of truth, as one desires to possess, or seeking the honor of this world and what is in the world with cares. And of Peter, that he might be counted worthy to feed Christ's sheep, he required nothing more than that he should love him. How this love should be, teaches John Cap. 3:18: "Little children, let us not love in word, nor in tongue, but in deed and in truth. By this we know that we are of the truth." And Beda, an author not to be despised, says: "There are people who feed Christ's sheep not out of love for Christ, but either for their honor, or their lust for power, or for profit. Paul complains about these in his letter to the Philippians.

I wanted to remind you of this in a broad way, so that it would never occur to you that you think to separate and deter us from the love of God and the truth by such bulls. For we trust in the Lord, "with whom," as Job says [Cap. 12:13, 16, 21], "is strength and wisdom. He knows the one who does wrong and suffers. He pours contempt on princes, and lifts up the oppressed." Answer me: Who has ever been abandoned who has remained in the commandments of God? Therefore, dear Leo, we are not afraid of your wrath and rage. For you cannot possibly overthrow God's judgment seat, before which you must stand with us. To this we appeal with the prophet, and say: "Let the righteousness of the righteous be upon him. This is our hope.

If you want to hear me, do not condemn your brother unheard. Rather, let error give way to truth after it has been made manifest, as Zosimus reminded us at the Carthage Concilium. But because I have delayed you more than necessary, continue now with the bull.

9. which errors according to that (respectivs)^a) how poisonous, how annoying, how seductive^b) for the godly and simple minds, and finally how utterly they are against all love^c) and against the reverence for the holy Roman church, the mother of all believers,^d) and a mistress of faith,^e) also against the nerve of Christian discipline,^f) that is, the obedience/ which is a fountain and origin of all virtues, without which everyone is easily convicted that he is an unbeliever/) is not hidden from any reasonable man").

- a) What do you mean by respective? Say it clearly so that we understand you.
- b) Considering your insatiable avarice.
- c) Here touch yourself by your conscience, Leo. Unless you call the servile submission shown to you love.
- d) A violent tyranny, which neither can nor should be, and which must be bravely resisted at this time.
- e) Good God, what kind of a faith-mistress is this, who eradicates all faith and fidelity, and teaches us to be perjurers by setting aside the oath! She is so far removed from religion that in Rome it is a mockery to be called a good Christian. But she ridicules you, and considers your holy gospel a poem and a fable. Punish us, Christ, if this is not so.
- f) Egg, what a powerless body it is that is governed by such nerves!
- g) "One must obey GOD more than men," dear Leo. But you (we speak to you with the apostles [Apost. 5, 29.]), if it is right in the sight of God to hear you more than God, judge us. What Christ teaches, we must follow in words and deeds.
- h) I believe that we would be unbelievers if we obeyed you, especially if, as has happened for three whole years now, you command us to do evil things, so that the truth is not honored, or if we followed you, you give permission for the worst shameful deeds for the sake of money, if you impose it, as can be seen from your bulls, of which all Germany is full.
- i) Would you consider the one who did so to be reasonable?

10. ^fAccordingly, in the matters touched upon, as the most important,^a) we desire to proceed diligently,^b) as is proper, and to bequeath the way to this pestilence and devouring disease, lest it creep on in the field of the Lord,^c) like a noxious thorn hedge),^{de}) and have diligently considered the errors touched upon, and each of them in particular, ^g) and after careful consideration, and after everything has been considered and often discussed according to the right custom, with our venerable brothers,^h) of the holy Roman church cardinals, and the superiors of the ecclesiastical orders or general church servants, and many otherⁱ) of the holy scripture and both rights teachers or masters, namely the most experienced ones: we have found/) that the same errors *respective*ⁱ) (as thought) are either not catholic^m) articles, and as such are not to be presented as doctrinesⁿ) but against^o) the doctrine or leprosy of the catholic church, and against the right interpretation of the holy scripture, which is accepted by the church; whose reputation St. Augustine^p) thought to have to yield so much, that he said, he would not have believed the gospel, if the reputation of the church had not been added to it. For from these errors, or from one of them, or from some of them, it follows publicly^a) that the same church, which is governed by the Holy Spirit,^f) is wrong and has always been wrong. Which is undoubtedly contrary to that,^s) which Christ promised his disciples at his ascension (as one reads in the holy gospel of Matthew), saying: "I am with you to the end of the world"; t also contrary to the provisions of the holy fathers,^u) also of the concilia, and the express decrees of the popes or the canons, which are not obeyed, as Cyprianus^v) testifies, has always been a tinder and cause of all heresies, and division of Christendom.

- a) To you they are, even though you called them little before.
- b) As your avarice brings it with it. Or else, as is fitting; yet not to a pope or a bishop, but to a king and to a Leo, you who do this with proud eyes and an insatiable heart.
- c) In which you, like your predecessors, intended to dig and rage, but you are prevented from doing so by us and therefore gnash your teeth. But so that I touch the matter as it is: Are you not ashamed, most holy one, to call your filthy junk trade the Lord's field? and do you not see that Germany is getting eyes again, and notices as well as you do what kind of deceit you are covering up your avarice with?
- d) You have never used a more correct simile, because in this thorny bush you are now already too entangled and anxious.
- e) It will continue to spread where you do not stop it. I tell you beforehand.
- f) Woe to you popes, who let the kingdom of heaven to men!
- g) See and admire Leo's diligence and care.
- h) Who also see that they must starve and suffer hunger.
- i) To whom also belongs something of the robbery, which we nevertheless prevent so confidently.
- k) Be careful what the diligent shepherd will find after so much applied effort.
- l) But I would like to know what that means respectively. Dear, tell us, what do you have in mind when you condemn Luther?
- m) You meant to say Roman.
- n) You act cautiously.
 - o) That is beautiful. They have accustomed their tongues to speak lies, and are diligent to do evil. But, O Lord, why do you not look upon the scornful, and keep silent to him who tramples underfoot him who is more righteous than he?
 - p) An important cause. But do you think that Augustine, if he were alive now, would attach this to you and your church? Therefore, stop, of these holy men, and "to turn their writings perversely to your benefit, q) This indeed does not follow, but that poverty is upon you, your protonotaries and creatures.

- r) As if the world did not know, and the many public complaints did not show it, that all this happens in Rome on the Florentine instigation, and that this and that from your city administer the church, without whose preconsciousness and consent you also dare to do nothing. How often have you been reminded that you should not call your godless mob and assembly the holy church!
- s) Behold, is not Leo a zealous advocate of evangelical doctrine?
- t) He will also be, and will push you down as one who is mighty in unrighteousness, so that you will not fall burdensomely to the wretched and lowly, and will exalt them. He will break your arrogance, and level this pharisaical height. For he seeth how ye lay ropes, and spread nets over Thabor, and therefore will say [Ps. 14:4.], "Will none of the wicked take notice, that devour my people, that they may feed?" He sees how you practice tyranny with the highest injustice against the Christian people, and will say, "If you will not hear, and take to heart that you give glory to my name, I will send poverty among you, and curse your blessing. For I, the LORD, that is my name, will not give my glory to another [Isa. 42:8]. So the Lord will be with us; if we were not sure of this, we would not have been so courageous in resisting you.
- u) Say: of those bishops who wanted the church to be a secular kingdom and set themselves up as kings in it.
- v) Where are you dragging the holy martyr? He will certainly not give any testimony.

11. Therefore, with the same^a) of our venerable brethren's counsel and consent, also of all and every mature concern touched before, out of the Almighty God and the holy apostles Peter and Paul, and our power,^b) all and every touched article or error (as reported), respective as heretical, or vexatious, or false, or injurious to godly ears, or seducing simple minds, and contrary to Christian truth, condemn, disapprove, and utterly reject, and for condemned, disapproved, and rejected by all believers in Christ of both sexes,^c) in virtue of this bull recognize and declare, and forbid in virtue^d) of the holy obedience, and with penance of the highest ban already pronounced, also against the clergy and religious, also episcopal, ^e) also patriarchal, archiepiscopal or other high churches, also monasteries, priories and convents, and all kinds of^f) dignities or ecclesiastical fiefs, secular or all other ecclesiastical orders deprivation, and incapacity to the same, and others henceforth.

- a) Do not abuse your power in the Gospel. Remember Paul's words, "There is therefore nothing condemnable in them that are in Christ JEsu, who walk not after the flesh."
- b) See, Leo, in what matter you usurp God's authority, and do not abuse the power that the Lord gives you to build and not to demolish. In truth, whoever usurps power unjustly deserves hatred. Remember also that God's counsel is not in the power of man, for He will have truth and will reward abundantly those who practice pride.
- e) You won't make a difference.
- d) We are immovable because you do not seek what is divine but what is human.
- e) He lists his satellites here.
- f) He would rather have everything destroyed than see his predation prevented.

12. But towards the convents, chapters or houses, or godly places of the clergy or secular, also of the beggars, also of the universities and high schools [at loss] of all kinds of privileges, graces and liberties, granted by the apostolic see^a) or its legates, or else in other ways, which wording they are, also of the name and the power to have a high school, to read and interpret some kinds of sciences and faculties, and of the incapacity to obtain the same or others henceforth; also of the office of preaching and the loss of the high schools, and all privileges and liberties thereof.

- a) That's how you do it, popes: the one curtails the other's actions, and you write in front of your bulls: To the everlasting remembrance of the thing, and want to persuade us all that what you set should always be valid. Who then will adhere to you, since it is certain that one of your descendants will overturn this judgment of yours?

But against the secular,^a) with the same ban and loss of all lease¹) and feudal estates, obtained from the Roman church and in all kinds of ways,^b) also the inability to get to the same or to others in the future. Also against all and any of the above-named, at prohibition of the consecrated burial^c) and incapacity to all and any legal acts, the infamy, the lack of credibility (diffidationis), and at the slandering of the majesty insulters and the heretics and their favorers, expressed in rights, with the fact and without further explanation, by all and any of the above-named, if they (that be far)^d) would do against it, to suffer: thereof by virtue^e) of no force and clauses also in letters of confession,^f) of which persons, with

The only person who may absolve and release them is the pope or someone else who has special authority over them, except in cases of mortal danger^g).

- a) Spare the worldly arm, dear Leo, so that you also keep something that you could use against us in the end.
- b) Hear ye the ruler! So who is free from Leo's rule? Or whom does he not mean to seize with his claws? But I am addressing you, you shepherd Leo. Why do you meddle in worldly affairs, you who fight under the banner of Christ? Does this represent Christ's place, to draw to yourself what Christ does not approve?
- c) O outrageous cruelty! Are you also allowed to rage against the dead? When will you set limits to your tyranny?
- d) Rather, let it be so, that many may bravely submit to rage against you.
- e) He also tramples on his antics here, and God wanted him to trample on these alone.
- f) Which we had bought and paid for after all.
- g) We 2) will ask to be solved, because yes we will feel bound!

14. To all and every^a) believer in Christ of both sexes, lay and clergy, secular and all ecclesiastical orders, and other persons, of whatever rank, degree and nature they are, and of whatever ecclesiastical or secular dignity they are, also to the Holy Roman Church Cardinals,^b) Patriarchs, Primates, archbishops, bishops, patriarchal, archiepiscopal, foundation and lower church prelates, clerics, and other ecclesiastical persons, secular and all orders,^c) also the beggars, elders, priors or general church servants, or special brothers, or exempt or non-exempt clergy; also the universities and high schools, and secular, and all sorts, also the Beitelorden assembly.

- a) This is a digression of the Leonese power. But it is the kingdom of the Lord, and he rules over the nations. This one will soon call: The roar of the lion, the voice of the lioness, and the teeth of the young lions are broken. And since you so often cite Jerome as a witness to us, hear what he thinks of this roar of yours: We see, says he, that the princes and heads of the church thus thunder upon the subject people, and trample with tyrannical voice and sensitive invective, that it should be thought there was no shepherd of the flock, but a lion among the sheep. Should we not stop our ears before your roar and not listen attentively to the voice of a shepherd, wherever he may be, who feeds the sheep out of love for Christ and not out of greed for money, and stubbornly follow him?

1) In Latin: snapUiboosis, for which will probably be read enazu.

2) Erlanger: nos; Wittenberger and Jenaer: non. We have assumed the former..

- d) Spare the bellies of so many who have a good appetite, so many brave gluttons and drunkards, so many learned dice players and gallant whore hunters. Spare Leo, at least so many gentlemen, so that if they have done something wrong while drinking, it will not be counted as a mortal sin for them.
- e) Spare ours likewise, angered Leo, as the work of your hands.

15. Likewise the kings,^a) the emperor's electors, princes, dukes, margraves, counts, barons, captains, escorts, squires and all officials, judges, and all public clerks, ecclesiastical and secular, communes, universities, universities, authorities, cities, castles, lands, regions, or their citizens and inhabitants, also all other persons, clergy or religious, as thought, all over the world, before living in the German country^b), or in the future therein: that they shall not say,^c) confess, defend, or with anything, publicly or secretly, with the search of some mind or color, silently or expressed favor to show^d) the touched errors, or some of them, or such wrong doctrine.

- a) Leo's dominion is infinite, and therefore so much more burdensome. What a dangerous thing it is to admit Leo into a commonwealth! For once you, Leo, have been admitted, you also want to be nourished. Now this cannot be done in any other way than by what is robbed from us. Would to God we had heard the Greek poet. But you may be fed by those who have accepted you. We must follow the apostles, according to the appointment we have received from them, and speak out against you, because you are disorderly and a burden to us. Jerome, in whom you think highly, is of the opinion that it will be useful for you to be brought down from your pride, and that you will be able to go the right way all the better afterwards.
- d) Where everything went well for you robbers, and yet you often roar about it, so that you make its land a wasteland.
- o) Even the most secret counsels are directed by Leo alone, but the church does not judge about hidden things.
- ck) This servant of all servants also presumes the right over our favor.

16) Furthermore, because said errors and many others are contained in the books or writings of one Martin Luther^a), we condemn, disapprove and reject entirely said books, and all of said Martin's writings or sermons, found in Latin or other languages, in which said errors, or one of them, are contained, and want them to be held entirely condemned, disapproved and rejected, as said, and command^b) in

By the power of holy obedience, and by the said pleas, to fall therein by deed, all and every believer in Christ of both sexes, who are above named, to refrain in no way from reading such writings, booklets, sermons or notes, or chapters contained in them, which contain the errors or the above-mentioned articles, to read,^c) to say, to preach, to praise, to print, to publish or to defend, by themselves^d) or another, or others, outright or not outright, silently or expressed, publicly or secretly, in their or other houses/) in common or special places. Yes, they are to burn the same immediately, after announcement of this bull, in all places where they will be, diligently searched by the ordinaries and other above-mentioned, publicly and solemnly in the presence of the clergy and the people, at all and every above-mentioned pleas.^f)

- a) Listen, with what emphasis!
- b) You won't cool anything down, because it is already rooted deeper than that it may be eroded by you.
- c) Take care of the word bounce.
- d) How the Roman scribes, the bull makers, are so rich in words!
- e) He does not pass over anything, even, where is even a little bit that is not filled in? This is called being an orator and understanding Latin.
- f) You have lived, it is now over!

17 As for Martinus, pious God,^a) what have we omitted, what have we not done, what paternal love have we shown to bring him back from such errors. For when we cited him, desiring to deal with him most kindly^b), we summoned him, and both by various actions, with our legate^c) kept him, and by our writing reminded him to desist from such error; or else to come to us with safe conduct^d) and with needful food,^e) without all fear and timidity,^f) which perfect love^g) should cast out, and to speak according to the example of our Savior and the apostle Paul,^h) not secretly,ⁱ) but publicly and in plain sight. And if he had done the same, truly,^k) than we respect, he would have come to himself again, and would have recognized his errors, and would not have found so much error in the Roman court,^l) which he reviles so much, in that he accuses the evil-minded of vain rumors more than he should. We would also have taught him most inexplicably that the holy popes, our ancestors, whom he blasphemes unjustly against all discipline, have never erred in their canons or statutes, which he presumes to bite and refute.^m) For as the prophet [Jer. 8:22] says: There is no lack of ointment or physician in Gilead.

- a) Behold, how meek! Here he accepts the voice of the lambs, who just now roared so cruelly that he frightened all men with the thunder of his words.
- b) Yes, "in the kindest way", as if one did not know how far you would have gone!
- c) Also in the future do not trust them, Luther, whatever good they talk you into believing. For their dwelling is deceit. They talk to their neighbor in a friendly manner, but in their heart they think evil.
- d) He admits that there is danger in the future.
- e) We know you bought man's blood so that you could shed it according to your pleasure.
- f) You feared nothing but what was happening, that he would not come.
- g) Notice. Leo has a perfect love. Who would have believed such a thing shortly before?
- h) "After the example!"
- i) Did he speak in secret who filled almost all of Europe with his preaching?
- k) This at least we believe: once he would be in your hands, he should not be able to speak anything in the future.
- l) Then you will force people not to know what they see or know. After all, what do you not take the liberty of? Do you want to persuade us that the city of Rome is not a puddle of all evil, a dwelling place of the worst shameful deeds, a container of all disgrace and the most shameful vices, a residence of all pestilence, and a general and harmful plague of human life?
- m) Are you not ashamed, Pabst, and do you not blush over any lie? You would certainly not write such things if greed for money did not lead you away from the path of all respectability.

18) But he has always disobediently not listened, and disregarded the mentioned citation, and everything and anything mentioned above, disregarded to come,^a) and up to the present day disobediently and with hardened mind suffered the church punishments longer than one year; and what is even worse, added evil to evil, although he had knowledge of the touched citation, put himself in the voice of the sacrilegious appeal^b) to a future Concilium, against the decree of Pius II. ^c) and Julius II. ^d) of our ancestors, in which it is decreed that those who so appeal shall be punished as heretics^e). For he has appealed to the help of the Council in vain who publicly confesses that he does not believe it^f).

- a) To whom is it unknown why you so eagerly desire to see Luthern in Rome?
- b) This is finally the knavery, and the main vice of all crimes, to appeal to a future Concilium!
- c) You put here the godless decree of an arch-cheat before our eyes. Who will accept it, especially of those whose eyes have been opened? O, what deceit and violence!
- d) You mention of a holy man....

- e) This is finally to abrogate all justice and equity, and to fill God's house with fraud and injustice. This is what I ask you: Do you popes not believe in a supreme judge who will one day demand strict accountability from you? Certainly, you do not believe it. For if you believed in a God, you would not do everything in such a presumptuous way. Therefore, we leave you with a clear conscience. For you deceive us and, as much as there is in you, you corrupt us.
- f) What do you say, murderer of the concilia? Does Luther do this?

So, that we could proceed against him, as publicly suspicious of the faith, yes, truly as a heretic, without further citation or delay to his condemnation as a heretic, and to all and every transcribed penalties and severity of church punishments. ^a) Nevertheless, with the same of our brethren's counsel,^b) we have followed the Almighty God's gentleness^c) who does not want the death of the sinner, but that he be converted and live [Ezek. 18,23.], forgetting all insults that have been inflicted on us and the apostolic chair so far, decided to use all possible piety^d) and to be as much as we can be^e) about it, so that he may get right again according to the presented way of mercy, and step away from touched errors, so that we may accept him again as the prodigal^f) son [Luc. 15,19.], coming again to the bosom of the church^g) graciously.

- a) What he was able to do, he did not want to do. Who accuses Leo of this?
- b) Behold the humility of these venerables!
- c) O the incredible gentleness! Nobody thought that Leo could be so kind, especially if he could murder.
- d) Leo could also be pious if we allowed him to rob and rave on and on as he pleased.
- e) What are you striving to show a good way to seek love, love to which you have given your ways through pride and malice, and under whose wings blood of poor and innocent souls has been invented?
- g) That wasteful Luther! He has so lavishly and superfluously misappropriated the Protestant doctrine.
- g) How often must it be impressed upon you that we have nothing to do with your church, nor do we want to agree with your scribes? Unless rather you come to better sense, renounce avarice, and cleanse your hands of gifts.

20) Therefore, through the heartfelt mercy^a) of our God, and through the sprinkling^b) of the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, with which and through which the redemption of the human race and the edification of the Holy Mother, the Church, have been accomplished, we wholeheartedly admonish and implore the same Martinus and all his followers, keepers and favorers, they want to stop disturbing the peace, unity and truth of the church,^c) for which the Blessed One so imploringly asked the Father [Joh. 17, 11.], and completely renounce such pernicious errors^d). So, if they really obey and assure us of their obedience by sufficient proof and display,^e) they shall find the opinion of fatherly love^f) and open wells of kindness and meekness^g) with us.

- a) Paul commands you to put on heartfelt compassion, to be kind, gentle, humble and patient, but to our great sorrow we must see the opposite, that instead of compassion you have put on cruelty, instead of patience you have put on anger; for righteousness you have put on unrighteousness, and to make it short, for virtues you have put on vice, that is, for Christ, who is God, you have put on the Antichrist, the devil.
- b) I am surprised, since you are such a one, that you can talk like this, write like this, pretend like this and disguise yourself.
- c) Leo certainly wants to rule, but I fear whether he will be able to, since Germany is in such a state of flux.
- d) For from this arises the paucity of so many venerable ones, and great lack to the Lord Himself.
- e) We like to believe that you would give a great drum if we concealed the truth, left our German empire to you, and served you as our unjust lord.
- f) Pack yourself with your love, Father Leo, we know what it is like.
- g) You dare to call yourself a fountain of gentleness and goodness. O ungodliness! In truth [2 Pet. 2, 17], "these are fountains without water, and clouds driven about by the whirl of the wind, to whom is reserved darkness for ever". Therefore, Leo, you do not judge yourself by this. For we will not forsake the Lord, the fountain of living waters, nor dig wells that hold not water.

21) Nevertheless,^a) forbid Martin now and henceforth to refrain from all preaching or from preaching altogether. Otherwise,^b) so that the same Martin, if the love of righteousness and virtue did not turn him away from sin, and the hope of forgiveness did not bring him back to repentance, the horror of punishment^c) would force him to discipline: We request and remind the same Martinum, his followers, assistants,^d) favorable^e) and upholders, in virtue of this writing, by virtue of holy obedience, and by all and every sound touched, to fall into it by deed; and earnestly command,^f) that within sixty days/) of which we appoint twenty for the first, twenty for the other, and the other twenty for the third term, from the attachment of this Bull, in places hereinafter described, to be counted immediately following.

- a) He forbids Luther to teach the truth, because the ears of the city of Rome are not inclined to listen to it. But this one will not obey after he has once chosen the way of truth.
- b) He tries everything, and as they say, he moves heaven and earth so that he may not lose dominion. That is how unwilling the tyrants are to be cast out.
- c) He imagines that these horrors would still move us, and does not know how much Germany is now changed.
- d) Dear one! Where will he be able to turn and escape?
- e) Help heaven, how many good and honest men he calls to Rome! The city will not be able to hold them all. But, dear Leo, see to it that you do not overwhelm yourself with so many guests. At least, if others listen to me, we will come to you.
- f) Good God! We have other lords without you, and we only remember your name.
- g) The days are not enough, dear Leo, especially for those who are afflicted with podagra and other diseases, who have to be carried in litters, nor for the infirm who are forced to walk on crutches.

22) That the same Martinus, his adherents, followers and said holders, completely renounce the said errors, their preaching, publication, assertion and defense, also the publication of the books or writings, about the same or some of them; and burn all and every books or writings, which have touched errors, or some of them in any way in them,^a) or procure to burn them. Also that the same Martinus completely revokes such errors and opinions,^b) and of such revocation^c) by public, legally valid documents,^d) sealed by two prelates' hands, to be sent to us within another equal sixty days;^e) or else by himself (if he wanted to come to us, which would be most pleasing to us)^f) with touched most perfect escort, which we now hereby give, so that no doubt^g) about his true obedience may remain.

- a) You have obtained it. You burn, but in the hearts of the pious. O, a fire very harmful to you! Extinguish it now, if you can.
- b) He will call again and cry out again, and never cease to repeat the word of truth, so that it will not be forgotten.
- c) Very carefully.
- d) That is: according to the form of the apostolic chamber, e) If he wanted to follow me, he should send it over, so that you may see it to your greatest pain.
- f) For then you would be free to kill the preacher of truth. And it is not without reason that you try to lure Luther so often.
- g) You are even gentle in the matter.

23) Otherwise, if (this is far)^a) the named Martinus, his assistants, supporters, followers and keepers show themselves otherwise, or do not fulfill and carry out all and every of the aforementioned within the specified time with the work, following the teaching of the holy apostle [Titus 3:10], who teaches a heretic man according to the first and second punishment. Who teaches a heretical man to shun after the first and second punishment: we now, then and again,^b) the same Martinus, his adherents, followers, favorers and keepers, and each of them, as dry grapevines, which do not abide in Christ [Joh. 15, 6.], but teaching and preaching a repugnant doctrine, contrary to the Christian faith, or vexatious, or damned, not to little offence of divine majesty and of the whole Christian church and faith disgrace and shame, also diminishing the keys^c) of the church, having been public and stiff-necked heretics, and still being, by pre-touched power recognizing: condemning the same as such by virtue of this scripture, and commanding them to be regarded as such by all believers in Christ of both sexes. And subject them, all and every one, to all the above-mentioned, and against such of the right suspended sounds, in virtue of this scripture, and thereby arrested^d) to have been and still to be, recognize and declare.

a) Because it will not be your benefit.

b) (Ex nunc prout extunc et e converso.) Beautiful figure of speech after the style of the Roman court!

c) We saw no keys, now ruler Leo, since you needed the sword with many thousands against the Duke of Urbino and shed Christian blood.

d) This is the apostolic net with which people are caught to perdition. O of the innovation!

24. Furthermore, we forbid all and any of the above-mentioned Christians, by all and any of the above-mentioned offenses, to fall into it, so that they do not in any way submit to reading, claiming, preaching, praising, printing, or publishing writings, even those that do not contain the above-mentioned errors,^a) that were somehow made or published by the same Martin, or that he would henceforth make and publish, or some of them, as being made by a man who is an enemy of the Christian faith, and therefore very suspicious, and that his memory^b) be entirely blotted out from the society of the believers in Christ, to read, to claim, to preach, to praise, to print, to publish, or to defend, by themselves or another or others, outright or not outright,^c) secretly or publicly, silently or expressed, or else in their houses, or other places,^d) common or special places in no way to have; Yes, they shall burn them, as is reported.

a) Do you also condemn the wholesome writings of Luther? and do you uproot even the noblest seed with the weeds and burn it? This is called acting ungodly and forgetting yourself.

b) You wipe out the memory of him whom you would have accepted in grace now, if he would return. By such a performance you make yourself unbearable, so that all honest men will try to destroy you.

c) But, tell me, is it also not allowed to look at them through the lattice? I am surprised at you, what you do in such idle time in Rome, that you do not learn to speak Latin. Let this be a barbarity to me!

d) Not even in the underground burial places?

25 We also remind^a) all and each of the above-mentioned believers in Christ, at the time of the highest ban, to avoid the above-mentioned, declared and condemned heretics, who do not obey our commandments, after the end of the above-mentioned term, and to avoid as much as is in them, nor to have intercourse or any company or fellowship with them or theirs, nor to give them their necessities^c) .

a) Hear another roar of Leo, of which the prophet Zephaniah said in days of old: The princes among them are roaring lions. Where is the quite admirable Jerome here, whom our Leo alone honors?

b) We are alone.

c) Nor shall they suffice for a night shear.

26. Also to more^a) disgrace^b) of the said Martinus and his assistants, favorers, followers and holders, in such a way after the course of the said term declared and condemned heretics, we command all and every Christian believers, patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, patriarchal, archiepiscopal, collegiate and lower church prelates, capitulars, and other ecclesiastical persons, seculars and all orders, also the beggars (especially the congregation to which the said Martinus has made profession, and in which he shall reside or abstain). Exempt and non-exempt; also all and every prince of all spiritual and secular dignities and honors, kings, emperors, electors, dukes, margraves, counts, barons, captains, lieutenants, squires, emperors, universities, powers, cities, lands, castles and regions, or their inhabitants and citizens, and to all and every person concerned throughout the world, before residing in German lands, we command that they, or each of them, at all and every pleas,^c) see the said Martinus, his assistants, followers, keepers and favorers personally^d) and hold them captive until our request, and send them to us. On the other hand, for such a good work of ours and the apostolic see.

- a) This roar will excite the worldly arm.
- b) All who do wrong shall be put to shame, c) Sieve, as he does not unite the church by love, like Christ, but compels it by force and terror, as befits a tyrant. Who will be able to suffer such a shepherd?
- d) Now, finally, it was necessary to have many courtiers to squeeze such a large person.
- e) A reward is promised to those who betray us, and a price is set on the head of the exiles. He is a true Roman. But tell me, dear Leo, what will you do on the day of visitation and misery, which will appear from afar? You will not be able to escape the future wrath of God!

27 Or that at least they and each of them be expelled from the archiepiscopal, episcopal, collegiate and other churches, houses and monasteries, convents, cities, dominions, universities, communes, castles, lands and villages, as the case may be, from all and any of the clergy and laity concerned. But all the cities, dominions, lands, castles, villages, counties, towns and villages where they are located, also the archiepiscopal, episcopal, collegiate and other churches, monasteries, priories, convents and ecclesiastical places, of whatever order (as said), where the named Martinus, or someone of the aforementioned, will go, as long as he stays there, and three days after his departure, we submit to the ecclesiastical interdict. ^{a)}

- a) He forbids the worship of God. Admire the piety of this pope, who recently wanted to be called the pacifist, as if a new Solomon had appeared to the world.

28. And so that all the foregoing may be known to all, we further command^a) all patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, patriarchal, archbishopric and other episcopal and collegiate prelates, capitulars, and other ecclesiastical and secular persons; also all the above-mentioned friars, clergy, monks, freedmen and freedwomen, wherever they are, and especially in German lands: That they and every one of them, at the touched church punishments and penalties, to fall therein by deed, proclaim Martinus, and all and every one of the above-named, who after the end of the term do not obey such of our commands or reminders, in their churches, on Sundays and other feast days, when most people are gathered together to the divine offices, as declared and damned heretics, and procure and command that this shall be proclaimed by others, and that they are avoided by everyone to the highest degree. Also to all believers in Christ, that they avoid them in the same way with the above-mentioned church punishments and penalties; and that they make the present letter, or its trustworthy copy, in the form described below, available for reading, proclaiming and posting in their churches, monasteries, houses, convents and other places.

- a) He does nothing else than commanding, designating, commanding, deciding, forbidding, resisting, frightening and threatening. Indeed, he shows himself as a ruler of the world. But listen, my Leo, do not puff yourself up, for God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble.

29. we also put under the highest ban^a) and curse all and every one, of whatever rank, degree, character, excellence, dignity and distinction, who procure, or in any way make, that this letter, or its certified copy, copy or copies, shall not be read, posted or proclaimed in their lands and dominions, by themselves or another or others, publicly or secretly, outright or not outright, silently or expressed.

- a) Finally the lion's fury comes to the highest, where, when it comes to hearing you under the great roar of your musicians, O Leo, I wish to know with what confidence you do this. Do you imagine that it is in your power to kill the souls that do not die and to wake up those that do not live? But why do you lie to the people of God who believe? Would it be wrong for us not only to bravely reject this wicked bull, like all others like it, but also to publicly kill the bulls?

Finally, because it would be difficult to bring^a this letter to every place where it would be necessary, we want, and decree by apostolic authority, that their certified copies, which are made and signed by the hand of a public notary, or printed in the worthy city of Rome and provided with the seal of an ecclesiastical prelate, shall be given place and perfect faith everywhere and in all places, in the same way as the main scripture would be given place and faith if it were shown and presented.

- a) To remove this difficulty, we have had it reissued. For it is very important to us that this brilliant bull of yours gets around as far as possible.

(31) And lest the said Luther, and all others above named, whom this epistle in any way concerns, should plead ignorance of this epistle and its contents, we will that these epistles should be placed at the doors of the cathedral of the Prince of the Apostles, and the apostolic chancery, also of the episcopal churches of Brandenburg, Meissen and Merseburg, are posted and proclaimed, recognizing that the proclamation of the same letters, so done, shall arrest the aforementioned Martinus and all others and any aforementioned, whom such letters in any way concern, as if this letter had been read and proclaimed by them personally on the day of such posting and proclamation, because it is not likely that with them that should remain unknown^a), what so publicly happens.

a) We know them well, but we do not want to acknowledge them, we are so obtuse.

32. This shall not be contrary to^a) the apostolic ordinances and orders, which are given to all and everyone, or to their one, or to all others, by the said apostolic see, or to those who have authority from it, under any form, also that of a letter of confession, and with all, even the very strongest clauses,^b) for whatever cause or great concern it is conferred or given to them, that they may not be placed under the interdict, suspended, or put under ban by apostolic letters, which do not perfectly and expressly avoid it from word to word, but do not indicate by general clauses that such a conferral is mentioned: The content, causes and form of the same conferral, just as if they had been inserted from word to word, so that it would be completely abrogated, we want to have considered expressed by this letter.

a) This lightning penetrates through everything, even if one opposes it with something apostolic. And so one devil casts out another; therefore one can hope that his kingdom, which has become at odds with itself, will soon fall.

b) These are like diamonds, and very expensive to buy.

33.^a) Therefore, it shall not be proper for any man to break this letter of our condemnation,^b) reprobation, decree, declaration, prohibition, will, commandment, exhortation, petition, request, remembrance, assignment, bestowal, banishment, excommunication and cursing, or to act contrary to it with sacrilegious thirst. But whoever would refrain from it, shall know that he will come into the disgrace of the Almighty God,^c) and of the holy apostles Peter and Paul. Given in Rome at St. Peter's, in the year of the Incarnation of the Lord 1520, on the seventeenth day before the first day of the month of Julius [June 15], our eighth year of the Papacy.

- a) Would that all and sundry read and understand this, so that they may recognize the tree from the fruit. This is what we wish above all, Leo. Far be it from us to want to flee this wretched edict of yours. This is therefore a testimony to your former way of life. Here the fruit will make you known.
- b) Leo titles this miserable decree of his with innumerable names.
- c) Which you have in your power. For what is good that you popes do not presume to do? But to these we answer with Tertullianus: If we are condemned by you, God absolves us. This shall separate us.

[Ulrich von Hutten's letter] to Leo X.

This is what we had to remember about your bull, Pope Leo. It would have been better if you had kept it at Rome with St. Peter and had it constantly hidden, than if you had made it known to the world and brought it to light, to your greatest shame (if there is still shame in you about dishonor). But that we may always remember thee in something right, it is necessary to set a measure to this insolence of thine, and to put a bit to such wanton bulls, that they may not pour themselves out more than is fair. Paul commands to avoid even the appearance of evil; the less you should be an annoyance and offense to the believers in Christ. For even these, especially in Germany, already have the conviction from the papal decrees, as they generally do with money, that the more recent it is, the worse it is. Beware of turning the truth of God into lies, and of preferring your human statutes, which are based only on money and ambition, to the word and commandments of God.

Above all, refrain from twisting the meaning of the holy scriptures in an ungodly way for the sake of gain, and from bewitching the minds of the faithful so that they do not obey the truth. For what do you undertake to give the appearance of goodness to your so evidently wicked deeds, since I, if you would make me take offense, could report to all a bishop in Germany, from whom you have extorted two hundred and forty thousand florins by force and fraud. Does this mean shearing the sheep? Or has the house of the Lord become a pit of murderers? Finally, resist your desires, and temper this your robbery. Thou trustest in lying words, and sayest daily, Here is the temple of the LORD, here is the temple of the LORD; and cryest peace, peace, and yet is no peace. For though thou you can deceive people through your deceptions, you will not remain hidden from the heart discerner.

But remember the flood of punishment, so that when it breaks like a flood, it does not also come upon you and your false church, and destroy the whole multitude of the vicious people in Rome at once. For what have you in Rome, apart from the innumerable host of your musicians and flatterers, but thieves, forgers, swindlers, robbers, or otherwise shameful people, who, like the bailiffs, lay ropes and snares to catch something every day. Moreover, do not provoke the defenders of truth so much in the future, lest you incur evil in the end. For many are already proclaiming this everywhere with the prophet [Isa. 59, 14. f.]: "Justice has receded, and righteousness has departed, for truth is falling in the street, and righteousness cannot go, and truth is gone, and he who departs from evil must be everyone's prey. Therefore, my advice is that you never take it upon yourself to persecute Luther and those who hold with him. For there are more of them than either you or any bishop could be at liberty to destroy so many souls, even if you were able to do so. You know how people have already grumbled against you in the past, that you hurl this thunder of yours so carelessly and without any cause, that you do not consider, when it will fall into contempt one day, how great an offense it will cause among the people.

Therefore, become accustomed to gentleness, and do not be of a disguised love, but of a Christian and sincere love. Present yourself to us as an example, and see to it not how you enrich yourself, but how we are fed. When you have decided this, feed us henceforth with science and doctrine, and not with bulls, for one is already tired of them. Your letters of indulgence, however, disgust us like nothing else. The true qualities of a pope are wisdom, purity, chastity, and contempt for all worldly things. Put these in your hands, and Germany will honor you when she sees that she is loved by you, and will not oppose you even if you make her afraid. For it is up to you to win all by kindness and not to force anyone by force. This is free, but true, as the thing itself is, and the times bring it with them. Farewell. From Germany.

Let us break their bands, and cast from us their cords [Ps. 2:3].

445: Excerpt from Ulrich von Hütten's letter to Elector Frederick of Saxony concerning the papal bull.

This letter is found in full in Burkhard's eoinELtar. de Huttisn. tntis ne meritis, xars II, p. 86; the excerpt in the Latin Wittenberg edition (1551), toru. II, col. 51. German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 133; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 451 and in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p. 314.

Oh, dear God, what a severe and terrifying bull has gone out against Martin Luther, so that one might well say that it is the roar of a cruel lion, so it resounds; who, when they hear the wretched sheep of Christ, recognize, fear and tremble not for a pious and faithful shepherd, but for the bloodthirsty voice of their worst enemy. For there is no Christian gentleness nor love, much less apostolic kindness and compassion to be felt, so he [Leo] rages and rages. Now, however, his cruel rage becomes more and more evident, the more he conceals and adorns it. Which this bull often shows, but especially in that it invites Luther to Rome as a guest; as if one did not know how they would deal with us if they offered us. If Luther were to come there willingly or by force, I am afraid I would have to follow. But if Luther obeys me, he will never come to his certain doom and slaughter in Rome.

(2) Of the harm and damage that we are and must suffer daily from their tyranny, there is no need to speak in many words, so that each one can understand for himself what it is. For we see it and become aware of it every day that there is almost no gold or silver left in Germany, or even that there is very little; the same is also being gathered up and led away every day by various tricks and new practices of the Holy Roman See. When this happens, it is so horribly abused that it is a disgrace to say so.

Do you now want to know, dear Germans, that I myself have seen what is being done with our money in Rome? Here it is: one part is divided by the pope among his friends and relatives, of whom he has so much that it has become a proverb to say: "The pope's Leo X brothers-in-law and blood relatives in Rome. The other part is consumed by the cardinals, of whom the father pope has made thirty-one in one day. There are so many assessors, protonotarii, abbreviatores, apostolic scribes, chamberlains, officials, and the like, many more of this devil's school, most noble and eldest, who still drag after themselves a great heap with many and great expenses, as namely, copists, pedants, runners, parlor keepers, donkey drivers, stable boys, whores and boys, and the like useless servants, an innumerable heap, and an army of whore-keepers. Above that they feed dogs and horses, monkeys and guenons and many strange animals more, in which they have their pleasure and joy; build beautiful houses of loud marble, decorate themselves with noble stones only according to their heart's desire, live and dress themselves exceedingly beautifully and deliciously, and thus pass the time in vain pleasure and joy.

4 In sum, there is an innumerable useless people in idleness at Rome, with our money and goods. There is neither concern for religion nor fear of God; the contempt is so great that I believe it is hardly found so great among the Turks. They lie and deceive, misrepresent, falsify, rob and steal, lie, talk and do all kinds of evil for the sake of the tiresome money and profit, seeking only how they may bring our money and goods out of Germany. And some live only so that they may eat and drink, have pleasure and all abundance. That is what our money does for Rome.

(5) For all this, Most Serene Prince, we send a great sum of money from here to Rome every year, and yet we do not realize that it comes to such shameful abuse, which we give to them so willingly and easily; yes, not only is such money lost, but what is worst of all, it becomes a matter and incentive for many great abominations and vices 2c.

446. D. Martin Luther's writing "Against the Bull of the Final Christ. Beginning of November 1520.

Soon after the publication of "von den neuen Eckischen Bullen und Lügen" Luther turned against the papal bull itself, first for the scholars in Latin in the writing: Väv6r8ii8 6X66rudil6ni ^,utieüristi duUum, which appeared at Wittenberg in the last days of October 1520 by Melchior Lotther. In the "Gesammtausgabe" it is found: in the Wittenberg (1551), toui. II, toi. 89 (wrong: 86); in the Jena one (1566), toru. II, toi. 286 d; in the Erlanger, OM. var. ur^, toin. V, p. 134, and in the Weimar, vol. VI, p. 597. Immediately thereafter, Luther, in order to render his "guilty Christian service" to the laity as well, reworked this scripture into German. While the Latin discusses only the first six sentences condemned in the Bull, there are twelve in the German adaptation.

On November 4, 1520, Luther wrote to Spalatin that the German "Gegenbulle" would now also be printed. After that our time determination. This German writing was also first published by Melchior Lotther in Wittenberg. In the editions: in the Wittenberg (1554), vol. VII, p. 49; in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 345; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 531; in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p. 324; in the Erlangen, I. ed, Vol. 24, p. 35; 2nd ed., Vol. 24, p. 38; and in the Weimarschen, Vol. VI, p. 614. We have followed the latter.

Against the Bull of the Final Christ.

Doctor Martinus Luther.

JESUS.

To all lovers of Christian truth, may God give His grace and peace, Amen.

1. It is almost obvious to everyone how I have now come into the third year, with the lying business of indulgences, by which the Christians have been harmfully and disgracefully deceived for many years and lost money, into a desolate trade and dispute, and the matter has been torn apart by some advocates of indulgences. Since they saw no reason to do so, the matter has been torn to such an extent that even papal authority and status are involved, by which alone they have so far obtained what they wanted, even though they were founded neither on scripture nor reason, and even believed and taught against all scripture and reason.

(2) For although they know that papal authority is often hardly wrong, and still errs daily, that they themselves cannot deny it, nevertheless, wherever they may have its will in their conduct, they are not only subject to imagine it to the simple people as an irrefutable truth of the faith of Christ, but make of this same papal authority, if and where they will, a Christianity or Christian church. And that is why they do it: Because they know, and it is true, that the common Christian church (that is, all Christians throughout the world) may not err, they smear our mouths; and in order that their blind suggestions may be received by the poor people for erroneous, certain, Christian truth, they pretend that what they thus enter by papal authority, which may err, the Christian church, which may not err, has entered; shall not be deceived for this reason alone, that the pope has fallen to them. So lead us by the nose, and as St. Peter [2. Epist. 2, 3.] said of them, with false fictitious words according to their avarice deal with us, that we should call the erring pope and let him understand the erring Christianity, but not before, because where they need his for their advantage; otherwise, as I said, they well confess that he may err and err.

(3) Oh, what error, wickedness, and deception have been driven into the poor people by such a charade under the holy name of the Christian church, and by the free usurpation of papal power! How many souls have been ruined, how much murder has been committed and blood shed, how many lands have been sucked dry and ruined, that it is dreadful to think of it; all of which has been accomplished by no other means than that they have pretended that their Christian church, the pope, may not be mistaken.

4. So also here, since they had seduced the ship, and the naked, unfounded, fraudulent indulgences brought to light, have come to shame, along with many other false teachings, which they have been forcibly pushing until now, and they now see that it may not stand either with writings or reason, they do as is their way and custom, seeking their last remedy, papal sacrilege and violence; They dare to condemn me and my books with naked, violent words of sacrilege, without any cause being shown, and to scold me heretically, to forbid and burn them.

Now I know well that art and sacrilege are two things, and I do not respect the unkind sacrilege; so burning books is so easy that even the children can do it, let alone the holy father Pabst and his high scholars, who it would ever be fine with me to think that they showed a little more art than burning books. About this I may say on my conscience that I would like nothing better than to have all my books perish, which I also only had to let go out to warn people against such errors, and to lead them into the libraries, so that they would gain understanding, and then let my little books disappear.

6 Oh God, if the understanding of the Scriptures were in us, there would be nothing in my little books; and God knows that I am not lying, if such my condemnation alone harms me.

would do. So I have staked my honor and life on it, so that I would not, if I were able to, want to break away from the sacrilege with a hair of my head; indeed, I would gladly be condemned from the papal sacrilege with all my heart in silence. But because Christ says [Matth. 10,32. 33. Luc. 12,8.]: "Whoever confesses me before men, I will confess him before my Father and his angels. Whoever is ashamed of me before men, I will also be ashamed of him before the angels of God," since I am obligated to promote the salvation of every one of my neighbors and to prevent his danger, and since I am now certain that the papal transgression and his own act without reason and cause, yes, out of pure ignorance and error against Christian truth, I must and cannot remain silent, revile the truth and let the souls be deceived, as God wills.

(7) Therefore, I hereby offer to each one my due Christian service, and as much as I like, warn him faithfully to forget me, and to be aware of his own soul, to be careful with all diligence that papal outrage does not drive him away from the truth, with his and his own pompous, inflated, fabricated words, in the bull that is said to have recently come from Rome against Doctor Luther. Let it be known to everyone that he does me no service by despising the sacrilegious, heretical, lying bull, again, no offense, whether he respects it. I am free by the grace of God, may not and will not take comfort in or be dismayed by any of these things. I know well where my comfort and defiance are, which is safe from men and devils. I will do my part, each one will answer for himself on his death and the last day, and then he will be well aware of my faithful warning.

(8) But lest anyone be excused for not knowing how to guard against such outrage and error, I will recount the articles condemned in the bull, and first show the Roman outlaws' blindness and wickedness.

(9) They write in the same bull that the articles which are told in a heap, some heretical, some erroneous, some vexatious, some seductive, some in Christian ears are insufferable, and thus make fivefold articles. But so pusillanimous is their own criminal, mischievous conscience, that they have not been allowed to speak or interpret the same articles clearly and differently; but pass a blind judgment on the whole heap, so that no one can know which ones they want to consider heretical, or erroneous, or vexatious, or seductive, or insufferable, and yet condemn them; so that they play such a fine fool's game that they want to have a difference of articles, and yet leave no one the difference, but hope that they will all be considered heretical by everyone, for the sake of their condemnation, without distinction. Are these not pious people to me?

(10) With what wisdom and prudence they save themselves from two dangers. The first, that they should not prove and give cause for their condemnation. The other, that if some denounced them as heretical, they would not be beaten to a pulp and found otherwise. But I hope that such prudence will be beautifully rewarded by prudence itself. 1) I will give them a spoon, that they try what they slur, the dear bullists. For I fear that the bull was made on a drunken evening, or in the dog days, and ask them, if heretical and erroneous are not one and the same, then it must certainly not be heretical, what is erroneous there, shall be different from the highly famous bull masterly difference. Thus, what is heretical need not be heretical nor erroneous, and so on. No part of the difference may be the other, otherwise there would be no difference.

Now this is ever publicly true, what is not heretical, that is Christian and divine. For Catholicum et hereticum, that is, Christian and heretical, are against each other without remedy, as Christ says [Luc. 11:23], "He that is not with me is against me"; item [Luc. 9:50], "That which is not against you is for you. Therefore, what is not heretically accused is already praised as Christian, since no error harms the church, but only heresy. For even if I may err, if I hold the pope to be holy and everyone to be pious, error is not heretical, nor damning, nor harmful. But if one condemns erroneous articles, then only harmful-

The same is true of the doctrines that make unbelievers and heretics. If all the errors of Christians were to be condemned, no Christian would remain, since no one is without sin and error. Therefore, it is clear that these bullists do not understand their own word, do not know what they slur.

12) Yes, their mischievousness continues in this, and they make a judgment about themselves, that they themselves are the very worst end-Christian heretics, who condemn and are ready to condemn the clearly recognized truth in and in themselves. I prove this from their own words: For since their own conscience urges and compels them to confess that the articles are not all heretical nor erroneous, they must not reproach them so highly, although they would gladly do so, if they did not fear another; so they publicly admit that they consider the same articles to be Christian and right in their hearts, and have no fault with them, except that they go beyond their art or against their erroneous opinions; thereby moved to hatred and vexation, not liking them, and inventing new censures, that they may condemn them as vexatious and unpleasant, which yet are true, right, and Christian, and not erroneous nor heretical, according to their own confession.

13) Are these not true chief heretics and unbelievers, who may publicly condemn the truth, which they themselves know, for no other reason than that it is offensive and annoying to them? 4) For Christ, all the prophets and apostles were also offensive to the chief priests and scholars, and for no other reason could a heretic, a seducer, a maniac, a sacrilegious man, a blasphemer be condemned, except that he was offensive to them.

(14) Since the Roman liars are invented by their own word as deniers and destroyers of the known truth, why should I fear them or suffer their condemnation unwillingly? Yes, God protect me, that only such people never praise or justify me, which would be the highest shame for me. But I have been urged by my guilty service to expose their such mischievousness.

2) "to eye" - to put before the eyes, to show oneself. -

3) In the original: Final deadlines heretic.

4) In the original: 'to be'.

1) In the original: "heiteren"; Dietz writes: "becheren".

The only way is to warn the poor simple-minded hearts against the endchrist poison, which are ready to condemn everything that displeases their blind head.

15 And that everyone may grasp with his fingers that they in Rome have not a thought to defend the truth, but do everything with false appearances and fabricated words, then notice: They themselves give me all the testimony that I have done right in resisting the preachers of indulgences, and confess that they have preached unjustly and falsely, shamefully deceiving the poor people and damaging them in body and soul. There is still no one in Rome to cite them, to banish them, to punish them, to force them to recant; here there is no one who is zealous for the truth; no cops can be made there, they all go out free and unharmed. Here they are merciful lords, and can see through their fingers without glasses, so that if they were pious and loved the truth, as they pretend, they would punish such blasphemous preaching against God, Christ and His Mother, which is done to corrupt souls, with the highest punishment.

16 But since they themselves have been touched by me, help God, they are forgotten; not only Rome, but heaven and earth must be stirred up, there one finds cops and bans, there one can write, and more than all devils maliciously; still they cry out for shepherds of Christ's sheep, and Christ's vicars, regardless of the fact that with such public play they seek their own benefit alone, throwing truth and all Christianity's need to the wind, so that they are not shepherds, but ravening wolves publicly recognized from their works. We Germans shall forever follow their false pretenses and fabricated words against God and our conscience.

(17) About this, so that no one would ever doubt that the evil spirit had issued the bull, they themselves write in explicit words that the little books should also be condemned and burned, since there is no error in them. Behold, is not this a Roman piece? Thus Christ shall overthrow the end-Christ, and cast him into a false perverse mind [Rom. 1:28]. What follows, then, that all who hold this bull and follow it shall deny God and His word, and teach no more than error and heresy? For if the booklets are to be condemned, since there is no error in them, as they clearly write, then truth must be condemned and error confirmed.

18 I am blamed for wanting to bring the laity to the neck of the pope, priests and monks. Does this mean that the laity is reconciled and the pope is excused, if I call them free with publicly insolent words and give them the right to burn the truth and right doctrine, and to accept lies and error, and put them in honor, then I no longer understand German or Latin. For I have held it until now: He who sets error above truth denies God and worships the devil; and this is what this highly famous bull wants to call us and force us to do with bannish dread.

(19) Until now, the children have acted in such a way that they have brought us error, covered with the appearance of truth. If this now wants to be revealed, and the deceitfulness cannot be hidden any longer, which they do not want to let go of, God gives them a spirit of deceit [Isa. 19, 14], which makes them as false as they deserve, so that they immediately start to defend their deceitfulness with violence and publicly known error and heresy. And that their lies may stand, they are so bold that they command us to deny publicly known truth, and to receive falsehood.

20 I have never desired nor waited for my enemies to so shamefully betray, revile and disgrace themselves with their own words. What shall I dispute with them, when they themselves freely confess, without constraint, that they condemn, since there is no error within? Which, if they had not written it themselves, would have been incredible to all the world. But so shall it be with all who willfully act against divine truth, that they disgrace and blind themselves, as it is written of divine wisdom, that it makes liars of all who would disgrace it [Wis. 10:14].

What wonder would it be if princes, nobles and laymen beat the pope, bishops, priests and monks over the heads and chased them out to the country? It has never been heard before in Christendom, and it is terrible to hear that one should publicly command your Christian people to deny, condemn and burn truth. If this does not mean heretical, erroneous, annoying, seductive, offensive to all Christian ears, then all things are newly reversed. From this, I hope, it is obvious that not Doctor Luther, but the pope himself wants to wrestle with bishops, priests and monks by this blasphemous bull of shame after their own accident, and to load the laity gladly on their neck.

(22) What Christian heart can suffer or hear it being commanded publicly, without any pretense, to burn the truth and follow error, as this cursed, insolent, devilish bull does? So I hear that if I had written the gospel, it should be denied and burned for my sake! O blind, mad bullists, what should I curse you? you are more than full of malice, that you command us to deny the truth and keep error.

(23) Hereby I will excuse myself, so that each one may take care of himself and know how to keep the bull from harming his soul. It is not that I wanted to raise the laity above the clergy, but rather that we pray for them that God will turn his wrath away from them and deliver them from the evil spirit that has possessed them, as we are obligated to do out of Christian faithfulness and love. It is more than enough that we recognize how they have unfortunately become mad and foolish because of the great fright of the outgoing truth, which thrusts its strong shine into their faces in such a way that green and yellow gleams before their eyes, and they do not know what they see, hear or speak. It is necessary here that we show mercy to them, and not seriousness, if they want to otherwise desist from their foolish nature, they have more than anyone can do to them. God help them and all of us, amen.

Now let's see the articles that condemned the wretched, miserable people.

The first.

It is heresy to hold that the sacraments give grace to all who do not present a bar.

24. much words are necessary to explain this article to a layman, in order to avoid the sophistic words.

for the sake of those who are touched therein. Recently, they teach that the sacraments give grace to everyone, even if he has no remorse for his sin, or even if he has no good thoughts, but it is enough that he does not have a bar, that is, that he does not have a willful intention to sin. Against this I have said, and still say, that it is erroneous and heretical.

(25) For not only is repentance for sin necessary over the removed bar and evil intention to receive the sacrament, but there must also be a faith that receives the sacrament worthily, since St. Paul Romans 14:23 says that all things are sin that are not done by faith. They do not see the same great bar of unbelief, and condemn newness and faith to the sacraments. What kind of Christians are they! They do not prove anything, nor do they have anything against me. God have mercy on such blind, wretched people.

The other.

Whoever denies that after baptism sin remains in every child, denies Christ and St. Paul.

How cunning is the malice, and wicked is the cunning, that out of pure hatred, only for the sake of appearances, they do not put all my words right, so that they have something to condemn; in addition, the wretched people know well that this article, if they put it right, is not mine, but St. Augustine's and Paul's, who teach that baptism puts away all sin, according to the guilt, but not according to the essence. Sin remains, as we all feel when we come to our senses, but God does not want to reckon it for the sake of baptism, if we contend against it, as I said in the sermon on baptism. But they do not know what sin, grace, baptism, guilt or God is; therefore they condemn, the wretched, blind sophists. If sin does not remain in us after baptism, why do we fight with fasting, prayer and other practices?

The third.

The tinder of original sin, although there is no real sin, hinders the entrance of the Kingdom of Heaven.

(27) The aforementioned remaining sin after baptism is called a tsundere, which is a sin that is not baptized.

so that it is easily inflamed by evil thoughts. It must also be pure and dead before we go to heaven. For everything must be swept out that is innate to us from Adam. But my bullists say no, presuming to go to heaven with the same evil tinder and old Adam, that they also have some filth in heaven from which they may stink. Therefore I must be damned; but they shall well understand.

The fourth.

The imperfect love of God in dying has with it a great fear, which fear alone might be a purgatory, and hinder the entrance of heaven.

28 Saint John says [1 Ep. 4,18]: "Where there is fear, love is not perfect. For perfect love casteth out fear: for fear is grievous." These holy words of John say just that, this article; and yet for my sake must be condemned by the mad coarse heads who do not know what they read, say or hear. Without this, where John says: Fear is embarrassing; I have added that fear may be a purgatory. Which I have said is a delusion, and not stiff-necked in my opinion. For I have often confessed that I do not know what it is like in purgatory, as they presume to know, since they know less about it than I do; I know more about it than they do.

The fifth.

It is not founded in Scripture and the holy old teachers that repentance has three parts, repentance, confession and satisfaction.

(29) This article, I think, should be condemned so that avarice does not die of hunger, otherwise they may truly indicate no other cause themselves. For if the satisfaction, the third part of repentance, were to remain as it is written, that where God interprets it and demands it, no one can discard it, then it would come to pass that all the monkey business that the pope, bishops, priests and monks have been playing with the keys, indulgences, cops, letters, reserved cases, recently, the whole Roman fair, which has deceived and devoured the world, would become false, devilish, end-Christian,

Error, deceit, seduction of all people publicly recognized. Therefore, to cover such disgrace, it has been truly necessary to look for a strong cover here, and to defend that the Roman fairgrounds' mischief does not come to light. Truly, Doctor Luther is a heretic that he does not leave such secret mischievousness to the scholars in the schools, but also brings it into German for the laity, who do not need to know the truth for the salvation of their souls.

(30) That God may command you Roman boys, how you deceive us poor people about our goods, honor and salvation, and how you want to have glory and honor among us. You are crying out to be beaten out of your heads and to be driven away. So I have taught that repentance and confession are not enough, but faith must also be there. But the pardon that can be given with indulgences is not founded in Scripture, but is laid down by the prelates, who may also give it. I will be silent here, that 1) they have interpreted the word contritio, taken from Scripture, to mean repentance, as it means much another. Recently, that I say more than I have ever said before, I say that all three pieces, Contritio, Confessio, Satisfactio, understood in their own way, do not stand in any place of Scripture; despite that they indicate it. They know as much of Scripture as the goose knows of the Psalter.

The sixth.

The repentance prepared by investigation, contemplation, and hatred of sins, when a sinner contemplates his time with bitterness of heart, overcoming the greatness, multitude, and filthiness of sins, plus the loss of eternal blessedness, and gain of eternal damnation, makes a hypocrite, and a greater sinner.

(31) As the spider begets poison from the beautiful rose, and it feeds on it, and the pious little bee sucks honey from it unawares, so the wretched serpent-breeders (as Christ calls them [Matt. 23:33]) have also done to my sermon on repentance, in which I taught that repentance should come from love and the desire of righteousness, as they themselves write and teach, and yet do not understand. And where there is no love, there remains hatred.

1) In the original: "dan".

Righteousness. Where this remains, repentance is fabricated, false, and makes only hypocrites, even greater sinners, because it does not atone for the love of righteousness, as Judas' repentance was [Matt. 27:4].

The seventh.

True is the saying, and better than all the doctrines which they have hitherto taught of repentance, that it is said, Never to do is the highest repentance, and a new life is the best repentance; or, To repent is best.

32 If the article is rightly condemned, I will let any layman judge. They have never taught so well of the new as the proverbs do. I still confess that, and ask nothing of it, that they respect the best repentance, the pope and give them money for their loose letters. Repentance cannot be bought, but he who has it must not buy anything; but that would do harm to the Holy See at Rome.

The eighth.

Do not take it upon yourself to confess all daily sin, nor even all mortal sin. For no one can recognize all mortal sin, and in ancient times only the public and conscious mortal sins were confessed.

(33) Behold, the wicked wretches themselves say that daily sin is not to be confessed, and because I also say it, it must be condemned. Item, they themselves say that no one really knows all mortal sin, therefore it cannot be confessed, that is also true; but now I also say it, it is heretical. My David is also condemned with me here, since he says [Ps. 19:15], "Lord, make me clean from my secret sins. For who is he that knoweth all sin?"

(34) From these and other things, everyone may know that this bull was made by insane, raging spirits, or by the head of all wickedness, the final Christian. Who can believe that they have understood and rightly condemned one article, when they so publicly err and fool that even the children and fools may notice it?

The ninth.

When we undertake to confess all our sins purely, we do nothing else than to leave nothing for divine mercy to forgive.

This must also be damned, if St. Paul, St. Augustine, even John!

Gerson teaches. It must ever be that we leave to divine grace much sin which we cannot recognize and confess, as they themselves say of forgotten and unconscious sins. Nor do they slur against themselves, and condemn the same in this bull, and drive us to repent, atone, pay for all sin, which they well know to be impossible, without that it carries much money. What does God forgive if we do enough for all sin? What kind of grace is it that forgives nothing in vain? Behold, they make a trustee out of God, and out of grace a severe judgment, and yet take our goods and honor for such devilish seductions, condemning their own known truth, that we shall never learn anything right from them.

The tenth.

No one's sins are forgiven, unless he believes that they will be forgiven when the priest absolves him. Yes, the sin would remain if he did not believe that it was forgiven. For forgiveness and the influence of grace are not enough, but one must believe that the sin is forgiven.

Behold, Almighty God, behold, all devout Christians! Is this not a wretched, horrible, terrible thing, that the Christian faith is publicly condemned by those who boast of the Christian faith? They pretend that we should not believe that sins are forgiven when we are absolved by the priest; but what should we do? That God may punish you, you Roman end-Christian boys and murderers of souls! What do you pretend to teach us? Shall we say to the priest when he absolves us: You lie in God's stead, and God with you? Why then do you make us believe your loose bulls and letters of indulgence, which you sell in the devil's name? Now listen, dear Christians, something new from Rome: the article of faith is condemned, since we all say: I believe in the Holy Spirit, a Christian church, forgiveness of sins.

37 If I knew that this bull was given by the pope in Rome and not invented by the liar and evil-doer Doctor Ecken, I would call out to all Christians that they should not hold the pope differently than the right one.

Archetypal Christian, of which all the Scriptures say; and where he would not cease to so brazenly publicly forbid us to believe, that the secular sword would gladly resist, more than any Turk. For the Turk lets believe whoever wants to; the pope does not want to let anyone believe. Help now whoever considers himself a Christian, and stand by his faith and all poor simple-minded souls who are sought for death and damnation by such great murderers of souls and wolves. I think they prove here honestly what they have in mind and how they honor Christ.

The eleventh.

Trust not that thou shalt be absolved because of thy repentance, but because of the word of Christ, which saith unto Petro, Whatsoever thou shalt unbind shall be unbound [Matt. 16:19]. Here I say, If thou art absolved by the priest, thou shalt firmly believe that thou art absolved, and thou shalt surely be absolved, whatever thy repentance may be.

38 But this is above faith. For I have taught that repentance, confession and penance are not enough; faith, the best part, must also be there. Who would confess or repent if he did not believe that his sins would be forgiven? What would and should a priest do if I came and said: Lord, I have sinned thus, and I am sorry; but I do not believe that I will be absolved by you? He would certainly think that I am nonsensical. Nor does this bull of vice command us to do so. No one can ever be absolved for the sake of his repentance, otherwise Judas, the devil, and all the damned would have been absolved long ago, but we are absolved for the sake of faith alone. Out, you cursed, damned bull, you deserve more than a thousand fires!

The twelfth.

If it were possible for someone to confess without repentance, or for a priest to absolve him lightly or jokingly when he believes he is absolved, he is certainly absolved.

(39) I have said this to show how necessary and useful faith is in repentance; although it is not possible for faith to be without repentance. But if it were possible, he alone would be enough, for Christ says [Marc. 11, 24.]: What you believe, that happens to you. It is not in the priest's faith or power, but in my faith, what I shall obtain. But the boys, who would like our consolation and salvation to rest on them, so that they might oppress and disgrace us as they have done up to now, condemn such Christian faith, and place all things on their imaginary, fictitious power.

(40) And what need is there that I should relate all the articles which I have previously set forth in my little book with good reason from the Scriptures, and that the foolish, unlearned, blasphemous, and endchrist bull should not only condemn all things without reason, but should also not indicate and name one article which is heretical or erroneous. And if it had no other defect, the one that is too great and too severe is that it publicly and brazenly denies, condemns and heretically punishes the Christian faith, so that it deserves to be trampled underfoot by all true Christians and to be sent home with brimstone and fire to the Roman end-Christ and Doctor Ecken, his apostle. I am well aware that I am not worthy to suffer death or other suffering because of the accursed bull; what else could I encounter that is better?

41 Therefore, I hereby warn and caution everyone to beware of such devils, and I will give a sign, namely this: If the pope will not revoke and condemn this bull, and punish D. If the pope does not revoke and condemn this bull, and if he does not punish D. Ecken with his companions who follow such a bull, then no one shall doubt that the pope is God's enemy, Christ's persecutor, the destroyer of Christianity, and the true final Christian. For so far it has never been heard that someone has publicly condemned the Christian faith, as this infernal, cursed bull does.

Luther's report to Spalatin about this writing against the papal bull.

See Appendix, No. 27, ? 4.

448 D. M. Luther's writing "Grund und Ursach aller Artikel, so durch die römische Bulle unrechtlich verdammt worden".

Issued on March 1, 1521.

Immediately after the completion of the previous writing, Luther set about a more detailed explanation and affirmation of the articles condemned in the papal bull, because such, as he wrote to Spalatin on Nov. 29, 1520, was desired by him (for example, by the Elector, Spalatin and others (Köstlin, Martin Luther (3), Vol. I, p. 405⁴). In the same letter, Luther inquires about the titles of Fabian von Feilitzsch, to whom he intends to dedicate the writing. The dedication is then dated Dec. 1, 1520 and prefixed to the Latin text, which was published in mid-January 1521 under the title: Vssertio ornnium arteuloruln M. l'utbsri, per ttullam l,soni8, X. novissirnu ttarnnutorum. WittsmbZas unno N.V.X.X. From a letter of Luther dated Dec. 7, 1520, we learn that Feilitzsch had died in the meantime, but that no change in the dedication could occur because the relevant part of the book was already printed. This Latin writing is found in the Wittenberg (1551), tom. II, tot. 94b; in the Jena (1566), tona. II, col. 292 and in the Erlanger, opp. var. ur⁴, tom. V, p. 156; the dedicatory writing also in De Wette, vol. I, p. 529 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol.III, p. 1. Luther also edited the same subject matter in German; this, however, is not a translation of the Latin writing, but soon shorter, soon more detailed. On March 1, 1521, this treatment was completed in print. (Luther's letter to Spalatin of March 6, 1521.) The title was: "Grund vnnd vrsach aller Artickel D. Marti. Luther: ßo durch Römische Bulle vnrechtlich vordampt seyn. Vuittenberg." 14 quarto sheets with Lotther's printer's mark. In the "Gesammtausgabe": in the Wittenberg (1554), vol. VII, p. 103 b; in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 400; in the Altenburg, vol.I, p. 615; in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p.338; in the Erlangen, l.Aufl., vol.24, p. 53 and 2nd ed., vol. 24, p. 56. The German editions do not contain the dedicatory inscription.

JEsus.

To all devout Christians who read or listen to this booklet, grace and peace from GOD, Amen.

1. Blessed and praised be God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who at this time enlightens so many hearts and awakens Christian understanding even in the laity, that one begins to see in all the world the right difference between the colored and glittering church or clergy and the truly good church, which until now has been so long hidden from us with holy garments, vows, works, and such outward appearances and laws of men, that we have been taught to be saved more by giving money than by believing. It will and may (as we see and shall reasonably hope and pray) his divine goodness will no longer tolerate such abomination and error raging in his church, amen, amen.

(2) To which his divine goodness, among others, is no small sign, that he recently made some tyrants of Christendom so blind and deluded with a spirit of deceit [Isa. 19:14], that they let a bull go out to their own highest shame and noticeable irreparable apostasy, in which they also forget that with which they have deceived and fooled the world until now, namely, the good appearance and glittering color. For they have condemned such public truth that stone and wood cry out against them, and no bull has ever been received so shamefully, contemptuously, disgracefully.

3. may God accomplish His work, begun according to His mercy, and give us grace, so that we may recognize and thank His grace, and earnestly ask for a blessed execution, so that the poor souls may no longer be so miserably deceived by such deceitfulness and gimmickry, amen, amen.

For this reason, I, called D. Martinus Luther, heartily rejoice, have undertaken, for further instruction and discovery of the false colored church, to prove the articles all together with thorough writing, so that each one may protect himself against the' blind shields, which such jugglers are wont to use, whether they perhaps once wanted to come to themselves, and leave their glittering to the truth, their juggling to the seriousness, their color to the reason. But first I must make an excuse for some of the accusations they make against me.

(5) And first of all, I will let go of those who blame me for being aggressive or impatient, for I do not almost excuse myself for this, because I have not done this in the books where I have acted on Christian doctrine, but only in the quarrels and foolish nuisances of the papacy, indulgences, and the like jugglery, into which they have forced me, which are also things that have not been worthy nor sorrowful of so many, let alone kind and peaceful, words.

They charge me that I alone should excel in teaching everyone. Since ant

I point out that I have never offered myself, but have always been inclined to grovel at the angles; but they have pulled me out by cunning and force. To gain prize and honor in me. Now, if the game fails them, I am guilty of ambition before them. And even if it were true that I alone had raised myself, they would still not be excused. Who knows whether God has called and awakened me to this, and they are to be feared that they do not despise God in me.

7) Do we not read that God commonly raises only one prophet at a time in the Old Testament? Moses was alone at the beginning of Egypt, Helias alone in King Achab's time, Heliseus alone after him; Isaiah was alone in Jerusalem, Oseas alone in Israel, Jeremiah alone in Judea, Ezekiel alone in Babylonia, and so on; although they already had many disciples, who were also called the children of prophets, he did not let more than one preach and punish the people.

(8) He has never made the chief priest or any other high priests prophets, but has raised up low and despised persons, even the shepherd Amos [Amos 7:14, 15], except King David, even though he was of low estate [1 Sam. 16:11, Ps. 78:70 ff]. Thus the dear saints have always had to preach and reproach against the rulers, kings, princes, priests, and scholars, to dare and to leave their necks to it; as it happened.

(9) In those days also the great men spoke no other word against the holy prophets, but that they were the chief, that they should be obeyed, and not the lowly, despised prophets: as Jeremiah, Cap. 18:18, saith. So do they now. Let everything be unjust that the pope, the bishops and the scholars do not want to suffer; let them only be heard if they already say what they want.

(10) And in the New Testament, were they not also strange, the true bishops and teachers? St. Ambrose was alone in his time, after him St. Jerome, and then St. Augustine. God did not have much high, great bishops mentioned. St. Augustine was a bishop in a vain, small, unpublicized city; but did he not do more than all the Roman popes with all their fellow bishops, so that they could not hold a candle to him? So it is ever true that all heresies have arisen or ever been strengthened by bishops and scholars; how then shall we be safe with them, now that they no longer wait upon the church, and have become worldly lords, so dangerous at the time they were, when they were better, more learned, holier, and more diligent? Nor do we ever want to be blind.

(11) I do not say that I am a prophet; but I say that they are so much more to fear that I am one, so much more do they despise me and esteem themselves. God is whimsical in his works and judgments, who does not respect great multitude, great art or violence, as Psalm 138:6 says: Alta a longe cognoscit.

If I am not a prophet, I am certain for myself that the word of God is with me and not with them, because I have the Scriptures for myself and they alone have their own teachings. This also gives me the courage to fear them so little, as much as they despise and persecute me. There were many donkeys in the world in Balaam's time, yet God spoke through none but Balaam's donkey. In the 14th Psalm, v. 6, he says to the same great ones: "You have desecrated the good teaching of the poor preacher, because he trusts in God," as if to say: "Because he is not great, high and mighty, his teaching must be false before you."

(12) They also say that I bring up new things, and that it is not to be supposed that all others have erred so long. The prophets of old also had to hear this. If the length of time should be enough of an excuse, the Jews would have had the very best thing against Christ, whose teaching was different from what they had heard in a thousand years; also the Gentiles would have despised the apostles, because their ancestors had believed much differently for more than three thousand years. Murderers, adulterers and thieves have remained from the beginning of the world and will remain until the end.

1) In the original: krauchen.

2) Thus the Wittenbergers and the Jenaers; Original: zu.

3) In all editions: good. Analogous is in §16: the holy scripture.

(13) I do not preach new things; I say that all Christian things are in the downfall of those who should have held it, namely the bishops and scholars. Besides, there is no doubt in my mind that the truth has remained in some hearts, and should be vain children in the cradle. The spiritual understanding of the law in the Old Testament also remained with some of the lowly; but it perished with the chief priests and scholars, who were to keep it. Thus Jeremiah Cap. 5, 4. says that he found less understanding and law among the rulers than among the laity and the common people. So it is also now, that poor peasants and children understand Christ better than the pope, bishops and doctors, and everything is reversed.

(14) But if they will not do otherwise, then let me be a heathen. What would they answer, or how would we stand, if the Turk asked us about the reason for our faith, giving no indication of how much, how long, how great people had held this way or otherwise? We would have to keep silent about everything and show him the holy scriptures in the reason. It would be disgraceful and ridiculous to say to him: "Behold, so many priests, bishops, kings, princes, countries and people have kept this and that for so long. So do the same to me now. Let us see, where is our foundation and best stock? Let us look at it once, at least for the sake of our own strength or devotion.

(15) Shall we have so great a reason, and not know it, and hide it from every man, if Christ has so publicly, commonly, and confessedly made it known to every man, as he saith, Matt. 5:15, 16: "One lighteth not a light, and putteth it under the corn, but upon the candlestick, that it may shine unto all them which are in the house." If Christ let his hands, feet and side be felt, so that the disciples might be sure of him [Luc. 24, 39. f.], why should we not also feel the Scriptures, which are truly Christ's spiritual body, and test whether they are the ones in which we believe or not. For all other scriptures are dangerous, and may be flying spirits, which have neither flesh nor bone, as Christ hath.

(16) In order that I may also answer those who blame me, I reject all the holy teachers of the church. I do not reject them, but since everyone knows that they have sometimes erred as men, I will not give them any more credence than they give me proof of their understanding from the Scriptures, which have never erred. And this is what St. Paul tells me in 1 Thess. 5, 21, when he says: "Test and prove all doctrine beforehand; whichever is good, keep it." In the same way St. Augustine writes to St. Jerome: "I have learned to give honor only to those books which are called the holy 1) Scriptures, that I firmly believe that none of their writers has ever erred; but I read all others in such a way that I do not believe it to be true 2) what they say, unless they prove it to me with the holy Scriptures or public reason.

(17) The Scriptures must be clearer, easier, and more certain than all other Scriptures, since all teachers prove their speech by them, as by clearer and more constant Scriptures, and want to have their Scriptures strengthened and explained by them. Thus no one can ever prove a dark speech by a more dark speech. For this reason it is necessary for us to run to the libraries with all the teachers' writings and there bring judgment and sentence upon them, for they alone are the right lord and master over all the writings and teachings on earth. But if this is not to be, what is the use of the Scriptures to us? so much the more do we reject them, and are content with books and teachers of men.

18 Whether many great men envy and persecute me because of this does not frighten me, yes, it comforts and strengthens me, since it is evident in all Scripture that the persecutors and enviers have commonly been wrong, and the persecuted right, and the greater number has always stood by the lie, the lesser by the truth. Yes, I 3) know where few and few people would challenge me, that what I write and teach is not yet from God. St. Paul has caused much turmoil by his teaching, as we read in Actis [Apost. 17,5.18. ff. 18,12.

1) In the original: sanctify.

2) In the original: has.

3) Erlanger: ichs.

19, 28. f.], therefore his teaching was not false. Truth has always rumbled; false teachers have always said peace and peace, as Isaiah [Cap. 57,19.] and Jeremiah [Cap. 6,14.] write.

19 Therefore, regardless of the pope and his great multitude, I will gladly save and protect the articles condemned in the bull, as much as God gives me grace, trusting, by God's grace, to keep them safe from injustice; but from violence there is no more here than a poor body, which I owe to God and to His holy truth condemned by the pope, amen.

The first article.

It is heresy where one holds that the sacraments give grace to all who do not put a bar in front.

20 To understand this article, it is to be noted that my opponents have thus taught that the holy sacraments give grace to everyone, even if he has no remorse for his sin, or even if he has no good thoughts, but it is enough that he does not put a bar in front of it, that is, that he does not have a willful intention to sin. Against this I have set and still set this article, and say that it is unchristian, seductive and heretical. For it is not only necessary to have true repentance of sin over the removed bolt and evil intention to receive the sacraments, but there must also be a firm faith in the heart to receive the sacrament worthily.

21 Christ proved this Matth. 9, 2. when he healed the gout-ridden man and said to him before, "Believe, my son, and your sins will be forgiven. If faith had not been necessary to forgive his sins, why would Christ have required it? In addition, we read that Christ did not perform a sign, nor did he ever help anyone; there had to be faith that he could and would do it, so that also St. Matthew 1) writes, Cap. 13, 58, that he could not perform a sign in his homeland because of their unbelief.

22. item, when he teaches to pray, Marc. 11, 24, he says: "When you pray, you should believe, that ye shall obtain it, ye shall surely have it." But what is receiving the sacrament but having a desire for divine grace? But what is desiring divine grace but a true heartfelt prayer? How should it not be unchristian, if one teaches to receive the sacraments and grace of God without such desire, without faith, even without repentance of sin, without all good thoughts? Is it not a wretched thing to hear such things in Christendom?

1) In the Erlangen and Wittenberg: Joannes,

Since this is the main article, since the others are all related to it, we need to strengthen it further and explain if it will help. St. James, Cap. 1, 5-8, says: "Whoever needs wisdom, let him seek and ask it of God, who gives to everyone superfluously, and it will be given to him. But let him ask with a firm faith and not doubt. For if he doubts, he is like a wave or bulge of the sea that is driven to and fro by the wind. The same man does not presume to obtain anything from God. Such a man is unsteady in all his ways, because he has a twofold heart."

(24) Is it not clear enough that a man cannot receive anything from God who asks and does not firmly believe that he will receive it? How much less can he receive who does not ask, does not believe, does not repent, 2) does not think good, but only removes the bar of evil intent, as they teach! How could the sacraments give grace to such unbelieving, unrepentant, unkind, covetous hearts? God protect all His Christians from such unchristian, this seductive bull and such master error, which has never been heard from the beginning of the world.

25 St. Paul says Romans 14:23: "Everything that does not come from faith is sin. How then can the sacraments give grace to unbelievers, who sin in all things and works, as long as they do not believe; indeed, how is it possible for them to remove the bar, if they remain in unbelief, by which all their doings are unbelievable?

2) So Walch alone is correct. In the Wittenberg and the Jena: bedrewet; in the Erlanger: betreuet.

Sin is, as St. Paul says here. Nor do they teach that faith is not necessary to receive the sacraments and grace, and condemn with 1) me such public writing.

According to the opinion St. Paul cites Rom. 1, 17. and Hebr. 10,38. the saying of the prophet Habakuk 2,4. for the main part of all Christian doctrine, because he says:

Justus ex fide sua vivet, "a righteous man will live by his faith". He does not say: A just man will live from the sacraments, but from his faith. For it is not the sacraments, but the faith in the sacraments that makes alive and just. Many take the sacrament, but do not become alive or devout from it. But he that believeth is devout and liveth.

27 This is also the intention of the saying of Christ, Marc. 16, 16: "He who believes and is baptized will be saved. He puts faith before baptism. For where there is no faith, baptism is of no help, as he himself says afterwards, "He who does not believe will be lost," even if he were baptized. For it is not baptism, 2) but faith in baptism, that makes one foolish. Therefore we read Apost. 8,37 that St. Philip did not want to baptize the eunuch, but first asked if he believed. And we still see daily that in all the world, where one baptizes, one first asks the child or the parents instead of the baptized person whether he believes; and on their faith and confession one baptizes and administers the sacrament.

How then does this heretical, blasphemous bull, against all Scripture, against all the world, against all Christian custom and faith, presume to teach that one must not believe, nor repent, nor remember good? This is so grossly unchristian that no one would believe it if the bull did not exist, that someone should hold such nonsensical teaching. I hope they will be ashamed of the bull in their hearts, and they would not like it to be read in German by the laity.

29 Further, St. Paul says Romans 10:8 that it is necessary to believe from the heart in order to become devout. Do not say: It is necessary that one receives the sacraments. For without the bodily reception of the sacraments (if they are not despised) one can become devout through faith; but without faith no sacrament is useful, indeed, it is deadly and corruptible. For this reason, he writes in Romans 4:3 that "Abraham believed or trusted God, and the same faith was counted to him for righteousness" or godliness, as Moses wrote earlier in Genesis 15:6; and therefore it is written that we should know that no other thing makes us godly and righteous except faith, without which no one can ever deal with God and no one can obtain His grace.

(30) All this also proves the reason and common sense of all men. For where one acts with words and promises, there must be faith, even among men on earth. Otherwise, no trade nor community would exist for long if no one believed the other's words or letters. Now God does not deal with us in any other way, as we see publicly, than with His holy Word and Sacrament, which are like signs or seals of His words. So faith must be necessary above all things for such words and signs. For where God speaks and signs, one must believe with all one's heart, so be it, how he speaks and signs, so that we do not consider him a liar or a juggler, but faithful and true. And this faith is most pleasing to God, and gives Him the highest honor, as that He is true and a righteous God. For this reason, he also reckons the same to us as a fundamentally good, frugal piety for salvation.

Because in every sacrament there is a divine word and promise, in which God beckons to us and promises His grace, it is truly not enough to remove the bar, as they say, but there must be an unwavering, unwavering faith in the heart that receives the promise and sign, and does not doubt that it is as God says and signs. Then the grace will certainly be given to him, according to the sound of the promise and the evidence of the sign or sacrament. If faith is not there, then not only is the removed bolt lost, but God will not give it to him.

1) "with" is missing in the Wittenberg. The meaning is: by condemning me, they condemn the revealed Scripture.

2) Erlanger: the bapt.

There he is blasphemed and disgraced to the highest degree, as if he were a liar or a frivolous juggler. And then the sacraments not only give no grace to those who remove the bar, but all disgrace, wrath and misfortune, that it is better to be far from the words and signs or sacraments of God, if faith is not there.

32 Therefore, since baptism, a divine sign or seal, is given by virtue of the promise and words of Christ, Marc. 16, 16: "He who believes and is baptized will be saved," anyone who is baptized must believe these words to be true, and believe that he will certainly be saved where he is baptized, according to the same word and interpretation of the same sign. But if he does not believe, these words and signs of God are there in vain, and thus God is despised. For unbelief leaves him standing there as a fool or a liar; unbelief or mistrust in the sacraments is even a grave, unchristian, horrible sin. And this blasphemous, condemned bull wants to drive us to such bad behavior, and makes heresy out of faith, and Christian truth out of blasphemy. Protect God from the abomination that stands in the holy place, Matth. 24, 15.

33 Therefore, since the divine sign or sacrament of repentance is given by virtue of the word and promise, Matth. 16:19: "What you untie on earth shall be loosed in heaven," 2c., the one who confesses and repents must first of all be diligent to keep these words true, and firmly believe that he is loosed before God in heaven, where he is absolved on earth. If he does not believe this, or if he doubts, then God must be his liar, and is denied by him through such unbelief or doubt. What is the use of his bar or evil resolution, if he keeps the greatest bar and the worst resolution of unbelief, doubt and denial of God?

34 Therefore, in the sacrament of the altar, since it is given in virtue of these words of Christ, Matt. 26:26, "Take and eat, this is my body which is given for you," he who goes to the sacrament must firmly believe that as the words of Christ are, so it is in truth, that his body is given for him, and his blood is shed for him. Believe

If he does not believe this, or if he believes that it is not given for him but for others, then Christ is once again a liar, and his word and sign must be destroyed. O of the innumerable abominable sins that are committed today in such unbelief and abuse of the sacraments, because such faith is nowhere taught, and is now condemned by the bull; learning no more than to take off the bolt, repent, and confess; or, if one preaches of faith, it goes no further than that Christ is truly there, and that not bread, but the form of bread is there. But what he is doing there, and why he is there, is not heard preached or taught by anyone.

35 From all this, I think, it is clear that faith is necessary for the sacrament, who does not doubt, let it be done to him what the words say and the sacraments interpret. And nothing useful is what they say about the removal of the bolt. Yes, it is heretical that grace is given through the sacraments to the same mere removal of the bolt, without faith, so that it may exist with truth, which is said from the teaching of St. Augustine: 1) Not the sacrament, but the faith of the sacrament makes pious and blessed. And again the same St. Augustine, speaking of John, says of baptism: "The word comes to the element, and becomes a sacrament; and the water strikes the body, and yet cleanses the soul; not for the sake of the work or the watering, but for the sake of faith.

Against such strong proof of this Christian article, my opponents do not have a shred of Scripture, nor a speck of reason for their opinion and bar, but everything is a naked, unfounded human poem and dream, and would like to hear their refutation. Is it not a pity, if it were not heretical, that they may teach us their own poems in Christianity, where only God's word is to be taught?

37. they have some movement of their opinion, which is thus done: if the sacraments of the new testament do not give grace to the bar abusers and unbelievers, so would

There should be no difference between the new and the old sacraments. Since the old sacraments were powerful to give grace to the faithful, and the new ones should be more powerful and better than the old ones, they must also give grace to those who do not yet believe, to whom the old ones did not give grace.

This is a far-reaching thing, of which much could be said. Recently, they say all this from a wrong and erroneous mind. For there is no difference between old and new sacraments, neither these nor those give grace to God, but, as has been said, faith alone in God's word and sign gave grace there and gives grace here. Therefore, the ancients also obtained grace through the same faith as we do, as St. Peter says Apost. 15, 11: "We trust to be saved by faith, as did our ancient fathers"; and St. Paul 2 Cor. 4, 13: "We have the same spirit of faith that they had"; and 1 Cor. 10, 4: "Our fathers ate the same spiritual food and drank the same spiritual drink" that we eat and drink, that is, they believed as we do.

(39) This is true, the figures of the Old Testament did not give grace, but they are not called sacraments, as they think, because in the figures there was no word or promise of God, which must be where a sacrament is to be, but were mere figures or signs. Just as even now, bodily adornment and pleasure is a mere figure or sign, in which there is no word or promise from God that whoever has it shall have this or that, as in baptism we see the promise that whoever believes and is baptized shall be saved [Marc. 16, 16]. Now the things of God's promise in the Old Testament, in which they believed, were in all respects like our sacraments, except that they had many and various, and we had few and one, common to all the world.

40 Again, what we have for figures and signs, which are not sacraments, and where no word of God goes beside, are equal to the old figures. So a bishop's garment is now both a figure and Aaron's garment of old; none does not give grace. Therefore, they should not mix the sacraments into the figures,

If they took one for the other, they would not have fallen into such error as to divide the new sacraments from the old, when they must leave the new and old faith undivided.

(41) If this article is well understood, all the others will easily be understood, and the whole bull will become clear. For this article has the greatest power, because it concerns faith.

The other.

Whoever denies that after baptism sin remains in every child, denies Christ and St. Paul.

St. Paul Rom. 7, 7. says: "I would not know that evil desire and lust were sin, if God had not commanded that you should not have evil desire. Now the apostle was not only baptized, but also holy, since he wrote of such evil desire on his part and on the part of all the saints; now where did this same evil desire come to him after baptism? Not other than that it remained after baptism.

43. item, to the Galatians on the 5th [v. 17.] he writes to the baptized and saints thus: "The flesh desires and lusts against the Spirit, and the Spirit lusts against the flesh: these two are contrary to one another, and make it impossible for you to do what you would gladly do." What will or can anyone say to this public saying? He speaks plainly that they have flesh and spirit, and two kinds of unruly desire or lust in them, so hard that though they would gladly be without fleshly desire, yet they cannot; where does this same evil lust come into the baptized and saints? Undoubtedly from the bodily birth, in which such original sin of evil desires is born, and continues until death, from which we have strife and opposition in our spirit while we live.

44 Rom. 7:18: "I have in me, that is, in my flesh, no good: for the evil that I would not, that do I; and the good that I would, that do I not." What else does St. Paul mean by this, for even though he would like to do well according to the Spirit, that is, to be without fleshly desires and motions, the flesh is so evil.

and full of lusts, that he cannot do it, nor be without such lusts; and therefore the evil of his flesh, which he does not desire according to the Spirit, he does, that is, he has evil desires, though he contends against them, lest they prevail and be accomplished with works. As he also teaches Rom. 6, 12: "Do not let sin have the upper hand in your mortal body, so that you follow its lusts or desires"; as if he said: Sin is in your body, and evil desire; but see to it that you force it, and do not willingly follow it.

For such strife of our flesh and spirit, with unruly desires, doth God put upon all whom he baptizeth and calleth, as it is declared in Genesis 3:15, where he saith unto the serpent, I will make enmity between thee and the 1) woman, and between thy seed and her seed. She shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt lie in wait for her foot"; that is, the spirit and the flesh contending against each other; but the spirit, though with toil and labor, shall be on high, and subdue the disobedient flesh; as Paul Gal. 5:24. says, "All that are Christians, or belong to Christ, crucify their flesh with its lusts and vices"; and St. Peter [1 Ep. 2, 11.], "Beloved brethren, abstain from fleshly lusts, which only ever contend against the soul."

(46) It is hereby evident that sin still remains in the baptized and the saints as long as they have flesh and blood and live on earth, that this article is quite unchristianly condemned by this bull. But to prove it further, St. Paul says Rom. 7, 22. f.: "I have a delight in God's laws according to my inward man; but I see contrary law in my members, which would have me captive to the law of sins, or violence, and contrary to the law of my mind."

47 Here St. Paul confesses that he finds a good law and will in his spirit, and also an evil law and will in his members; how then can one deny that there is any sin left in a holy, baptized man? Is it not sin what goes against the good spirit and God's law?

What then is sin? I would like to hear. But whence comes such a strife of evil against the good in ourselves, but from the bodily birth of Adam, which remains after the beginning of the good spirit in baptism and repentance, until it is overcome by strife and God's grace and the Spirit's increase, and is finally strangled and cast out by death.

Item, he speaks even more and more clearly in the same place [Cap. 7, 25.]: "I myself, according to the spirit, serve God's commandment, but according to the flesh I serve the law of sin." Is not this clear enough that a certain man finds two pieces in himself? By the Spirit he desires good, and serves the law of God, and is pious, having also pleasure and love therein; but by the contrary flesh he desires evil, and has love and pleasure therein to serve the same. And so, because flesh and spirit are one man, both are imputed to him, though they are contrary to each other, kind, work, love and desire. And because of the spirit he is righteous, but because of the flesh he has sin; as St. Paul Rom. 8:10 says: "The spirit lives before God because of his righteousness, but the flesh is dead before him because of his sin." For since the noblest, best, highest part of man, the spirit, through faith remains pious and righteous, God does not count the remaining sin of the least part, the flesh, as condemnation.

(49) Although I and everyone should be reasonably surprised that this article is not considered the most certain, known, sensitive truth, let alone that it should be condemned by anyone. What do we read in all the saints' lives? What do they confess and prove with all their works, prayers, fasts, labors, and various exercises, but that they contend against their own flesh, to mortify it and make it subservient to the Spirit, and to curb its evil lust and desires, as St. Paul did to Colossians? Paul writes to Colossians [Cap. 3, 5.]: "Put to death your members which are on earth, unchastity, uncleanness, evil desire, covetousness"; item, Rom. 8, 13.: "If by the Spirit you put to death the works of the flesh, you will live in the sight of God. But if you walk according to the live in the flesh, ye shall die"; and 1 Cor. 9:27: "I mortify my body, and constrain it to service, lest I preach pikelets, and become reprobate myself."

1) Erlanger: "one".

So much more, which saint sighs, cries, laments, does not cry out over his own flesh and evil desire?

How often St. Jerome complains that evil desire rages in his flesh, not only after his baptism, but also when he has fasted, watched, worked, and been most holy! And St. Cyprian, in a sermon on the pestilence at death, takes no other consolation than from the sins, and says: "We must fight without ceasing with avarice, with unchastity, with anger, with ambition. We have to fight constantly and with effort and unwillingness with the carnal desires, with the temptations of the world. Man's spirit is surrounded by the devil's temptation, can hardly meet all challenges, hardly resist all. When avarice is depressed, unchastity rises up. If unchastity is depressed, vain honor follows. If vain honor is despised, anger is enraged, hope is raised, drunkenness is challenged, hatred tears apart unity, jealousy divides friendship. Here you must curse, which God has forbidden; here you must swear, which is not proper. The spirit of man must suffer so much persecution, so much peril must await the heart. And we should still be able to stand among such pains of the devil for a long time? so much more is it to be wished and prayed for that we may soon come to Christ through the speedy help of death.

(51) If this and all the saints' lives and confessions prove the saying of Paul, Rom. 7:22 ff: "I delight in the laws of God according to the Spirit, and yet I find in my members a rebellious law of sin," so that no one can deny that there is still sin in all baptized and holy men on earth, so that they must contend: what then does this wretched bull do to condemn all this? Must then such Scripture and all the saints be their liars? Let every one try himself, and feel he is Fast, watch, labor until death, and be as holy as he may, and say whether he will not yet find in him evil desire and love, whether it be for unchastity, wrath, hatred, pride, or the like. For not only unchastity, but all evil lust and desires are understood by the desires of the flesh, which may be through the flesh; as Paul tells Gal. 5:18 ff.

Yes, I say that this bull, by condemning this article, blasphemes God. For thus says St. John the Apostle, 1 John 1:8-10: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. But if we confess our sin, he is faithful and pious to forgive us all our sin, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. If we say we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us."

Is this not clear enough that we are still to be cleansed and have sin? St. Paul speaks the same to the Hebrews [Cap. 12,1]: "Let us lay aside every weight and the sin that clings to us" 2c. Here the apostle joins in, confessing that there is still in him, not only sin, but a clinging sin, that is, the wanton evil desire that does not cease while we are alive, always clinging and struggling against the spirit, of which he has a burden and a complaint; which the apostle calls laying aside both.

54) So Joh. 15, 1) 3. when Christ said to his disciples: "You are now clean, because of the word that I have said to you", he says before 2) [V. 1. 2.]: "I am a vine, you are my vines, and my father is a vinedresser. Whichever branch beareth fruit, him will he cleanse, that it may bear more fruit." Here we see that the branches, which are nevertheless fruitful, that is, pious and holy, are nevertheless still unclean and more to be cleansed. So David Ps. 51:12, being already pious and pure, yet he said, "O Lord, create in me a clean heart, and make in me a new right spirit." Again he says Ps. 19, 13: "O Lord, who may know all his sin;

1) In the original wrong "Ivan. 13".

2) In the original: "afterwards", because before instead of Joh. 15 the 13th chapter was added.

Make me clean from my secret, hidden sins."

(55) Yes, that we understand it rightly, it is not possible to ask or desire against and from the sins, because they are already sincere. The first part of grace and the spirit that is put on is only of this kind, that it works against the other sins, and would like to be thoroughly sincere, but is not able to do so because of the opposition of the flesh. For those who have not begun to be pious do not argue, do not complain, do not plead against their flesh and sin, yes, they feel nothing contrary, they go and follow as the flesh wills, as St. Paul Eph. 4, 17-19 says of them; they have come to the point that they no longer feel, therefore they go into impurity and stinginess 2c.

The parables of the Gospel serve this purpose. The first one is about the Samaritan [Luc. 10, 34. f.], who laid the half alive man on his animal, poured wine and oil into his wounds and ordered the ostler to wait for him. For he did not make him whole all at once. So we also by baptism or repentance are not made whole, but are begun and joined with the first grace, that we daily heal and become whole more and more. Therefore St. Jacob says, Jac. 1, 18: "God has given us birth through his word, out of pure gracious will", without our merit, "so that we might be a beginning of his work or creatures"; as if he should say: We are a work of God begun, but not yet finished, while we live here on earth, in the faith of his word; but after death we will be perfect, a divine work without all sin and infirmity.

(57) The other parable, Matt. 13:33, is of the leaven which the woman mixed in three measures of flour until it became thoroughly leavened. The same new leaven is the faith and grace of the Spirit; but it does not make it sour all at once, but finely and neatly by and by it makes us like it, new and the bread of God. So that this life is not piety, but becoming pious; not health, but becoming healthy; not being, but becoming; not rest, but training. We are not yet, but we will be.

but; it is not yet done and done, but it is in progress and swinging. It is not the end, but it is the way; everything is glowing 1) and not yet glistening, but everything is sweeping.

58. and that we make an end of it, only the Lord's Prayer confesses that we are all still in sins, since all the saints must also pray: "Let your name be sanctified, your will be done, your kingdom come" 2c. So that they actually confess that they do not yet sufficiently sanctify God's name; and yet they could not pray this unless the Spirit had already begun to sanctify it. So they confess that they do not yet do the will of God, and yet they would not ask if they had not begun to do His will. For those who have not begun do not respect God's name and will, do not ask for it, and do not ask for it.

(59) Nor can it be said that in these prayers the saints pray for their past sins alone, and not for the rest of their present sins. For for past sins there is a special prayer in the Lord's Prayer, which reads: "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. But these prayers are clearly for the remaining present sins, because they still ask for 2) the future glory of God's name, future obedience of God's will, future possession of God's kingdom, which are still partly in the devil's kingdom, disobedience and dishonor to God's name.

(60) But I know well what they say to all this, that such evil as remains after baptism is not sin, and invent a new name for it, saying that it is chastisement, and not guilt; yea, that it is more a fault or infirmity than sin. Here I answer, and say that they say all these things of their own will, without scripture, reason, and cause; moreover contrary to scripture, for St. Paul saith not thus: I find fault in myself; but in express words, "I serve the law of sin according to the flesh"; item Rom. 7:25, "The sin that dwelleth in me doeth evil"; and St. John, "I am a sinner".

1) In the original: gluwet.

2) In the Wittenberg and in the Jena: not.

hannes does not say: If we say that we have no fault; but: "If we say that we have no sin" [1 John 1:8].

(61) There is no reason why human iniquity should try to force God's word and call wrong what God allows to be called sin; otherwise one would make the whole of Scripture meaningless, and say that the word sin is called wrong in all places, and that nothing is sin anymore, but only wrong and infirmity. Who would object if someone said that adultery, murder and robbery are only faults and not sins? Of course they are faults and infirmities, but they are sinful faults and infirmities that must be healed by grace. Anger, evil desire and inclination to all evil are faults; but are they not also sins? Would they not be contrary to God's commandment, which says, Thou shalt not have evil desire, thou shalt not be angry? What do they want to call sin, if they do not want to call what is against God's commandment sin? St. Paul, in the very text in which he speaks of the sin of baptized people, introduced God's commandment and said Rom. 7:7: "I would not have known that evil desire was sin, if the commandment had not said, Thou shalt not covet." As if to say, "This very covetousness, which remains in me and in all the baptized, is not only error, but sin, which is contrary to this commandment of God, and is forbidden therein.

62. such wild plots and evasive words to disguise the Scripture, St. Paul calls in Greek, χυβεία and παιονυπία, Eph. 4,14., that is, jugglery, gamesmanship, duplicity, because they toss the words of God to and fro according to their will, as doubters toss dice, and as jugglers give things another nose and appearance; that they may take from the Scriptures their single, simple, constant sense, and blind our eyes, that we may waver to and fro, not keeping a certain sense, and be, as it were, bewitched and beguiled by them, and they play with us as gamblers do with the dice. So they also do to this public text and little word "sin", and say that sin is not called sin, it is called a defect or infirmity; they deceive us, so that we do not see that which is clearly before our eyes; just as he writes to the Galatians.

Cap. 3:1: "O foolish Galatians, who has bewitched you and deceived you, that you do not hear the truth?"

63. If we let them have the power to disguise the divine words in this way, they would probably end up saying that a tree is called a stone and a horse is called a cow, as they unfortunately have done and still do in the words: Faith, love, hope, righteousness, good works, sin, laws, grace of God, and much more, which I want to receive on my oath, also prove that those who wrote about the Sententia during these four hundred years have never understood, but have diced and juggled with it according to their lack of understanding, so that the whole Scripture has lost its understanding, and we have learned vain fables and fairy tales for it 1). Therefore let no one be deceived by human fables and fairy tales. What God calls sin in words, let it be true and take it for real sin. God does not lie as a man does, Deut. 23, 19. Neither does he play and juggle with words as men do; but his words are earnest and true, Ps. 119, 86. 142. 160. and 111, 7.

64 What should they not have played, where the apostle would have drawn the high commandment of one, of idols, in the first table of Moses, since the high spirits do not have enough understanding, so they do not leave their jiggery-pokery in the low commandment of the evil desires, which everyone feels that they are against God's commandment, and yet do not want to let sin be sin. And no doubt St. Paul drew out such a low commandment, so that it would shut everyone's mouth, overcome and resolve us with our own feelings, and no one could speak against it. It has not helped yet, nor do they invent jugglery to refute such clear truth and self-confident feeling.

65) But they want to hear their reason why they do not allow sin to remain after baptism. 2) They say that it is a disgrace to baptism to say that sin remains after baptism.

1) In the original: taught.

2) This last part of the sentence is in the original Latin infinitive construction. However, the Wittenberg and Jena editions have already changed it.

68 Thus it is said twice, that sin is forgiven, and there is no sin. After baptism and repentance, all sins are forgiven, but there is still sin until death, even though it does not harm salvation through forgiveness, as long as we fight against it and do not follow it. Therefore they should not deny that sin remains after baptism, just as if we were no longer allowed to have grace that takes away sin, but should deny that not all sins are forgiven, then I would have denied with them and they with me rightly and unanimously.

This is the joy, consolation and blessedness of the New Testament; in it one learns what Christ is good for and what is needed; from it grows love and joy, praise and thanksgiving to Christ and to the Father of all mercy; from it become free, joyful, courageous Christians who pursue sin out of love and atone for it with joy. But those who hide sin from us and only make an affliction out of it, make us secure, lazy and discontented, take Christ away from us, and let us go without fear and care to destroy sin, and thus harden ourselves in dreadful presumption, so that neither Christ nor God tastes or is sweet to us. God protect us for this, and help all who are in it, amen.

The third.

The tinder of original sin, even if there is no real sin, still hinders the entrance of the Kingdom of Heaven.

(72) The rest of the sin after baptism, as mentioned in the next article, is called tinder, because it is easily received and moved to evil love, lust, and works, just as the tinder of the flesh is easily set on fire, as each man finds in himself. Now this article has never been held by me as anything other than a delusion and conceit, not for a consistent, certain truth to doctrine, that there has been no need to condemn it. But since my opponents raise nothing against it, for only the few words: We do not like it, and I do not care what they like or do not like, for which I have been very careful in the meantime, I set it as a constant doctrine of truth, confess it and also want to preserve it; in spite of them, they are commanded to overthrow it with writings or with reason! And prove it thus:

73 St. Peter 2 Petr. 3, 13 [from Is. 65, 17] says: God will create new heavens and new earths at the last day, in which no sin shall dwell, as in these, but only righteousness. Since it has been proved in the previous article that the tinder is sin, it is obvious to all reason that no one will enter heaven with the same sin as before. They will not enter with sins, without doubt. But although this truth is so evident that there is no need to prove it, since no one is so foolish as to think that one can go to heaven with sins, yet because this is such a great bull, and they are so foolish or impudent as to say and put such things, I add one more sentence.

74 St. Paul Ephesians 5:25-27 says: "Christ cleanseth his Christianity by baptism of water and of the gospel, that he himself might bring home unto him a bride, glorious Christianity, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing. I mean that here St. Paul teaches publicly that no sin must go to heaven with it, if there is neither spot nor wrinkle nor any evil mark in it.

(75) And although the said tinder, according to their erroneous opinion, is not sin, but only a disease and infirmity, yet I respect that everyone may sufficiently know that the same infirmity nevertheless hinders the entrance of heaven. For every sickness and infirmity, every spot, every wrinkle, and all such things must first be put away, as St. Paul says [Col. 3:8, Heb. 12:1], if we are to go to heaven, that the figure of Ex. 13:18 may be fulfilled. When the children of Israel came out of Egypt not only strong and healthy, but also armed, as David said in Psalms 105:37: "There was not one among them that was sick or infirm": how much more must all infirmities be gone when we go to the right promised land of the kingdom of heaven, out of this world and right Egypt.

But perhaps the pope jokes with his own in this bull, and perhaps talks about the heaven that is ready for him and all his own, who blaspheme and persecute the divine truth with him, in the abyss of hell with Lucifer and his angels. For into this heaven will go not only the tinder, but the fire of all sin and woe. Otherwise I could not think what other heaven it has, since sin and sickness do not hinder the entrance. Our heaven, where God dwells within, is hindered by the smallest sin and infirmity, and all who enter it must shine as purely as the sun, as the Scripture says [Matt. 13:43]. Unless the pope and his papists want to build them their own heaven, like the jugglers of linen cloths in the carnival. Is it not annoying that one must read such foolish and childish things in papal bulls? And yet command it to be taken for serious Christian articles of faith.

The fourth.

The imperfect love of God in dying has with it, without doubt, a great fear, which alone would like to be a purgatory, "and hinder the entrance of heaven.

Now it is said and proven that nothing frail can enter heaven; everything of its dimensions must be perfect.

and be without sin and without infirmity. For all the saints shall not be equal in heaven, but every one of them shall be sufficiently pure and perfect in his measure. Since imperfect love has an infirmity, and since there is so much sin in it that its infirmity is so great, I think it is clear that imperfect love is a hindrance to the entrance of heaven.

But that imperfect love has fear beside it, I leave to St. John the Apostle, who says 1 John 4:18: "Where there is fear, love is not perfect; for perfect love casteth out fear. Whoever does not believe this saying, I do not ask him to believe me. But since this bull condemns it, I would be sorry if it did not also condemn my articles based on this St. John's saying.

But that the great fear might well be a purgatory, I have thought conceitedly; I neither know how to set it nor how to appal it; experience will teach it; nor is it important, if we do not know it. But methinks the Scriptures prove that the torment of hell (which they compare to purgatory) is fear, terror, dread, flight and despair, as Ps. 2:5 says: "He will address them in his wrath, and in his fury he will terrify them"; and Ps. 6:3 ff. 6, 3. f.: "All my bones are terrified, and my soul is greatly affrighted"; and Prov. 28, 1.: "The sinner fleeth, and no man chaseth him"; item, Deut. 5, 28, 65.: "God will give thee a fearful, desponding heart." We also see every day how great a torment the same terrible terror is, that some die suddenly from it, some go mad, and immediately come into another being, so that we must confess that no torment is equal to the right serious, terrible fright, that also for this reason it is written of the righteous Ps. 112:7 ff: "He will not be frightened by the evil cry," before which all sinners will be frightened. Such fear and terror do nothing but cause an evil conscience, since love and faith are lacking. Therefore, I think that this article should have enough appearances. But whoever does not want to believe it, let it stand; the bull knows nothing about it, with all its masters.

The fifth.

It is not founded in Scripture, nor in the holy old teachers, that repentance has dr*^*i pieces, Rene, Confession and Atonement.

80 Here it is to be noted that I have never denied that God sometimes punishes sin, as we read in Moses, Aaron, David, and many more [histories]; but I have said that the pardon which the pope supposedly gives through indulgences is nothing, and is not founded in any Scripture, but arises from human law. This I prove:

81 First, in their own words, since they say, and rightly so, that repentance would be so great that no atonement would be necessary. But if the atonement were founded in Scripture, it would be necessary and must be done, regardless of the greatness of the repentance or purity of the confession. For what is commanded in Scripture must not be omitted for the sake of any other thing, for Christ says [Matt. 5:18], "Not one letter nor one tittle shall pass away; all things must be done." Therefore it is clear from their own words how they bite their own tongues, and condemn that which they themselves teach.

Secondly, Christ absolved the adulteress without atoning, John 8:11, and forgave the sin of the gout-breaker without atoning, Matth. 9:2, which Christ would not have done if atoning was established in Scripture. For He says (Matth. 5,17): "He did not come to abolish the law, but to fulfill it. But where an example of Christ is contrary to a doctrine, the same doctrine is undoubtedly not sound, nor is it founded in Scripture, and it is of no avail if, on the other hand, another repugnant example of satisfaction is imposed, as some introduce Mariam Magdalenam, who washed Christ's feet with tears [Luc. 7:47]. For I can easily say here that there was no satisfaction, since many works are and may be done that are not satisfaction. But no lessening of satisfaction can be interpreted as being anything other than a lessening of satisfaction. Therefore, where it is abated, it concludes that it is not commanded in Scripture. But where a work it does not decide that [it] is necessary to gratify or to do 1).

83 Again, where God punishes sin, whether it be pardon or not, no one can put it away, as He says Ps. 89:33: "I will punish their sin with a rod, and with blows or punishments by the hand of man. These words must also be fulfilled on a letter or tittle; and may the pope not put away such punishment for sin, for he may not put away the Scripture and God's Word. It is true that man may appear before God, and punish himself or be punished, that God may hold the rod, as St. Paul says 1 Cor. 11:31: "If we punish ourselves, we shall not be punished by God." And so it may happen that the new is so great that God no longer demands punishment.

In this way, the holy fathers of old set canons of repentance for sin, which was called pardon, so that they would come before God, and we would punish ourselves. For it must be punished, whether by ourselves or by others because of God. That is why I have said and still say that it is all lies and deception with the indulgence of the pope. For, if the penalty of sin is required by God (as is true, and the Scripture teaches), the pope cannot take it off, nor put down the Scripture, and deceives the people. But if there is no punishment (as when repentance is so great, or we punish ourselves), he does not put it down, and deceives the people again.

From this I have said that the three parts of repentance are not founded in Scripture. It is not that I deny repentance, confession and punishment, but that I destroy the indulgence which makes us think that the third part, the atonement, is not true. I have clearly said that the pardon that is or is to be given through indulgences is not written anywhere. By this I have not denied that there is no punishment or satisfaction for sin. I say it is, but it may not be put away. But which is put away, it is invented by men, without any

1) Thus in the original. In the Wittenberg and the Jena: "zuthun"; in the Erlanger: "Zuthun"; in Walch: "Zuthuung."

Reason of the Scripture. For this reason I am also hostile to the word "sufficiency", 2) I would that it had never arisen. The Scripture calls it punishment and mortification of sin; for no one can be punished enough for a daily sin; but he may well be punished for all sin, perhaps with grace temporally, perhaps with wrath eternally.

So this article says that repentance does not have three parts, according to the priest's and his lies and lies, but that the third part is in his power to give indulgences. But it has three parts according to divine holy scripture, that the third sometimes remains, for the sake of great repentance or its own punishment. But no sin ever remains unpunished, as St. Augustine says: Nullum malum impunitum, no evil remains unpunished; as also the proverb teaches: Where man does not punish, God punishes. Therefore, the pope has to refrain from the punishment of sin just as little as he has to refrain from repentance and confession. For repentance is a sacrament, which is not his, it has not to walk in any part.

The sixth.

The repentance that is prepared by investigation, contemplation and hatred of sins, as when a sinner contemplates his time with bitterness of heart, and conquers the greatness, amount and shame of sin, plus the loss of eternal life, and gain of eternal damnation, makes a hypocrite and greater sinner.

(87) All that is not of faith is sin, says St. Paul, Rom. 14:23. So also they themselves, all my adversaries, say that right repentance of sin should be in love; and if it be not in love, it is not repentance. I have also taught the same in this article, but they condemn their own doctrine, because I also teach it. Even if someone considers his sin and all sin's harm without love and faith, it does not help before God. For the devil and all the damned also have such remorse, which is called Judasreu and Galgenreu in German [Matth. 27, 3-5].

88. and this is done because it is merciful.

2) In Latin: satisfactio; Erlanger: "gnugthun".

and do not have the Spirit of God, they may not love righteousness; and even though they have to consider their sin with fear and trouble, forced by the commandment of the church or the hardships of death, they are so skilled in heart that if there were no hell, or could be without shame and without fear, they would much rather have repentance, confession and atonement. And it is not possible for them to have another heart by their own power of nature, without the grace of God. For man can do no good of himself, but only evil, as I will prove in the 36th article; and even if he pretends to do good, it is still a lie, deception and hypocrisy.

(89) Therefore I have taught, Let every man search his heart first, whether he thoroughly, with desire and a willing heart, hate sin; and if he find himself not so, that he only despiseth his repentance, and first falleth down, and prayeth unto his Lord, and maketh intercession for himself, for a right true repentance, as the church prayeth, Et cor poe- nitens tribue, and then consider his sin. It is a strange thing and a great grace to have a repentant heart, and it cannot be prepared by sin and hell, but only by the Holy Spirit. Otherwise Judas would have had the best repentance, who considered his sin well, with great sorrow. Again, it is a forced, imaginary repentance, as experience shows that so much confession takes place during fasting, and yet little recovery.

90 Such false teaching of hypocritical false repentance was proclaimed by St. Paul in 1 Tim. 4:1 f.: "Teachers will come who follow seducing spirits, and with hypocrisy and good appearances they will teach lies, and have a brand in their conscience. Is it not teaching lies to teach repentance for good, which only seems good, and yet is done without faith, love, air and will (which the grace of God alone gives)? They make a brand in their conscience. Just as such a brand is not really innate or grown, but is forcibly imprinted from outside, so their conscience is not grown by grace, but by the grace of God.

The fact that a person is forced and prepared with false imaginary thoughts turns out to be a repentance and is not true.

91 Such a false conscience and repentance makes not only a hypocrite but also a greater sinner; as St. Jerome also says: Simulata sanctitas est duplex iniquitas, a glittering piety is a twofold wickedness. One is that there is no fundamental piety, but an unwilling, unloving heart for righteousness. The other is that such basic wickedness, with forced thoughts and fictitious repentance, is covered and pretended as a true repentance and piety, so that it wants to deceive and lie to God. Against such false repentance, which the pope and his liars teach as a good repentance, in all their books, I have set this article, and still set and hold it.

It also happens that such false repentants, in contemplation of their sin, again (although deep in the heart) feel flames and sparks of the desire of previous sin, or evil movement of previous hatred and envy, and immediately in repentance gain right desire for sins, which they might have forgotten, if they had not contemplated them; so that nothing is of any use, which does not flow from the gracious work of God, that also St. Paul says: Sins only increase, where they are considered without grace, Rom 5, 17 ff. Paul says: Sins only increase where they are considered and recognized without grace, Rom. 5, 17. ff; Gal. 3, 21. ff. and 1 Cor. 15, 54. ff. These incendiary blind leaders still strive to deceive us, and to present and convince us of the same astonishment and increase of sin for a good repentance.

It is true that through punishment and such forced repentance, hardened, hardened sinners are prevented and stopped from doing their evil for a time in the sight of men, but their hearts do not become righteous in the sight of God. So they do not leave their wickedness any longer, because they have to shy away from people and fear them. But I have worked with my teachings so that these hypocrites and burned consciences would be fewer, which the Pope and his followers increase daily with the devil's teachings, and so that the right, good, grace-filled repentance would become more and more common, so that we would not anger the Almighty God more with false teachings and repentance than we have done with our sins. He will say to them the word of Matth. 21, 31: "Harlots and sons of whores will go before you into the kingdom of heaven"; the glittering, false newcomers and forced piety are so much more a source of disgust to him than public sin and sinners.

94. And that I may prove it still more clearly: I have conquered and proved in the first article that even the saints, living in God's grace, love righteousness with great effort and labor, and resist their fleshly lusts and sins; for if these could not sufficiently hate their sin, what should those do who are still apart from grace, and have no opposition to sin? What should the carnal man do in the absence of the Spirit or grace against sin, if in the presence of the Spirit he contends against God for sin? How could anyone speak more foolishly than that nature, before or without grace, should hate and shun sin or repent of it, if, being in grace, it loves, seeks, desires sin, and contends and rages against grace? as all the saints have lamented.

95 If nature should do of herself that the grace of God cannot wring from her with ceaseless strife, it would be said that a great tree, which I cannot bend with might, if I let it, it bends itself; and a river of arms, which I cannot protect with dams or guns, if I let it go, it stops itself. So the pope and the papists also teach us that grace cannot sufficiently compel sin, but without grace it compels and resists it itself. Only into the dog days with the preachers!

(96) Therefore it is vain deceit and hypocrisy to teach repentance by contemplating only sin and its harm, seeing first Christ in his wounds, and from them his love toward us; and then overcoming our ingratitude, and thus contemplating sin out of hearty, thorough favor toward Christ, and disfavor toward ourselves. This is a true repentance and fruitful penance. For repentance should first be to consider sin, that considering sin may flow from repentance and be prepared, not again that repentance may follow, and be prepared from contemplation. There must be repentance before all contemplation of sin, just as love and pleasure must be there before all good works and their contemplation. Contemplation is the fruit of repentance; repentance is the tree. Now in our lands the fruit grows on and from the trees, and contemplation of sin from repentance; but in Pabst's and Papal saints' lands perhaps the trees grow on the fruit, repentance from the sins; even as they go on the ears, and pervert all things.

The seventh.

True is the saying, and better than all the doctrine which they have hitherto taught of repentance, that it is said, Never-doing is the highest repentance, and a new life is the best repentance; or, Repentance is the best.

97. Is not never-doing the highest penance, as they say in all the world, and in truth, what is the highest penance? Say, O holy father Pabst, we want to listen to you. O thou wolf of Christendom, is it not true that never-ending repentance is not only the right repentance of sin, but also the change of the whole life? Why then is it not the highest and best repentance? For where repentance is rightly approached by the grace of God, man is changed at the same time into another man, heart, courage, mind and life; and this is what I call never-ending repentance, and a new life.

98 Since the pope denies that never-sinning is the highest penance, let us see what he wants to call the highest penance. He will never say that ever-doing, and sinning for and for, is the best penance; Although he and his own repent in the same way, and the first letter of never doing is too much for them, and make never doing into always doing, he must certainly say that Judas' and gallows' repentance is the best repentance, which, made without divine grace from purely natural abilities, is fundamentally wrong, and does not make a new life, nor does it cease to sin, serious and heartfelt opinion; As it is sufficiently proved above that without grace there is no good in man, so also those who live in grace. Have evil and sin contending in them.

99. but the dear pope is moved by the

The little word of Christ Matth. 16, 19: "What you will unbind on earth, shall be loosed in heaven", perhaps thinks, where never-doing would be the highest penance, a man could well become pious at home, would not be allowed to run or send to Rome; thus the Roman treudelmarkt, where one buys and exchanges keys, letters, seals, sin, grace, God, hell, all things, would completely pass away; therefore he must stick the best penance to Rome, to his bag and box.

But we want to prove our articles with scriptures. So St. Paul says Gal. 6, 15: In a Christian state neither the circumcised nor the uncircumcised is valid, but only a new being. Dear Pope, condemn also this apostle who freely says that everything that is not a new being is not valid in Christianity. Now Judaism, made without grace, is not a new being, nor does it raise it, but is a hypocrisy, so it certainly counts for nothing; how then can it be the best repentance?

It is true that a new nature and influence of grace begins with a great temptation and fright of conscience, or otherwise with great suffering and accident, which Revelation 3:20 is called God's knocking or visitation, and causes bitter pain, so that man wants to perish completely and thinks he must perish. But there grace and strength are poured in at the same time, so that man does not perish; and so a new being and good intention is begun there, which is called the right good repentance. Just as we read of St. Paul's conversion, that he, being surrounded by a light from heaven, was frightened, and at the same time received grace, and said [Acts 9:3, 6], "Lord, what shall I do?" So, in the storm and adversity, God pours grace, as it is written Isa. 41:3: "God persecuted them, and so He walked peacefully in them." And the prophet Nahum Cap. 1,3: "God is a Lord, whose ways are like thunderings, lightnings and tempests, and His footsteps are like thick powder clouds"; as if he should say: God, whom He wants to favor, attacks him in such a way that He brings all misfortunes upon him, inwardly and outwardly, so that man thinks that he shall perish before a great storm and temptation.

102. And those who do not suffer his works and ways, drive away his grace from them, and cannot greet God who meets them, nor understand his greeting, nor give thanks. For his greeting is dreadful in the beginning, but comforting in the end. Just as the angel Gabriel frightens Mariam in his greeting, and yet comforts her in the most lovely way. Therefore, the repentance that is practiced with peaceful thoughts is hypocrisy. There must be great earnestness and deep sorrow if the old man is to be undressed. Just as we see when lightning strikes a tree or a man, it does two things at the same time: the first, it tears up the tree and swiftly strangles the man; the second, it turns back the face of the dead man and the broken tree or log to heaven. Thus, the grace of God at the same time frightens man, chases and drives him, and turns him back to Himself. My dear pope knows such works of repentance and grace less than the great block that lies there, and yet he wants to judge and pass judgment within it.

In ancient times there was a heresy called the Donatists, who taught that no man could receive true baptism or the sacraments if the priest or bishop who gave them were holy; St. Augustine overcame them and proved that the sacraments are not of men, but of God alone, who gives them through pious and evil ministers. Since the heresy has been put down, the heresy of the pope comes in its place, and teaches thus: Although he who gives the sacraments need not be pious, he must nevertheless be high and mighty; and what those heretics gave to human holiness, the pope gives to human power and height, and wants that no one has to give sacraments, but he alone, or by his power, God gives, someone has faith, gospel, God's Spirit, or all holiness. The sacraments are now bound to the authority, which in former times did not want to adhere to holiness, and now stick to the red hats, golden crowns and infules, like the scallops to the felt hats and coats of mail.

104 Not content with this, teach further, and give such power to his keys, whether anyone comes who neither believes nor repents, whether he has already

If a man has barely half a salvation, which they call attritio, then he can, by the power of the keys, turn this half salvation into a whole, good, grace-filled repentance, provided the same man does not put a bar in front of it, as mentioned in the first article above. So now the pope can make grace and repentance in us, whether we are already unbelieving pagans and Jews, and without all repentance, and the sacraments must now go, not only from the holiness of the priests, as the Donatists said, but from the power and elevation of men, so that faith is destroyed and forgotten. Seeing then that the pope is not deprived of such heresy and fictitious power (so that he can make the best penances if he wishes), 1) he must deny that never-doing is not the best penance.

105. Beware now of the final Christian, the pope, and be sure that the sacraments hang neither on holiness, nor on height, nor on power, nor on wealth, nor on hats, nor on gloves, nor on pope, nor on bishops, nor to priests, nor to monks, but to your own faith, that whoever absolves you, be he holy or unholy, high or low, poor or rich, pope or priest, believe that God absolves you by him, and you are absolved. For if the sacraments are not attached to holiness, how much less will they be attached to height, power, greatness, honor and riches? since holiness is the greatest thing on earth above all things.

(106) And this is the intention of the words of Christ, when he says [Matth. 16, 19. 18, 18.]: "What you shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven"; so that Christ gives no supremacy, but stirs the heart of every Christian to faith, that he may be sure, when he is absolved by the priest, that he is absolved before God, and that the keys are not able to give more than as much as you believe, and not as much as the pope and his own want. Although their great, assumed power of sacrilege and supremacy is to be suffered, so far nevertheless that you keep the right faith, that no one can give you less or more, than as much as you believe and lie, that the pope and his may make a repentance in you, in the power of the keys, without your faith.

1) The brackets are set by us.

The eighth.

Do not take it upon yourself to confess all daily sins, not even all mortal sins. No one can recognize "all mortal sin," and in the old days only the publicly conscious mortal sins were confessed.

(107) That no daily sin is necessary to confess, they all teach themselves, but because I say it, it must be heresy. I think that if I were to say that there is a God, and confess all the articles of faith, it would all have to be heresy, just because I say it; so pious and true is the pope and his own against me.

108) That not all mortal sins may be confessed nor known is clear from Ps. 19:13: "Lord, who can know all his sins? Make me clean from the same secret sins." Here the prophet teaches us that we cannot confess the secret sins, for God alone knows them, and we should put them away with supplication. But that they are mortal sins is testified by Ps. 143, 2: "Lord, do not come to judgment with your servant, for no living man is found justified in your sight." If the dear saints and servants of God have such sins (which we consider sinless) that they cannot be justified before God, what are you doing, wretched priest, that you also want to justify before God those who, without faith and true repentance, with their damned repentance, have begun repentance? They must be mortal sins, for the sake of which even the saints may not be justified before God. For what hinders justification is a mortal sin; and again.

For this reason I have taught, and so should everyone teach, the people to fear God, and after all the diligence of confession to God, to say with David, "Behold, dear God, I have confessed this and that; now your judgments are secret and terrible: if you will enter into judgment with me, I will never stand before you, I will do to him as I do. Who knows all his sins? Therefore I flee from thy judgment unto thy mercies, and pray thee make me clean from all my unknown sins. So people could learn to comfort themselves on God's grace, and not on their own repentance, confession and satisfaction, as the final Christian teaches with his disciples.

That only public sins were confessed in the past, I let the histories say and prove, along with the epistles of St. Paul. I have said only of the mortal sins, which man himself is aware of, though they are secret among men. About these, I say, there are more, which no one but God knows; therefore, let people be at peace, and do not make them investigate all their sins, since this is impossible; and let them confess those which occur to them at the time or which they are aware of, so that they may respect the faith of divine graces more than their full confession.

The ninth.

When we undertake to confess all sin purely, we do nothing else, except that we will not leave it to the divine mercy to') forgive it.

This article has already been proven from the previous one and others. For if it is true, as David says in Ps. 19:13, that no one knows all his sins, we must by necessity leave those unknown sins to the mercy of God, and so rely not on our confession nor repentance, but on His grace, asking with humble, fearful prayer that He may cleanse us of them, as has been said.

(112) Also, as we have shown in the first and second articles, how all the saints complain of their sins in the flesh, which they cannot be rid of, we must confess that these remaining sins must also be committed by God's grace; which, if he were to judge quickly (as he will do to those who despise them), would all be found deadly. That the Pope condemns such things is not surprising, for they teach us to rely in all things on our own work and his power, and not on God's mercy, so that the fear of God and hope are extinguished in the Christian heart. But St. Augustine says Confess. 9: "Woe to all human life, however good it is, if it is judged without mercy. So St. Augustine also wants to have the good life ordered to mercy, and does not like God's judgment: how do we then not leave some hidden sin of his grace? Oh, it is annoying to hear such clear truth to be condemned by the pope; it is end-Christian essence with pope and papists.

The tenth.

No one's sins are forgiven, unless he believes that they will be forgiven when the priest absolves him. Yes, the sin would remain if he did not believe that it was forgiven. For it is not enough to have forgiveness or the influence of grace, but one must believe that the sin is forgiven.

From this article's condemnation it follows, first, that the article of Christian faith is false and heretical, since all Christians say: "I believe in the Holy Spirit, a holy Christian church, forgiveness of sin. For this article of mine does not teach otherwise than that we should believe forgiveness of sin, just as the article of Christian faith reads. Thank you, Most Holy Father Pope, that you teach us now that the world has never known before how the article, Forgiveness of Sin, is heretical. But if this one article of faith is heretical, then certainly all articles are heretical. So here the most holy father pope condemns the whole Christian faith so grossly that I only fear no one will believe that such a thing is in the bull. Now it is written in it; that is why they are ashamed that the bull is Germanized, and: their end-christian, heretical ravings come to light.

(114) Secondly, the sinner must say to the priest who absolves him, "You deny that my sins are forgiven, as you say. For the Holy Father Pope recently issued a bull condemning all those who believe that their sins are forgiven and that absolution is true; but he who goes to confession should think thus: I want to confess, but I will consider all absolution to be lies, heresy, and error, and I will call all priests liars, heretics, and seducers who absolve anyone; the pope has told me so in his bull.

Thirdly, it follows that Christ himself is a liar and a heretic, since he says to Petro, Matth. 16, 19: "What you loose on earth shall be loose in heaven. For this tender bull gives by banishment and fire that no one should believe that it is loose what the priest that is, he should not ever believe that his sins are forgiven, as my article reads. If anyone does not believe that such an abomination is written in the bull, let him read it and see what it condemns. I would also have believed that the sky would fall before such things should come from the pope. I think that the pope has come to his end. However, this article is so publicly true that all Christians' ears are reasonably frightened and horrified by the Pope's condemnation, since it is the greatest practice in all Christendom for one to comfort the other, to believe and trust in God's mercy, which forgives his sin; without the evil spirit, in the last moments of death, blowing into people's heads, as the pope teaches in this bull, that they should not believe that their sin is forgiven. But he does not do this as if it were right and well done, but as an enemy of grace, faith and truth. But the pope, worse than all devils, teaches this as right and good doctrine, sits in God's place, and condemns faith, which no devil has ever done. O, it will be with thee, thou child of perdition and final Christian! Stop it, Pabst, you make it too rough and too much. But let us prove the article, for Christ Matt. 9:2, when he healed the gout-ridden man, he said before, "My son, trust and believe, and thy sins be forgiven thee." Here you see clearly that sins are not forgiven, but he believes that they are forgiven. And Mariam Magdalenam he absolves because of her faith, Luc. 7, 50. for thus his words are: "Go in peace, your faith has helped you." Do you see that it was faith that helped her and destroyed her sin, that Christ himself did not attribute the forgiveness of sins to his absolution, nor to the key, nor to the power, but to her faith? But the pope pretends that it is the fault of his power and not of man's faith that sins are forgiven. What kind of spirit this means to him, is well to be noticed.

1) Thus, according to the Latin. Erlanger: that.

Everybody knows that the priest's absolution is a judgment that is not his, but the priest's.

which, in virtue of the words of Christ, when he says [Matth. 16, 19.]: "What you absolve shall be loosed," demands faith, and thus reads: I absolve thee; that is so much as to say, I dissolve thee, or, thy sins are forgiven thee; how then does it rhyme that such divine judgment the sinner should not believe? Now burn and condemn books, pope! So God shall overthrow thee, and cast thee into a foolish mind [Rom. 1, 28.], because thou always resistest divine truth, that thou mayest receive thy deserved reward. Doubt now, whoever will, whether the pope, who drives such errors into the world more than too much, and takes money and property of all countries for it, is the right, main, last final Christian; I thank God that I know him.

The eleventh.

Thou shalt not trust that thou shalt be absolved because of thy repentance, but because of the word of Christ, which saith unto Petro, Whatsoever thou shalt unbind shall be unbinden. Here I say, if thou art absolved by the priest, thou shalt firmly believe that thou art absolved, and thou shalt surely be absolved, whatever thy repentance may be.

This article is sufficiently demonstrated in the previous one. For who would confess or atone if he did not believe that his sins were forgiven? What would the priest say if I came and said, "Lord, I have sinned thus, and I am sorry, but I do not believe that I will be absolved by you? Nor does the bull teach them to do so, and condemn such faith as my article teaches.

But if it is true that sins are forgiven because of our repentance, as the bull teaches, and not because of God's word alone, as my article says, then a man would boast against God that he had obtained grace and forgiveness through his repentance and merit, and not through God's mercy alone; which is horrible and terrible to hear, and grace would be denied altogether. For God's mercy and grace is given in vain to the undeserving, as Rom. 3, 24. Paul says: "We have been pardoned and justified in vain and out of pure mercy"; and Ps. 25, 11: "Lord, you would be merciful to my sins for your name's sake." He does not say, for my name or merit.

119. also, as it has been sufficiently said above that the dear saints still have sin, and as sin contends against grace, and grace against sin, it is clear enough that grace is not only given to the undeserving, but also to the evil-deserving men and enemies of grace; how then should our repentance be so worthy that for its sake God should forgive sin, and not for his own sake? who says through the prophet Isaiah, Cap. 48, 9. 11: "I will turn away my disgrace from thee for my name's sake; and I will do it all for my own sake, that I be not blasphemed, and will not give my glory to another" 2c. Now if for our repentance sins were forgiven, the glory would be ours and not God's; he would also be blasphemed, as if sin were not forgiven merely for his name's sake.

120. So King Manasseh asked that God would forgive his sin for the sake of God's goodness and His promise, not according to his merit or repentance. [Prayer of Manasseh, v. 11-13.] And what shall I say long? If any man be forgiven his sins because of his repentance, as this accursed bull lies and blasphemes, let him blot out the common prayer, where we all say, Lord, have mercy on me unworthy, poor sinner; and let him alone say thus, Lord, forgive me worthy and well-deserving and wholly sufficient saint my sin; and punish the centurion in the Gospel, when he said, Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldest come under my roof [Matt. 8,8].

If ever the pope and his saints are so worthy that God must forgive sin for their repentance, my advice would be that he put on his triple crown, and saddled his stallion with gold and pearls, rode in all his splendor before God, and defied him: with his own great worthiness; and would not forgive him sin, that he banished him, and chased him out of heaven. Where do you want to go in the end, you devilish hope? Well then, you can see why you were called the holiest of holies before all the world. Continue, your blasphemy and raving against God will come to an end.

(122) Therefore I say and warn everyone that he should give glory to God and not trust that sins will be forgiven because of his repentance. For no repentance is sufficient in the sight of God, but for the sake of God's pure mercy, who wants to be honored, praised and loved, to show us unworthy and undeserving of grace. Beware of such bulls and their like teachers!

The twelfth.

If it were possible for a man to confess without Ren, or for a priest to absolve him lightly or jokingly, when he thinks he is absolved, he is certainly absolved.

In the whole Gospel, Christ based all things on faith, saying [Marc. 9:23], "All things are possible to him who believes"; item [Matth. 8:13], "It happens to you as you believe. Therefore it is true that even though the priest joked, yet I receive his absolution with earnestness and believe, it happens to me, not as he does, but as I believe. I said this to prove how great and necessary faith is in repentance, that everything depends on it. And although it is not possible to believe without repentance, as I said above, when I proved how faith and grace are poured in with a great tempest, if it were possible, faith alone would still be enough. For God did not offer His grace on repentance, nor on any work, but only on faith, when He said, "He who believes will be saved" [Marc. 16, 16].

124 And why should not a frivolous absolution be valid, as St. Paul says, Phil. 1, 15, that also the word of God is valid and helps the faithful, if it is preached by his enemies and persecutors, and they all confess that the sacraments, even given by evil unbelieving priests, still have power, even if he is hostile to the penitent. Sin and unbelief are ever greater than jesting or frivolity.

1) In the original: for all. The Wittenbergers and the Jenaers have our reading.

And that I say even more, they must confess that he also receives the benefit of the sacrament who heartily desires it, even if the priest wilfully denies it to him; so much depends on the faith of the penitent; as he is skilful, so he sees, the priest gives or does not give, jokes or is serious; as the sacrament comes, falls, passes, so it is God's sacrament, and can be seen with faith. But God's friend in Rome, the Pope, would like to destroy this faith and deceive us into trusting his power more than God's Sacrament, as if he could forgive sin by force without our faith. God protect all Christian hearts from the end-Christ and Satan's apostle!

The thirteenth.

In the sacrament of penance and forgiveness of sins, the pope or bishop does no more than the least priest. Indeed, where there is no priest, any Christian man does just as much, whether he be a woman or a child.

There, there, the article has hit the right blood sore; here it was necessary to defend and condemn! For the article should make the keys fall out of the shield of the idol at Rome, where he would let him go. But yet it shall not help him, he shall not rightly refute him; and so prove him:

(127) It has been sufficiently demonstrated that it is not the work of the priest, but the faith of the penitent that brings about the forgiveness of sins. For if the pope and all the priests gathered together were to pronounce absolution on a sinner, it would be of no use if the sinner did not believe. For the word stands firm: "He who does not believe is lost"; nothing helps against it. Yes, how should the pope's and all priests' absolution help without faith? If Christ, even God Himself, were to pronounce it, it would still 1) help nothing without faith. Is it not so that God preaches daily and works miracles before men, and yet does not help, because only those believe Him?

(128) For forgiveness is wholly due to faith, and not to priesthood or ministry.

and the pope is as little able to give faith as the lowest priest, the priest as little as a woman and child, I would like to be taught by the pope what he would do more for it than a bad priest? Let your wisdom be heard, dear pope! I will tell you what you do more than another bad priest: you hang up big flags with keys, and sell bulls, ring bells, cheat country and people of money, goods, body and soul, and lead them with you into the abyss of hell; you do this more than other priests and Christians.

129 Thus it is said above how the heretics Donatists, who wanted to bind all sacraments to the holiness of the priests and not to the faith of the penitents, overcome by Augustine, were nevertheless more sorry and better than the pope and his bishops, who want to bind the sacraments to the height and power. For if a holy priest does not do more in the sacraments than a sinful one, how can a great and high priest do more than a low and lesser one, if holiness counts for much more than authority? Therefore, it is clear that the pope alone assigns him the keys, with the same right as Lucifer in heaven wanted to assign him the divine chair. Since the keys are given only to the sacrament of penance, which is common to all Christians, and no one has more or less of it than he who believes more or less of it.

I ask you, most holy father pope, whether you have another sacrament of baptism than all priests and Christians, and whether you do more for the sake of your height when you baptize than a chaplain, layman, woman or child? Tell me, have you become a mute 2) here? If you have another baptism, St. Paul punishes you Eph. 4, 5: "It is one faith, one baptism, one Lord" 2c. If the sacrament of baptism is the same for all Christians, that a layman, woman and child may give it, as happens daily, why should not the sacrament of the keys, penance or absolution also be the same and common? Is it not a sacrament as well as baptism?

131. further, you also have another fair,

1) In the original: "hulft". Wittenberg and Jena: helps.

2) In the original: "a mute".

than all other priests, or can you give more of the Corpus Christi than our chaplain? What do you show of the key sacrament, that you want to do more in it than all of Christendom? Thou seekest thy own free power over the churches, and makest of the key sacrament an unequal, unequal power and tyranny for thyself. If all sacraments are of equal value to anyone who can give them, you cannot take the keys off yourself and make another sacrament of your own than common Christianity has.

For this reason, all Christians should beware of the Pabst's end-Christian poison. As all baptisms and masses are equal wherever and by whom they are given, so absolution is equal wherever and by whom it is given. For it all depends on the faith of the one who receives it, not on the holiness, art, height, power of the one who gives it. Just as baptism cannot be divided and given to the pope and bishops in a different way than to all Christians, so neither can the mass and keys be divided, so that the pope has a different sacrament of the keys and mass than all of Christendom. But if he has another, or more, St. Paul excludes him from Christianity, as he says Eph. 4:5: "One faith, one baptism, one Lord."

It is true that the pope and the bishops reserve some cases and sins for them, but this is the custom of human laws and has been torn down by force. In this way, however, they no longer act in the forgiveness of guilt, they act only in the forgiveness of punishment or chastisement. But the forgiveness of guilt is actually the key and sacrament of repentance, which requires faith. The forgiveness of punishment does not require faith, but it is felt sensitively, and happens without faith, and does not actually belong to the sacrament of the keys. My article, however, says of the forgiveness of sins that it is common to everyone, like baptism and mass, and may not be caught by any height or force, as the pope pretends and lies with his own.

The fourteenth.

No one shall answer the priest that he has repented, nor shall the priest demand it.

This must also be error to you, O holy father pope; now you must let it be truth, and prove it thus. For since it is not at our discretion, but at God's judgment, whether our repentance is right or not, no one can say without presumption that he has repented. For St. Paul 2 Cor. 10:18 says: "Not he who praises himself is approved, but he whom God praises"; and 1 Cor. 4:4: "I am not aware of anything, but I am not justified by it. I do not judge myself, but God the Lord is the one who judges me." To this David says Ps. 19:13: "Lord, who knows all his sin?"

Now if a man should say that he has truly repented, then he would be driven to his own presumption and to impossible works, so that he would recognize all his sin and evil. Indeed, since all the saints still have evil and sin in them, it is not possible for anyone to repent, which is enough before God's judgment, but they all speak with David [Ps. 143:2]: "Lord, do not enter into judgment with your servant, for before you no man who lives is found justified." If no one is found justified, how can he be found repentant, if repentance is the beginning of justification? Why then, O Father, do you want to teach Christians pride and presumption, so that they run into God's judgment?

(136) Thus Christians should be taught that a penitent knows how no repentance is worthy and sufficient before God, and should thus say: Behold, dear Lord, I know that I am not found truly repentant before your judgment, and that there are still many evil lusts in me that prevent true repentance; but because you have promised mercy, I flee from your judgment, and because my repentance is nothing before you, I rely and consider your promise in this sacrament. And if the priest inquires about repentance, he shall say: Lord, before me I am repentant, but before God it is a bad repentance, since I cannot stand with it, but I hope for his grace, which you shall give me now from his command.

agree. This is how people should always be driven to faith. For in death repentance will become all too great, and faith all too small. God's promise is certain in the sacrament, our repentance is never certain; therefore, it is not on uncertain repentance, but on his certain promise that he has built us, so that we may endure in all adversity.

The fifteenth.

It is a great error for those who go to the sacrament and rely on the fact that they have confessed or are not aware of a mortal sin and have said their prayers. All these eat and drink judgment. But if they believe and trust that they receive grace there, the same faith alone makes them pure and worthy.

I have taught this article for the sake of the stupid consciences who prepare themselves for the sacrament with so much effort and torture, and yet never have peace, and do not know how they are with God. Since it is not possible for a heart to have peace unless it trusts in God, and not in its own works, diligence or prayers. St. Paul Rom. 5, 1. says: "Through faith we have peace with God." If peace comes through faith alone, it cannot come through works, prayer or any other thing. This is also taught by experience; even if someone works himself to death, his heart still does not have peace until he begins to surrender to God's grace, to dare and to trust.

138. so also St. Peter Apost. 15:9 teaches that God alone purifies the heart through faith. Thus faith must be prior to the sacrament, without which all prayers do not purify, as this article teaches. It is also sufficiently said above that all works without faith are dead and sinful, as St. Paul teaches in Romans 14:23: "Everything that is not of faith is sin. How then can confession, prayer and all kinds of preparation be without sin if they are done without faith? Therefore, faith alone must be the cleansing and worthy preparation.

139 Not that I reject such prayer and preparation, but that no one should rely on it, and must have more than such preparation, namely faith. For since God promises His grace in the sacrament and offering, as stated in the first article, praying and working is not enough; the same divine promise must be believed, so that we do not make Him a liar through our unbelief [1 John 5:10]. What else is done, if you go to the Sacrament without such confidence with many preparations, but as if you say to God: You deny in your promise of this Sacrament, and will not give me grace. O, O, O thou bull of vice! what dost thou teach? what dost thou condemn?

They have driven us away from such faith and custom of the sacrament by the saying of St. Paul 1 Cor. 11, 28. "Man shall feel himself, and then eat of this bread, and drink of this cup," which they have drawn from the conscience of sin to investigate, since it is rather based on faith and trust, since no man can investigate all his mortal sin, as is shown above in Psalm 19:13: "Lord, who knows his sin? It is not enough if you are not aware of any mortal sin, as St. Paul says in 1 Cor. 4:4: "I am not aware of anything, but that does not justify me." Why then are we driven to such impossible, forgiven, lost work, and silence faith, according to which man should most test or feel himself? as was said in the previous article. One always wants to drive us from faith into works, so I would like one to drive us from works into faith. Faith may be followed by works, but works are never followed by faith.

The sixteenth.

It would be good that the church in a common concilio ordered to give the laity both forms of the sacrament; and the Bohemians, ignoring both forms, are not heretics nor ambivalent. 1)

141 St. Paul easily wins the article from the pope, and yet wants to be unbanned by his holiness, and gives nothing to the bull; indeed, he banishes the pope, bulls, and all his followers in one heap, since he is

1) In the Bull of Leo X, in this volume Col. 1436, it is said: "but schismatics," while in § 154 of this writing it is again said: "The Greeks and Bohemians are not heretics nor partisans in this piece." Likewise in § 156.

Gal. 1:8: "Whosoever shall preach unto you any other thing than that which ye are taught in the gospel, though it were an angel from heaven, let him be utterly destroyed. Listen, Pabst, this is for you. Christ in the Gospel of Matthew, Mark, Luke, in the last supper, has instituted both forms and given them to all, and said to all: "This you shall do, as often as you do it, remembering me" [Matth. 26, 26. 27. Marc. 14, 23. Luc. 22, 19. 20J.

Now the pope teaches us differently, and gives only one form and half the sacrament, therefore he is certainly banned and banished by St. Paul. If you, Pabst, with all of yours, bite this little nut, and cannot prove yourself banished or banned before God, I will revoke everything I have written all my life and say that you are a Pabst. If you do not do this, do not blame me for calling you the final Christian, whom Paul banished and maligned, as the one who changes his Lord's order, contradicts his gospel, and turns it around. You know that you can neither speak nor raise anything against it; why then do you force your will against such an open and clear text of the Gospel? Dear, let us also deny the Lord's Prayer!

They say that Christ gave both forms only to the apostles and priests, and commanded them to give one or both forms to the laity. So I ask, where is the order described? I hold, in the dark smokehole; it is a muthwillful lie and fictitious gloss. For Christ, when he gave the cup, added the word "all" to it, saying, "Drink from it, all of you" [Matt. 26:27, Marc. 14:23]. Which he did not do, when he gave the bread: no doubt he would have forestalled the Roman iniquity and heresy, seeing that they would rob the cup from his Christians, and suffer the gospel greatly that they denied the bread, because he saith not, Eat ye all of this; but, Drink ye all of it. Oh, how they should cry out and rage, if the word "all" were said with the bread and not with the cup, no one would be able to keep them. Nor do they want to be caught and restrained with a clear text, so publicly decided.

The church also sings in the hymn Verbum supernum: He gave his flesh and blood to his disciples in two forms, so that he might feed the whole man, who is made of two natures. If the church is right in this song, then both forms should be given to all Christians, since not only the priests, but also the laity are people of two natures, to whom this food is given in its entirety and to the whole person.

However, we want to set stronger reasons. St. Paul says 1 Cor. 10, 17: "We are One Bread and One Body, all who partake of One Bread and One Cup." Here I ask: whether the laity are also Christians and members of the Christian body, of which St. Paul says: "We are all One Body"? I hope that one would have to say yes. Why then does the pope want to separate them and let only the priests be Christians, if he does not want to let all of them have a share of one bread and of one cup? as St. Paul says here that all who belong to the body should have a share of one bread and of one cup, if they are able, and not be prevented; of this more hereafter.

146) After 1 Cor. 11, 23-25, he does not say to the priests, but to all the Christians of the same city: "I have received from the Lord what I have taught you (do not say: what I have taught your priests alone): The Lord Jesus, on the night when he was betrayed, took bread and gave thanks to God, and broke it and said: Take and eat, this is my body, which is given for you; do this in remembrance of me. And when he had eaten, he took the cup, and said, This is the cup, a new testament in my blood; which do ye, as often as ye drink it, in remembrance of me" 2c.

Here you see what the apostle received from the Lord and gave to the Corinthians, as he says; namely, both figures, with words so clearly expressed that I am surprised how the schismatics, partisans, Roman Christians and half-sacramenters do not turn red or pale before it.

148 He says further [1 Cor. 11:26]: "As often as you eat this bread and drink this cup, you shall proclaim the death of the Lord.

long until he comes," does not say, "As often as you priests alone eat and drink, but speak to them all. Neither saith he that they should do all these things until the pope come and ordain them otherwise, but until the Lord himself come at the last day.

149] More [v. 27]: "Whosoever eateth this bread, and drinketh this cup unworthily, is guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." Say not, which priest, but in common, which of you all; neither say, he is guilty of the body only, but also of the blood of Christ; always put both together, eating and drinking, bread and cup.

150 Item [v. 28]: "Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of this bread and drink of this cup. He does not say, Let the priest alone examine himself, but let every man who is a Christian in Corinth. For he writes not this epistle to the Gentiles, neither saith he, Man eateth of bread alone, and drinketh not of the cup, as the pope teacheth us, and exempteth us from our own sacrament.

Item 29: "He that eateth and drinketh unworthily eateth and drinketh judgment, as he that esteemeth not the body of the Lord. But once this is said to all, and drinking is bound to eating; which the pope separates and respects not greatly.

At the end he says [v. 30]: "Therefore many of you are sick and weak and dead, because you eat and drink unworthily. I mean, such punishment and plague did not go over the priests alone, because he says: "Many among you are sick", otherwise would have said: many of your priests are sick 2c.

Now what can the Roman traveller do against these mighty sayings of St. Paul? To this he is opposed by the long-standing custom of all Christendom throughout the world, which still persists even among the Greeks, whom Rome herself has not allowed to call heretics or apostates. Why then should I suffer that the Bohemians or anyone else should be called heretics for this, whether they eat both forms? as Christ and St. Paul teach, and all the world, without the pope, has in use. For this purpose it was decided at Basel in the Concilio that they do right. What then does this bull condemn even their own Concilium?

For this reason I have revoked and still revoke this article, which I considered far too mild and gentle, and now say thus: The Greeks and Bohemians are neither heretics nor partisans in this matter, but the most Christian and best followers of the Gospel on earth. And pray to them through Christ our Lord with these writings, that they may remain steadfast in their opinion, and not be deceived by the Roman tyrant and the final Christian's perverse, unholy laws, who out of sheer spite takes one form and half the sacrament from the Christians, whom Christ himself and all the apostles have given, and the church has long used in all the world.

He instructs the priests to take both forms, and gives the reason: it does not suffer. To take one, since both forms are a full sacrament, which is not to be divided. Again, since he gives the layman one form, he gives the reason: one form is a completely full sacrament, and thus plays dice with God's words and sacraments, like a juggler. It is whole and not whole to him, if and where he wants, may contradict him freely, and lie and deceive on both sides. So the priests have another sacrament than the laity, just as he has other keys and sacraments of repentance than all Christendom has.

156 Secondly, I say that the pope and all of his knowing relatives in this piece are heretics, apostates, banished and maligned, because they teach differently than the gospel has inside, and follow their own head, contrary to the common custom of all Christendom. For these are called heretics and apostates, who transgress the doctrine of their fathers, and separate themselves from the common way and usage of all Christendom, and devise new ways and measures out of sheer wilfulness, without cause, contrary to the holy gospel. This is what the final Christian at Rome does in this and many more pieces; nor does he lift up his insolent blasphemous mouth to heaven, blaspheming the Greek church for being ambiguous and apostate, when he is the first and only one of all secessions and parties, the head, cause and instigator; as is the case today and all histories prove.

157 But here I want to exempt and excuse the poor bunch, which is not to blame for the fact that it receives only one form. The pope and his followers alone are guilty; I mean them alone. For at the same time, if someone desired to be baptized, and the pope forbade it and took it away from him, his faith and desire would be accepted before God as if he had been baptized, since the obstacle is not on him. But the pope would be a heretic and unchristian who would withhold baptism from him. We must also suffer that the pope and his followers do not preach, which they owe us with much high duty, and therefore we do not do wrong with them, but only suffer wrong.

So, even though the pope owes us to give both forms, if he does not do so and deprives us, we suffer such his violence and injustice; nevertheless, we remain devout Christians before God, and still receive the fruit of the whole sacrament through our faith and devotion. What would we have to do if he or the Turk took both our forms? What do those who are imprisoned do now? Sick and young children, all of whom can receive no form, and yet all of whom retain the fruit of the sacrament? In the past, some holy fathers did not go to the sacrament for many years in the desert.

But I speak only of those who desire both forms; to them they should be given, and not refused; for the pope is not a lord, but a servant of the sacrament, obliged to administer it when and whoever wishes to have it, as well as baptism and penance 2c. Christ also urged no one to do this. For he saith not, Ye shall do this, but thus, When ye do this, remember me," [Luc. 22:19] not commanding that we do it, but keeping his memory when we do it. But he has left it free, if we want to do it. This liberty the pope sows and keeps within; again, he urges it once a year, which yet Christ does not do; that ever his being should go against Christ with commandment and prohibition, as befits a true anti-Christian to do.

160 I say this, not that I wish anyone to act sacrilegiously here against the tyranny of the pope; for tyranny and injustice we shall suffer, does us no harm; but that everyone may have understanding and instruction in these matters, and see how Christ and the pope are alike, and how things should or should not go in Christendom, so that no one may mix himself up in the pope's sin, error and ruin, and justify him, and, as his boys do, take his wrong for right or praise it, but, just as if someone were to take our life and limb, we should suffer it patiently, and confess our guilt to God, but not justify it, nor praise it, as if he had done good. So, even if the pope deprives us of the gospel and sacrament, we should suffer and confess our sin to God, who thus lets the pope be a plague on us. We well deserve that the final Christ should reign over us. But we are not to praise and justify him as if he were doing well, and call him Sanctissimum, but to publicly confess and punish his diabolical, heretical tyranny against him; as Christ punished the 1) Jews wrong, and yet suffered the same wrong from them.

To conclude, I amend this article and say: It would be good that not only in a common concilio, but also every bishop in his diocese again ordered to give both form and the whole sacrament to the laity, and thus followed the Gospel, without thanksgiving of the pope. For a bishop is obliged to stand against the wolf for the sheep of Christ, whom Christ has commanded him, and should handle the Gospel with life and limb, while he sits in the place of Christ.

If this is not the case, I advise every Christian layman to remember how his Lord Christ placed both forms in one sacrament, and therefore to desire and believe them both in his heart. And thus receive the holy sacrament half bodily, half spiritually, because this perilous time of the final Christ does not permit any further. He also complains to God that because of our sin we are deprived of our own good and sacrament, which Christ gave us and his Antichrist took away. For if anyone despises to desire both these things in the least, he is not a Christian. Let not their talk be moved,

1) In the original: "who". Wittenberg: "Christum die Juden unrecht strafen." The Jenaer has "der" as a conjecture in the margin.

They say that the whole sacrament is received under the bread. Christ also knew well that everything would be received under one form, even in faith alone, without the sacrament; yet he did not use both forms in vain.

The seventeenth

The treasures of the Church, from which the pope gives indulgences, do not find the merits of Christ and the saints.

The pope and his hypocrites, that they might make indulgences dear to the poor people, and take the treasure of the world to themselves, invent, and to the greatest dishonor of Christ teach, that Christ's merit is the treasure of indulgences. But when it is asked where they get the reason for this in the Scriptures, they puff themselves up and boast of their power, saying, "Is it not enough that we say it? Against this I say this article, and can ground it in Scripture.

He himself says Joh. 6, 51, "that he is the living bread from heaven, he who eats of it lives forever". So says Isaiah, Cap. 53, 4, "that he bore our sin. And there is not a Christian so small who does not know that Christ's merit and suffering put away our sin and makes us blessed, all believing that he died for our sin; from which it is clear that Christ's suffering and merit is a living treasure, and gives eternal life to all who partake of it. Now they must all confess themselves that indulgences do not give life, and are a dead thing, from which no one is improved, let alone becomes alive. It does not take away sin, but the punishment of sin. Now no one is so foolish (except the pope and his flatterers) as to think that the remission or remittal of punishment makes anyone better; but the imposition of punishment may well make someone better, as all reason, experience, Scripture, and truth teach.

Therefore, indulgence and Christ's merit rhyme together, like life and death, like day and night, like Christ and Belial (2 Cor. 4:14, 15), like the pope and a Christian man. And also has its proper name. For indulgence means as much as to let go or to abate; it lets go of all good, and lets go of all misfortune; it lets sin go unpunished.

Yes, it puts away the punishment of sin, which God lays out and demands, and as much as is in it, it lets sins go free, and does not hinder them, yes, protects and helps them, while it remits all punishment, and lets money be given and taken for it. For the sake of which St. Paul to the Thessalonians calls the pope "a man of sin, and a child of perdition" [2 Thess. 2:3], because he allows and promotes sin, and thus leads all the world to the devil with him, through his lying, deceitful indulgence, 166 If, having been confronted with this truth, they do not know how to answer, they invent such a dream: the merits of Christ may be used in two ways: first, as it is now said, that they make alive; secondly, that they are also sufficient for our sin. Then I answer, "Yes, they are needed more than once. They are needed more than once, to make money, to attain high rank and honor, to have pleasure and good days, to lead the world into war, blood and all miseries. And what is now in Rome and the whole Roman Church in a more shameful custom than Christ's name and merit? The pope with all his knaves would have been a beggar long ago, if he had not Christ to sell, and all his wiles to propose. Everything must now be covered by Christ's name, which corrupts the regime of the end Christ in the world, as he himself proclaimed, Matth. 24, 5: "Many shall come in my name, and shall deceive many." So the indulgence and its jugglers also come in the name of Christ and his merits, and deceive the whole world, so that even the elect are hardly safe from it.

The eighteenth.

Indulgences are a divine deception of Christians, and indulgences of good works, and of the number of things that are permitted, and not found beneficial.

Some who recognized the inefficiency of indulgences, and yet were not allowed to contradict the teacher of sin in Rome, had a saying and said: Indulgences are a divine deception; that is, even if it is nothing and deceives the people, if it is a reason to give money into boxes, which was considered a good work, it would be a good deception.

Deception, but for the good, divine work. I followed these at that time, and also said so; for I knew no better at that time.

168. But now that the Holy Father Pope has given me a contradiction and condemns this article, I will be obedient and say: I confess my error, the article is not true; and now I say thus: Indulgence is not a divine deception, but a hellish, diabolical, endchristian deception, thievery, robbery, by which the Roman Nimrod and teacher of sin sells sin and hell to all the world and sucks and licks all their money for such unspeakable damage. If the contradiction is not enough, I will correct it another time, and prove it thus: God says Ps. 89, 33: I will punish their sin with the rod, and punish their iniquity with the strokes of men." And St. Paul 1 Cor. 11, 31.: "If we punish ourselves, God will not punish us. But if he punish us, he chasten us, that we be not condemned with this world."

Here you see that sin must be punished, whether by God, man, or ourselves, if we are not otherwise to be damned with this world. The pope still wants to blind the eyes of the clear sayings, and have all sin unpunished by his indulgence, so that we shall be damned with the world, as St. Paul says here. And he wants to cover and sell such abominations with Christ's merit, and Christ's merit must serve him against such public word of God. O Pabst, O Pabst, let it be enough for once!

The nineteenth.

Indulgence does not serve to remove the punishment or chastisement that divine justice demands for sins committed.

The twentieth.

They are deceived who believe that indulgences make one blessed and are beneficial to the soul.

The twenty-first.

Indulgences are only necessary for public mortal sins, 1) and are actually only granted to the lazy and soft.

The zwemndzwanzigste.

Indulgences are neither useful nor necessary to six kinds of people: the dead, the sick, those who honestly prevent, those who do not have mortal sin, those who do not have public mortal sin, those who do something better.

In honor of the sacred and revered bull, I revoke everything I have ever taught about indulgences, and I am sorry in my heart for everything good I have ever said about them. Do not let yourself be challenged, dear man, that the pope here pretends that indulgences are useful to the soul and make it blessed; this has never been heard before, not even from yourself; the old dragon from the abyss of the hells speaks in this bull. Let us dwell on the fact that indulgences are not as the pope gives them. For, as it is said, no sin remains unpunished. Now if an angel says otherwise from heaven, let no one believe it [Gal. 1:8]. And if it has happened to my books that they have been burned, it has certainly happened because I have given and served the pope and his people too much in the indulgence, and I myself condemn such teaching to the fire.

The twenty-third.

The ban is only an external punishment, does not deprive the person of the common prayer of Christianity.

Behold, how the pope strives to be God! In the previous articles, he himself took away the power to make souls blessed through indulgences; in this one, he takes the power to condemn souls through excommunication, both of which are works of the high divine majesty alone, and which no creature can do. This is what St. Paul proclaimed about him: "He will sit and reign in the church of God, and will present himself as if he were God, and will resist and exalt himself above all that is God" [2 Thess. 2, 4].

I have proven this article sufficiently in the sermon on the ban, and I still say recently: A Christian being stands in faith, which neither the pope nor the devil can give or take away. Where this remains, all things are harmless, even death and hell, even the sin committed, as St. Paul says in Romans 8:28: "All things work for the good of the believer" or Christian. Therefore, the ban can be no more than an external punishment, the is a separation of the community from the church and sacraments. Also the pope himself says in his rights (as he has provided that he once teaches something good) that the ban is a medicine, and not a disturbance; so it must ever not do harm inwardly, but help and improve.

1) Erlanger: "mortal sinners", but in the bull: xudlieis oriminibus. Cf. Col. 1437.

The twenty-fourth.

Christians should be taught that they love the ban more than they fear it.

This is because the pope wants to remain God, and everyone is more afraid of him than of the high, true majesty. But the article from the previous one is already proven, because the ban is a punishment of sin and a remedy for the soul, and he who deserves it should bear it willingly and gladly. Although he should be afraid of sin, so that he may deserve the ban, 1) as a child should be afraid to do evil; but if he does evil, he should gladly suffer the punishment and kiss the rod. If God wants us to suffer death gladly and to love all sufferings, how much more should we love and like this foxtail and motherwort. Except for the pope and his church, who are afraid of their own star 2) in the eye, as it is written Proverbs 28:1: "Unchristian sinners are afraid, and no one chases them.

The twenty-fifth.

The Roman bishop, St. Peter's offspring, is not Christ's governor, ordained by Christ over all the churches of the whole world.

174 This is also the main point of one who has destroyed the holy gospel and has placed an idol of oil in the place of Christ in Christendom, against which I have placed and still place this article, and thus prove it:

175 First, since everything that happens in the church is proclaimed with clear, public sayings of Scripture, is it ever a wonder that nothing of the papacy is publicly invented in the whole Bible, since it is the only thing that is publicly invented in the whole Bible?

The Church has always considered the papacy to be almost the greatest, most necessary and most special thing in the Church, above all things. It is ever suspicious and worthy of evil delusion that so many little things are so clearly and strongly founded in Scripture; and to this great thing no one to this day can give any clear reason. It is so clear in the Gospel [Marc. 1, 16.] that St. Peter is a fisherman and apostle, which they hold low against your papacy; but no letter that says: St. Peter is above all the churches of the world.

But here I make it a condition that I do not hold this article to mean that I want to reject the pope. He has power as great as he wants, I have no interest in that, I can well grant it to him; but I will not suffer that nor remain silent: First, that they torture, force and desecrate the holy word of God to confirm this power. Secondly, that they reproach, blaspheme, curse the Greeks and all who are not under your pope, as if they were not Christians. Just as if the Christian state were bound to the pope and Rome, when St. Paul and Christ bound it only to faith and God's word. Of this no one knows nor has less than the pope with his own, and yet without faith and God's word wants to be not only a Christian, but God of all Christians, and condemn all those who do not worship him, even if they have faith and the gospel in the very best way.

Even if the pope were reasonable, it would be good for him to have less trouble, and not to have all the world's quarrels. It is impossible for the whole world to be bound to one place and to conduct its business there. But let us see how they torture and disgrace the holy words of God to confirm their false power.

178 Christ says Matth. 16, 18. 19. to St. Peter: "You are Peter (that is, a rock), and on the rock I will build my church, and to you I will give the keys of the kingdom of heaven; what you shall bind on earth shall be loosed in heaven. Allhie they interpret the rock St. Petrum, and pretend it is the Papal authority, on which Christ builds his church, so that all churches are subject to the authority of the pope. And to be subject to the pope means with these masters that the church is built on the rock. Christ had to suffer the gloss over his words for many years.

179) Only, 1) that we expose the lies and mischief publicly and make them ashamed, let us consider the words of Christ. If the building of the church on the rock is nothing else than being subject to the pope, as they say, it follows that the church may be built and exist without faith, without the gospel, and without all sacraments. For what is built is built, nothing more may be built. Since Pabst's authority and obedience are other things than faith, sacrament and gospel, and the church is built by them, it is obvious that Pabst's authority and obedience are enough for its construction, and faith or anything else is not necessary, especially since Pabst and his authority live with his subjects without faith, gospel and sacrament, and even despise them, like the heathen; and yet rock, building and church remain, as they say. Behold, this is Christ's word glossed over. Who will prevent another from saying that the rock and building of the church is called a donkey and a cow, or what he dreams of, if the papists have the power to make whatever they want out of Christ's words?

Further, Christ speaks of the same rock and his church in the same place: "And the gates of hell shall not prevail against it" [Matth. 16,18]. Here Christ speaks clearly that against His rock, building and church the devils shall not be able to do anything. If the rock is papal authority, and the building obedience to it, how is it then that the same building and obedience have fallen, and the gates of hell have been able against them, that all Christendom has fallen away from the pope, as the Greeks, Bohemia, Africa and the whole Orient? Yes, they have never been built on it. So then Christ, who cannot lie, promises that the gates of hell shall not be able to prevail against his building, and yet no one can deny the apostasy in Orient: so it follows that Christ says true, and the pope lies, and the building is not obedience to his power, but another, to which the infernal gates can break nothing off.

Nor may it be said that they are no longer Christians because they are not obedient to the pope and are not built on him. Because the pope and all of them still want to be Christians, even though they are not even one jot obedient to God, and partly live without faith. But they have so far proved with their lies that they are heretics who do not agree with them in this matter, and that they themselves are good Christians, even if they do not agree with God and Christ in any matter. So they ape and fool the world, call Christians and heretics what they want.

But we leave that aside, and take before us the right understanding of these words. The fact that the gates of hell have no power against this structure must mean that the devil has no power over it. This is the case when the structure stands firm in faith and without sin. For where faith falls or there are sins, the devil reigns and has power against the building. So St. Peter teaches us [1 Ep. 5:9] that we should fight in strong faith against the devil, who fights most strongly against faith. From this it follows that this rock is Christ Himself, as St. Paul calls Him 1 Cor. 10:4, and the building is the believing church, since there is no sin in it; and building is nothing else than becoming faithful and sinless, as St. Peter 1 Ep. 2:5 also teaches, that we should let ourselves be built on Christ, the rock, a spiritual building.

Since the pope and his authority, and those who are obedient to him, walk in sin and abominable abuse, and are subjects of the devil, as everyone can see, it must be fictitious and false that the rock and building (which Christ sets over the infernal gates) is called papal authority and rule, which the devil has subjected to him. It would be impossible for papal power to do anything evil if it were signified by the rock in Christ's words. For Christ does not lie. So we see before our eyes that papal power goes into the devil's power, and does evil, and has done evil many times.

Now, all you papists, in a heap, bite the nut! The sentence has expired for you, the castle is conquered; there falls, there lies [the] pope with reason and ground; for this sentence of Christ has been the only reason on which the papacy has relied and exalted itself so many years, and now its lies and falseness have been clarified. If we have not gained more from the pope in this dispute, we have nevertheless made this sentence free and undone; indeed, herewith the war is even won, the pope's head is cut off, because this sentence goes against him more than for him. Whoever tells a lie is certainly not of God and is suspect in all things. Since the pope in this main and basic saying is a liar who has perverted God's word and deceived the world with a false regime, it is certainly true that St. Paul [1 Thess. 2, 9.] says of him that the entrance of the final Christ shall be through the effect of the evil spirit, who only enters with lies and false interpretation of the Scriptures. There you lie, dear Pabst; if you honestly save yourself from this, and make the lies the truth, I will say that you were made Pabst by God. All this was done by John Hus and not Luther, as it is written: Condemnat justus mortuus impios vivos [Wis. 4:16].

It does not help that one wants to attract some holy fathers who called St. Peter the rock and foundation of the church. First of all, Christ's words go before all the saints' words, who have often erred, but Christ has never erred. Secondly, no saint has ever said that the pope is called this rock. So they called St. Peter a rock not for the sake of power but for the sake of faith; in which, if the pope follows him, we also want to call him a rock, so that the rock remains faith and does not become power. But where he is not a believer, he shall not be called a rock.

186 They also have a basic saying, John 21:15-17, where Christ says to Peter three times, "Peter, do you love me?" And Peter answers three times, "Yes, Lord, I love you." Then Christ also said three times, "Feed me my sheep." Hereupon they want to set the pope over all Christians; but it is there is still no clear saying that proves such a great thing, and this is still quite dark, and (as said) it is not to be assumed that God should not have instituted such a great thing, as they do the papacy, with some clear saying. Now this sentence also pushes the papacy to the ground. This is easy to notice.

187 For Christ demands love three times from St. Peter before he commands him the sheep, so that he clearly shows that where there is no love, there sheep grazing does not belong. Because the pope and the papacy are without love, it cannot be that sheep should be called pope. Therefore, it is a lie and a false gloss that they interpret the little word "pasture" to mean the unloving rule and power of the papacy. If one wants to allow Christ's words to be torn apart and misrepresented in this way, I would like to say that the Turk's regiment also means grazing sheep. But if they remain in their right sense, then there must be love, or there is no pasture; who wants to pass by here?

The evil spirit has also taught them that the word "pasture" means to sit on top; where do they want to prove their understanding? Must we believe and be satisfied that they therefore boast and reproach, we have interpreted it thus, keep silent, and do not speak differently? Now I want to go on. The word "pasture" is so highly spiritual that even if the pope were as holy as St. Peter, and taught and kept his spiritual law most diligently, he would still not be a pastor. To "pasture" means to give the teaching that the soul lives by, which is faith and the gospel. If the pope were to do this, he would have to wait for every moment of death and put his soul for the sheep. So St. Augustine interpreted rightly: "To feed" means here to give life for the sheep for the sake of the gospel; therefore also Christ soon after interprets the feeding itself (Joh. 21, 28.), and proclaims to Petro the torture he would have to suffer over the feeding and the sheep; which was not possible to do without love.

189 Therefore it is ever vexatious that the high, spiritual, strong, delicious words of Christ should be so shamefully martyred, and expended on the idle, splendid, lustful violence of the

And when they have already drawn it to the best, they bring it to the Pabst's laws, so that the sheep are poisoned more than they are fed. Therefore we leave Christ's opinion here, as St. Augustine also holds it: it is given in common to all preachers in Petro: that they ever do not preach, but love Christ, and are ready to lay down their lives for the sheep.

190 And where "to pasture" would mean to be a pope, the church would have to be without a pope as often as he neither loved nor preached; this is also true. For where the gospel does not go, there is no church; and this papacy is just as useful to the church as the fifth wheel on the wagon, indeed quite harmful; of this I will say more another time. Even where "to love" and "to pasture" is called pontificality, one could not deny that there must be so many popes, so many lovers and pastors; which is also true. For he who loves and feeds is a pope. So in all ways the words of God go against the pope, which he breeds for himself, and it does not help that they say that the pope does not feed through himself, but through others; why is he not a pope through others? If "pasture" means a pope, then he can be a pope as well as pasture through others. But if he cannot do the latter, he cannot do the latter either, and must pasture through himself, or may not be a pope through himself; the word "pasture" cannot be milked and driven like that.

191 Now I will prove that St. Peter is among the other apostles and not above them. Apost. 8, 14, we read that the apostles and elders sent St. Peter and John to Samaria to strengthen the Christians. If St. Peter is a servant messenger of others, what does his successor, even persecutor, the pope, pretend that he does not want to be a servant to anyone? If St. Peter had been the head by divine order, he should have sat and, as the pope now does, command and send, not let himself be sent; he should have suffered ten deaths before that, before he would have let himself be put down against God's order, as the popes do, who make all the world flood in blood before they let their headship go.

192. the piece is not yet resolved, it also knocks them on the head that they are fibbing, do not know how to answer it, yet not are silent, the Arians are suggesting that the Holy Spirit is therefore not less than the Father, even though he is sent by him. But they do not see that this rhymes here, like the Pabst in the church; the Holy Spirit is not sent in his person, like St. Peter, but he sends himself with God the Father and Son, that is, he reveals himself in the dove [Matth. 3, 16.], cloud [2 Mos. 14, 20.] and believing hearts, as the sapiens says [Weish. 19, 7.] and Augustine interprets. Therefore, all sects of the pope must stand and confess that the pope is not the supreme one, but equal or below the others, where he wants to rule divinely and not devilishly. It is against God and his holy word that he exalts himself with his own sacrilegious power over all, if he should only suffer it when we exalt him.

The Scripture also clearly concludes that St. Peter never made, sent or commanded any apostle, so that he could not make St. Matthew with the help of all the apostles, but acquired him from heaven. So that Christ firmly proves that the apostles should all be made equal by Himself alone, also make all bishops equal, and not be united in the unity of power and authority, as the Pope's sect deceives us, but united in faith, baptism, love and spirit, and be one people, as St. Paul teaches Eph. 4:4 ff. Oh, how they should storm, where they would find that St. Peter had sent an apostle, as we find that he is sent. Still ours shall not apply, and their fable shall nevertheless be right. Hereby, I think, enough is proven how the papacy not only floats without some ground of Scripture, but also rages against Scripture.

The twenty-sixth.

Christ's word to Petro, "What you untie on earth shall be loosed in heaven," extends no further than to those whom Peter has bound.

How gladly would the pope be a god, that he might bind that which God looseth, and loose that which God bindeth, that he might turn back Christ's word, and thus set it: What I bind and loose in heaven, thou shalt loose and bind on earth, so that our God, banished, could do nothing more than what the pope willed.

So it happened in the days of John Hus that the pope commanded the angels in heaven to lead the souls of the Roman pilgrims to heaven, who died on the journey to Rome. Against such terrible sacrilege and more than devilish presumption John Hus lay down, and even though he lost his life over it, he nevertheless gained so much that the pope must confiscate the same pipe and, ashamed of the sacrilege, abstain from it until now. The prankster is still coming out, and because he could not keep heaven and hell in his power, and had risen too high, he still wants to capture purgatory. And even though he must confess that he cannot bind anyone in it, nor push anyone into it, he still wants to release it and pull it out.

195 Because one asks for what reason he might do this, he says: I am a pope. With this it shall be enough. For the saying of Christ clearly expresses that his power is only on earth, not below nor above the earth, and that binding and loosing are equal. For thus the words are, "What thou bindest on earth, that thou looseest on earth"; that binding is as wide and as broad as loosing, and where one does not reach, the other does not reach either. Therefore we stick to the word of Christ and despise the papal sacrilege.

196. Above this, all priests need these words of Christ when they absolve, and absolve not, for in virtue of the same words and promise of Christ. If there are the same words here, what does the pope presume to do by them more than the least priest? If they are the same words, then they are also the same power. If the pope can reach into purgatory with them, any priest can reach into it. Behold, thus the priest deceives and leads the whole world, takes what he wants from the divine word, although it is the same and common to everyone, and pretends to drink from the barrel of malvasia, when other people hardly drink water from it; God's simple one word with one power is considered gold to him, and will not let it be considered copper to others. Stop it, Pabst, enough of this game.

197 It is also a dangerous sense that one needs such keys for chastisement. Christ has not given them, that St. Peter should have power with it, something

But they are given to our faith, which must keep them, so that sins may be forgiven. And St. Peter is a servant in it, may hold it against us; but he can do no more with it than as much as we believe. If he dissolves chastisement and guilt a thousand times, he does nothing, but I believe. Faith makes the keys active and capable, unbelief makes them inactive and incapable; otherwise there is no power in it that the pope presumes to deceive himself and us. God Himself cannot give heaven to the one who does not believe; what then should the Pope do with the keys to the one who does not believe? But to put away chastisement does not really belong to the keys. For this is done publicly, and there is no room for faith, which believes only the obvious thing, namely forgiveness of sin in the sight of God.

198) There 1) were also those who by this saying make the Roman bishop pope, because Christ says: "All that you bind shall be bound. But since all priests absolve in virtue of the same words, they may not be peculiar to St. Peter and Pabst, but must be common, so that either all priests are popes who absolve in virtue of these words, or no one may absolve but the pope, the pontificate shall be given therein. And as little as he may make the priesthood common, so little may he make absolution common, because it is one word and thing, binding and priesthood, as they say. Behold, thus they misrepresent the holy words of God: what is common shall be the pope's own; what is given to our faith shall strengthen his power and tyranny.

The twenty-seventh.

It is certain that the Pope has no power at all, nor the Church, to set articles of faith, nor precepts of morals or good works.

199 I would not rather hear what the articles of faith and the commandments of good morals and good works are, as the pope or the church may set them, so that we may once lead the Holy Spirit and Christ to school and make a good shilling.

1) Original and Jenaer: You.

They have not taught us rightly and sufficiently the Christian faith and good works. Learned disciples of the pope, open the mouth of your wisdom and call us the same! Will you? I will say it like this.

200. Christ proclaimed it Matth. 24, 15. 23.: "When you see the abomination, of which Daniel said that it would stand in the holy city, whoever saw it, understands it well. False Christians and false prophets shall arise, and shall deceive many, and do such signs as to lead astray (if it were possible) even the elect"; and St. Paul 1 Tim. 4, 1-3. "The Spirit evidently says that in the last days they will much depart from the faith, cleave to false spirits, 1) and devilish doctrines, and teach lies, and have a brand in their conscience, forbidding the marital state, and withdrawing the food which God has given to the faithful to enjoy."

See, should not the pope have the power to set doctrine and articles, if it is so clearly proclaimed by him, that also his spirits, 2) which blow it into him, are expressed? St. Paul also teaches how we should hear such teaching, Col. 2:8, saying: "Take heed lest any man deceive you through the vain philosophy and deceitful appearances of the doctrines of men, and of the temporal commandments, which teach not of Christ." Here we see that we should only hear Christ, and flee the commandments of men, which seem to make us devout, but are only deception and disturbance of faith. And Christ also says Matth. 23, 10: "You shall call yourselves no master on earth; there is only One your Master, Christ." St. Jacob [Cap. 3, 1.] also bequeaths, "Ye shall not be called many masters, brethren." Nor is St. Peter silent, 2 Pet. 2:1. "There shall come among you false teachers, teaching according to their own will." And there are many of these sayings without number.

Hence it came about that the other day in Rome, truly masterly, the holy article was decided that the soul of man is immortal. For it was forgotten in the my faith, since we all say, "I believe an eternal life." It has also been decided by Aristotle, the great light of nature, that the soul is an essential form of the body, and much more of its articles, which are most proper for the papal church, so that it may keep the dreams of men and the doctrine of devils, while it tramples on and destroys Christ's teaching and faith.

But they want to see their reason why they take away the power to make articles and law. Yes, they say, not everything is written in the Biblia that is necessary; therefore Christ commanded the church, as St. John, Cap. 20, 30, says: "Christ has done many more signs that are not written in this book," and [Cap. 21, 15]: "If it were all to be written, I fear the world could not comprehend the books" that would have to be written. Here let us feel the high intellect of the Papal sect. John does not say of all the signs of Christ, but of many which he has not written; to this he says, the same many are not written in this book; pointing to his book; so that he does not deny, even confess, that they might be written in the other books. Thus our teachers interpret his words to mean the whole Bible, and now St. John's Gospel must be called the whole Bible.

But this is still the finest, John says: "Christ's signs are not all written", so our masters 3) interpret it to our doings and their law, that they are not all written; what do you think? I mean, the pope's sect can interpret the Scriptures! Dear, let us hear the masters of all Christians from Rome now. Much Christ's sign in John's book is not written, so much is said: There is not enough written in the Bible what we should know and do; let the Holy Spirit tell the pope to give and teach more law. See, now you know why the Holy Spirit is given to the pope and to the Christians.

St. Paul and all Scripture teach that the Holy Spirit is given to fulfill the laws, but not to release us from them and set us free.

1) Original: Geisten.

2) In the original: his spirit.

3) So the Jenaer; original: "deutens unsern Herrn"; Wittenberger: "deuten sie unsern HErrn".

as he says in 2 Cor. 3, 6: "The letter of the law kills, but the spirit makes alive"; and Rom. 8, 2: "The spirit of life has redeemed me from the law, which brought me only sin and death. But the master of all Christians at Rome, with his sects, have another Holy Spirit, who increases the laws, binds people, and takes them captive with the laws of men. Forgive me, my God, for mentioning the name of your Holy Spirit. I do not know what to think and what to say against the unspeakable abomination of the end-Christ at Rome, who not only treats your word foolishly, but also mockingly, as if it were a carnival rant. O God, where are they who earnestly beseech thee, and turn away such thy incomprehensible wrath?

The twenty-eighth.

If the pope held with a large number of the church in this way or otherwise, and did not err, it would still not be sin or heresy to hold otherwise, especially in those things that are not necessary for salvation, until a common council condemned one part and confirmed the other.

Why will they not let me keep this article, since it says nothing but unnecessary things for salvation? They have admitted in Our Lady's conception that it is neither heresy nor error that some think that she was conceived in original sin, although conciliarities, the pope, and the majority hold otherwise, because it is considered unnecessary for salvation. Or how do we poor Christians come to believe everything that the pope and his papists think, even if it is not necessary for salvation? Does the papal authority now have the power that unnecessary things must be necessary articles of faith, and can make heretics in things where there is no need?

207- Therefore I must revoke the article itself, and judge to the fire. I have spoken almost foolishly in it, that one should not believe the pope in unnecessary things. So I should have said: If the pope and his papists were so frivolous and wanton in a concilio that they would lose time and money in unnecessary matters, when there are such great, necessary matters to be acted upon.

one should not only not follow them, but should consider them as nonsensical or evil-doers who make such childishly unnecessary things out of the necessary, serious business of the wretched church. What else do they do with this, but as if they were mocking the miserable, meager Christianity? It is such foolishness and frivolity that they speak of indulgences, of the papacy, of chairs and superiors, alas, in all these last Conciliis, and of nothing else that serves the need.

However, the Bulla is right in giving the papists unnecessary business to act and believe in their conciliis. For such mockers of the church should be cast out by God's wrath in such a perverse sense that they do not take necessary things to heart, and only have to deal with unnecessary ones; they are not worth better.

The twenty-ninth.

We have now acquired a right to restrain the power of the councils, and to contradict their actions, also to judge their law, and to freely confess what seems right to us, be it condemned or confirmed by whatever council it may be.

My papists put this article in such a hateful and poisonous way, as if I wanted to teach that everyone would wantonly oppose the conciliis without cause, which has never fallen into my mind or pen; but I have said: Where they put something against the Scriptures in the concilio, one should believe the Scriptures more than the concilio. The Scriptures are our right and our defiance, so that we may also resist an angel from heaven, as St. Paul commanded in Gal. 1:8, be silent against a pope and a council.

And why do they condemn me in this article? Why do they not condemn those who put it, and I have introduced for my reason, as St. Paul Gal. 1:8: "If any man teach you other things than ye have heard, though he be an angel from heaven, let him be banished and destroyed." Do you hear it, papists? Do you hear, Papists, that Paul says, "If he teaches differently from the Scriptures, he should be banished and maledicted.

Why don't you condemn Panor. c. Significasti, de Elect. which I introduced, as he says that one should believe more a layman, if he presents clear Scripture, or bright reason, than Pabst and Concilio; which with him hold almost all 1) jurists, especially the best and most learned?

211. and what will follow from this article, but that the doctrine of men is above God's word, and the pope above God, and all the abominations that go along with it; that even Lucifer was not so wicked in heaven, who did not presume to be more than like God. O help God! Has it come to this in Christendom, to hear that God with His word shall give way to the pope with his law? Here it would be time to suffer a hundred deaths.

The thirtieth.

Some articles of Johannis Hus, condemned at Costnitz, find the most Christian, truthful and completely evangelical, which would not condemn the whole Christendom.

212) Truly, I have almost erred here and have also previously revoked and condemned this article, in that I have said that some articles of Johannis Hus 2c. So now I say: not some alone, but all articles of Johannis Hus, condemned at Costnitz, are entirely Christian; and I confess that the pope with his own has acted here as a true final Christian, condemned the holy gospel with Johannis Hus, and put in its place the doctrine of the infernal dragon. I offer to answer for this where I am supposed to, and with God's help I will prove and maintain it.

St. John [Hus] also did too little and only began to raise the gospel. I have done five times more, yet I worry that I am also doing too little for him. John Hus does not deny that the pope is supreme in all the world; only that he wants an evil pope not to be a member of holy Christianity, although he must be tolerated like a tyrant. For all members of holy Christendom must be holy, or still become holy. But I, if today St. Peter himself were sitting in Rome, I still deny that the pope would be a member of holy Christendom.

by divine order over all other bishops. The papacy is a human discovery, since God knows nothing about it. All churches are equal, and their unity is not based on this one authority, but, as St. Paul says in Eph. 4, 5, in one faith, one baptism, one Lord Christ, which are all common and equal to all parishes in the world.

I do not say that the Decretal are apocrypha, that is, unnecessary to keep, as John Viglephus says, but unchristian, contrary to Christ, described from the inspiration of the evil spirit; therefore I have also burned them with cheerful courage.

The thirty-first.

A pious person sins in all good works.

(215) This article is annoying to the great saints of works, who build their comfort on their own righteousness and not on God's mercy, that is, on the sand; therefore they will fare as well as the house built on the sand, Matth. 7:26 ff. But a devout Christian man should learn and know that all his good works are inadequate and insufficient in the sight of God, despair with all the dear saints of his works, and consider the mere mercy of God with all confidence and firm trust; therefore let us well establish this article, and see what the dear saints have to say about it.

Isaiah 64:6 says: "We are all found unclean, and all our righteousness is like a stained, stinking cloth. Notice that the prophet does not exclude anyone, saying, "We are all unclean," and yet he was a holy prophet. Item, if our righteousness is unclean and stinks before God, what will unrighteousness do? To this he says: "all righteousness" excludes none. Now if a good work is without sin, then this prophet is lying; God be forewarned! Is this saying of Isaiah not clear enough? Why do they condemn my article, which says nothing else than this prophet? But we would like to be condemned with the holy prophet.

217 Item, Solomon Ecclesiastes 7:21: "There is none so pious on earth as to do a good work and not sin. I think this saying is clear enough, and almost from word to word.

1) Original: all of them.

Word expresses my article. Now, Solomon is damned here; let us see, his father David must also be damned, who says Ps. 143, 2: "Lord, do not enter into judgment with me, your servant, for no living man is found justified before your face." Who is God's servant but he who does good works? How is it then that he may not suffer God's judgment? God's judgment is not unjust. If the work were completely good without sin, it would not escape God's right judgment. So there must be a defect in the work, so that it is not pure. Therefore, no living person is justified before God, but all are subject to His mercy, even in their good works. Here you papists shall prove your art, not only writing bulls, but answering to such sayings.

Thus I have shown above, in the first two articles, how all saints contend against their sinful flesh, and are still sinners as long as they live in the flesh, which contends against the Spirit [Gal. 5:17], therefore they serve God according to the Spirit, and sin according to the flesh [Rom. 7:25]. Therefore, if a godly person is both justified by the Spirit and sinful by the flesh, the work must certainly be like the person, the fruit like the tree. And as much as the Spirit has in the work, so much it is good; but as much as the flesh has in it, so much it is evil. For Christ says [Matt. 7:18.], "A good tree beareth good fruit, and an evil tree beareth evil fruit." Thus God always measures works according to the person, as Gen. 5, 4. f. says: "God regarded Abel and his sacrifice; but Cain and his sacrifice he regarded not." First: Abel and Cain, and then: their sacrifice. So here also, because the person is not completely pure, the work can never be completely pure. If the master is not completely good, the work can also never be completely good. Every work must be similar and equal to its master, as all reason and experience teach.

219 But whether they would say here, as they do: Yes, such impurity is not sin, but an imperfection and infirmity or defect, I answer, Certainly it is an infirmity and defect; but shall it not be sin?

I also want to say that murder and adultery are not sin, but only a defect and infirmity. But who has given you Papists authority to tear apart God's word, and to call such impurity of the good work infirmity, and not sin? Where is one letter of Scripture for you? Must we believe your bad dreams without scripture, and you will not believe our clear scriptures? Is it not known to everyone that before God nothing hinders but sin? as Isaiah says Cap. 59, 2: "Your sins have separated you from your God." If David says [Ps. 145:2] that even God's servants may not suffer His judgment, and no living man is justified before Him, then this infirmity must certainly be sin. And he who leaves no living man justified certainly counts those who walk in good works, unless they are not men nor living.

220 St. Augustine Confesses 9: "Woe to all human life, even if it is the most praiseworthy, if it is judged without mercy. Behold, the great heretic St. Augustine, how he speaks against this holy bull so insolently and sacrilegiously that he not only ascribes sin to the good life, but also condemns the very best life (which is undoubtedly in good works), if they are not helped by mercy, as if they were vain mortal sins. O! St. Augustine, do you not fear the most holy father Pabst? For this St. Gregory of St. Job says: "The holy man Job saw that all our good works are vain sins, if God judges them; therefore he says [Job 9:3]: "If anyone wants to be right with God, he cannot answer him one for a thousand." Who, you Gregori? Should you be allowed to say that all our good works are vain sin? You are under Pabst's ban, and a heretic, much worse than Luther, who only says that there are sins in all good works, and you make vain sin out of it. Oh, I see that you do not want to be exalted by the most holy father Pabst, whom you contradict, and make him a heretic and final Christian in this holy bull.

221. further speaks the same Gregorius Cap. eodem: We have now said it many times that all human righteousness is found unrighteous when it is severely judged; therefore Job says [Cap. 9, 15]: "Even if I had done something righteous, I would not answer God to be right with him, but would plead with him as my judge." Now God's judgment is not wrong nor unjust, but true and just. If injustice is found in our righteousness, the same injustice must not be fictitious but real, and not only a defect or infirmity, but a damnable sin that hinders blessedness, unless mercy occurs and accepts and rewards the same works out of pure grace. If these sayings do not help my article, God will help it. So I would rather be damned with Isaiah, David, Solomon, Paulo, Augustino, Gregorio, than be praised with the pope, all bishops and papists, if the world were like pope, papists and bishops. O blessed who should die over the cause! Amen.

The thirty-second.

A good work done to the best of one's ability is still a daily sin.

222 This article follows clearly from the previous one. For David does not speak thus, "No living man is worthily rewarded before you;" but thus, "No living man is justified before you." Now "not being justified" is no other than being condemned. And Augustine does not say: Woe to some good life, but: Woe to the most excellent life, if it is judged without grace. The "woe" also means nothing but damnation. And St. Gregory does not say: All human righteousness will be imperfect, but: 1) Injustice will be found. Item, does not say: All good works are sinful, but: are sin itself. Therefore I must also revoke this article, and say thus:

A good work well done is a daily sin according to mercy, and a mortal sin according to the severe judgment of God. Behold, how does the Most Holy Father drive me to such whimsical contradictions by this bull, in which he

1) In the original: worthy.

They will not recognize their sin, themselves and God's judgment, and will not sigh for His mercy, but will run against God with the horns of hope set on them and blow themselves into the abyss of hell. Woe to you, final Christian!

The thirty-third.

Burning the heretics is against the will of the Holy Spirit.

I prove this first by experience. For up to now, from the beginning, the church has never burned a heretic, and will never do so again, even though there were many and various heretics in the past. Secondly, from their own words. For if a pope were a heretic or a bishop, they only depose him and do not burn him; as their own law teaches, which they want to have flowed from the Holy Spirit. Thirdly, they have no scripture about it, that they may show the will of the Holy Spirit.

But if they say, John Hus and Jerome of Prague were burned at Costnitz, I answer that I spoke of heretics. John Hus and Jerome, pious Christians, were burned by heretics, apostates and final Christians, the papists, for the sake of the Holy Gospel, as I said above. From which example the pope and his heretics have also burned several other pious Christians in other places; as it is proclaimed of the final Christian that he should push the Christians into the ovens. In this way Alexander Sextus, the pious man, had Hieronymum Savonarola, of the Order of Preachers, burned with his brothers in Florence. Such worship is now practiced by the Holy Church of the Papists, and it would be a pity that they should do something better.

226 Now Isaiah describes Cap. 2, 4. and 11, 6. ff. the Christian church ever without bloodshed, and says: "They shall turn their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks, and shall not kill nor slay in my holy mountain," that is, in Christendom; and Christ Luc. 9, 54-56. when the disciples wanted to command fire from heaven upon the city that would not receive him, he chastised them, saying: "Know ye, that I am your God.

not whose spirit's children ye are? the Son of man is not come to slay men, but to keep them." To these sayings the pope and papists should answer; so they boast of their sacrilege, want to force us to believe that it is enough that their mind and actions are right, even if it is against the Scriptures.

227 In spiritual law, too, it is strictly forbidden for the clergy to bear arms and weapons, and yet no one sheds more Christian blood than the most holy father, the pope. Now he feeds Christ's sheep with oxen, guns and fire, and is worse than the Turk; he confounds kings, princes, lands and cities; yet he is not a heretic, nor a Turk, nor a murderer, nor a tyrant, but Christ's governor, and gives indulgences, sends out embassies and cardinals to wage war against the Turk. And his papists excuse their idol and idolum thus: The pope does not fight, nor does he burn anyone, sits in his holy chair in Rome and prays, perhaps complements, but he gives the secular sword to war and to burn. This is like the Jews did, gave Christ to Pilate and the Gentiles to crucify, but they, like the great saints, also did not want to go into Pilate's house [Matth. 27, 2. Joh. 18, 28.], although St. Stephen Apost. 7, 52, called them murderers of Christ, and died because of it. So that I call the Pope the greatest murderer that the earth has borne from the beginning, who murders body and soul, I am, praise God! in his holiness and his papists' eyes a heretic.

So the last Babylon is the same as the first, and what the mother did too little, the daughter fulfills. The first Babylon also defended her faith only with fire and burned Christ's grandfathers, as Genesis 11:9 indicates. This Babylon of Rome burns Christ's children. For the evil spirit knows well that if the pope were to defend himself with writings, he would not remain for a moment, and would be found to be the right fundamental soup and the final Christian. Therefore, in order to defend himself against the Scriptures, he has taken fire and committed sacrilege, and now one Babylon is as pious as the other, and defies me, why I am so timid and do not come to Rome; just as if Christ had been courageous.

willingly ran to Anna's, Caiphas', Pilate's and Herod's house and killed themselves. I cried that it would be enough if I stood still, did not flee, and waited for them- where I am-until they took me, like Christ, and led me where they wanted to go; so I should run after them, and drive them to kill me: so cleverly do they pretend all things. Why are they not also so bold, and dissolve my writing; or come to me, and dispute me with their high art? Oh, let the blind be blind!

The thirty-fourth.

Fighting against the Turks is no different from striving against God, who punishes our sin through the Turk.

229 Oh, how shamefully the pope has led us astray for a long time with the Turkish dispute, deprived us of money, and destroyed so many Christians and caused misfortune. When will we recognize the devil's monkey game in the pope? How did his King Ladislaus of Hungary and Poland, with so many thousands of Christians, be hounded by the pope to the Turk and so miserably slain at Varna that he followed the pope and broke the oath he had made with the Turk before, out of his command. For to teach of oath-breaking, that the pope has power to break oath, is not heresy! How should the heretic become, who can do all the things he wants? Item: What misery has been caused in Hungary by the same Turkish war, started with Roman indulgences? We still have to remain blind to the pope.

Now, I have not written this article in such a way that we should not fight against the Turk, as the holy heretic, the pope, interprets to me here, but we should first mend our ways and make a merciful God, not plumply rely on the pope's indulgence, as he has seduced the Christians until now and still seduces them. For what it means to fight under an ungracious God, even against deserving enemies, is shown to us by the histories of the Old Testament, especially Joshua 7:4 and Nu. 20, 21. 25. and many more. The pope does no more with his cross, granting indulgences and promising heaven, than that he turns Christians' lives into death, their souls into the Hell leads with great heaps, as befits the right final Christian. God does not ask for crosses, indulgences; he wants to have a good life. The pope comes forward with his own, more than anyone else, and still wants to eat the Turk. That is why we are so happy to fight against the Turk, because where he had one mile before, he now has a hundred miles of land. We do not yet see, but the Roman leader of the blind has caught us.

The thirty-fifth.

No one is certain that he will not always sin mortally, 1) for the sake of the most sinful vice of hope.

231. this article is clear enough from the one and thirty-second; for thus David saith [Ps. 143, 2.], "Lord, enter not into judgment with thy servant; there is no man unjustified before thee." And Gregory in fine Moral: How can we always be blessed, if our evil works are all evil, and our good works are never all good? Item, Job 9, 21: "Though I were pious, yet my soul knows nothing of it." Item [Job 9:28, Vulg.], "I have feared in all my works, for I know thou spareest no sinner." On this St. Gregory speaks, as if the holy man should say, "What I have done publicly I see well, but what I have suffered secretly I do not know, that is, the secret hope no one can sufficiently recognize; as the same teacher says many times, by which all works defiled may not suffer God's right judgment, as also David says, Ps. 19, 13. "O Lord, make me clean from my secret sins, who can recognize them all?"

For this reason, I must revoke the article and now say: Let no one doubt that all our good works are mortal sin, if they are judged according to God's judgment and seriousness, and are not accepted as good by grace alone; so that the saying of St. Paul may stand [Rom. 11, 32. Gal. 3, 22.] Rom. 3, 19.: "The Scripture concludes us all under sin, so that all the world may become guilty before God", and recognize that no one may be justified by good works, but that God has mercy on all and justifies by grace alone. This is the right Christian doctrine, by which a person learns to fear and trust God, so that he can love and praise God, so that he despairs of Himself, and by God's grace measure all that is good. Such love, praise and fear of God and faith the Pope intends to destroy with his papists, as he has done and does daily in all the world, as Micah 2:9 says: "You have taken my praise from them forever.

The thirty-sixth.

Free will, after the fall of Ada, or after the sin committed, is a vain name; and if it does its part, it sins mortally.

This article should be clear enough from the previous ones, because St. Paul says Rom. 14:23: "Everything that is not of faith is sin. Where then is freedom, if it can no more but sin of itself? Item, St. Augustin de spir. ei lit. o. 4.: The free will, without God's grace, is good for nothing but to sin. What do you say here, Pope? Is the free will good for nothing but evil? So you would also say that a man with a limp is straight, although he can do nothing but limp and never walk straight. This is just as if I were to say, "The pope is the most holy," when St. Paul [2 Thess. 2:3] calls him hominem peccati et filium perditionis; and Christ [Matt. 24:15] abominationem, the head of all sin and corruption. The papists have even perverted all the words, have brought up a new language, have mixed everything together, like the builders of Babylon [Gen. 11:7-9], the white must be called black, black must be called white, with unspeakable damage to Christianity.

234 St. Paul 2 Tim. 2, 25. f. says: "Instruct those who resist the truth, perhaps God will once give them repentance, that they may know the truth, and come back from the snares of the devil, by whom they are captives according to his will. Where is here the free will that is the devil's prisoner? not, that he does nothing, but that he does everything according to the will of the devil. Is this freedom, to be imprisoned according to the will of the devil, that there is no help, but God grant them repentance and correction? As he also says Joh. 8, 33, when the Jews said they were free, Christ said, v. 34.36: "He who commits sin is the servant of sin", or peculiar to sin. "If therefore the Son redeem you, ye shall be justly set free." Thus St. Augustine turns the little word "free will," contr. Jul. lib. 2, and calls it servum arbitrium, a captive will.

1) In the original: fund.

2) "von" set by us instead of "on" in the Wittenberg and in the Jena. Erlanger: "ahn".

Item, Moses, Gen.6,5. and 8,21.: "All that the heart of man thinks about and considers and desires is no more than evil at all hours. Hear this, dear papists, Moses opens his mouth against you; what will you say to this? If there is a good thought or will in man at one hour, then we must reprove Moses, who evil chides all thoughts, all desires of the human heart at all hours. What kind of freedom is that, which is not more inclined to evil? And that we put an end to it:

It has been said more than once above: How pious, holy men, who live in God's strong grace, fight against their flesh with great difficulty and effort, and the flesh fights against grace with all its nature; is it not a great, blind error, then, that one may teach that the natural free will may turn to the spirit, seek and desire grace apart from grace, if it so nearly flies, even rage against it when it is present? What reason is not horrified by the fact that the spirit and the flesh are the two greatest enemies, and yet the flesh should desire and seek its enemy, the spirit, when everyone feels in himself how all powers are fighting against grace to drive it out and destroy it? That would be just as if someone said, "No one can tame a wild, raging animal with bands; but when it is loose, it tames itself and willingly goes into the bands.

Therefore, such doctrines are designed only for the disgrace and abortion of divine graces, and for the strengthening of sins and the increase of the devil's kingdom. The scripture calls man to be all flesh, Gen. 6, 5. Thus flesh is most contrary to the spirit, Gal. 5, 17.

Nor do they temper it among themselves that the free will, which is vain flesh, should seek the spirit.

238. and indeed the recklessness and blindness of the Pope and his followers would be tolerable in other matters; but in this main matter it is to be pitied that they are so senseless, for thereby they completely destroy all that we have from God through Christ, that St. Peter rightly proclaimed 2 Peter 2:1: "There will be false teachers among you, who will deny their Lord who bought them. Who is the Lord but Christ, who bought us with his own precious blood? [Who denies him more than those who give too little to his grace and too much to free will? For since they will not let that be sin and evil which is truly evil and sin, neither will they let that be grace which is grace, from which sin should be cast out. As he that will not be sick, let not the medicine be a medicine unto him.

And even if they were right, it would still be safer for them to let all the good of grace alone, and all our things be sin. It is without danger if I also confess a good work to God as sin, and seek his grace for it, which I cannot seek too much; but it is cruel driving if I confess a thought as good, which 1) would not be good. Because they seek the perilous ways, follow them and fight so hard, and leave the safe one, even persecute him, it is good to note that their doctrine is not godly, but quite suspicious.

For this reason I wish the word "free will" had never been invented, nor does it appear in Scripture, and would be called cheap self-will, which is of no use. Or, if one ever wants to keep it, one should interpret it to the newly created man, so that by it the man is understood who is without sin. He is certainly free, as Adam was in paradise, of whom also the Scripture speaks, where it touches our freedom. But those who are in sins are not free and are captives of the devil. But because they may yet become free by grace, you may call them volunteers, as

1) Thus Walch. In the other editions: "a thought . . the".
2) Original: into the.

you call a rich man who is a beggar and yet can become rich. But it is not right nor good to dice with words in such serious, great matters, for a simple-minded man is easily deceived by them, and such teachers are called sophists. Of which Sir. 34:12, 13: "I have heard many things from some words, and the usage of words is strange and wild, whereby I have come into deadly peril of my soul; but the grace of God hath delivered me." Therefore, one should avoid the sophists and, as the Scriptures do, speak plainly, clearly and loudly, especially about high, divine things. This error of free will is a peculiar article of the end-Christ; therefore it is no wonder that it has been driven so far into all the world, for the end-Christ is to deceive the whole world, as is written of him, and very few Christians are to be kept from him. Vae illi! [2 Thess. 2, 10. Revelation 12, 9.]

The thirty-seventh.

That there is a purgatory cannot be proved from the Scriptures, which are proven and credible.

I have never denied the existence of Purgatory, and I still hold it, as I have written many times, although I cannot prove it irrefutably in any way, either from Scripture or reason. I do find in the Scriptures that Christ, Abraham, Jacob, Moses, Job, David, Ezekiel, and some more, tried hell in their lives, which I consider to be purgatory; and it is not incredible that some dead people suffer the same. Taulerus also says much about it. And recently, I have decided that it is a purgatory, but I cannot decide any other.

242 I have only contested the fact that they lead so uneven sayings of the Scriptures to it, that [it] is immediately shameful to hear. Namely, Psalm 66:12: "We have passed through fire and water," as the whole psalm sings of the sufferings of the saints, whom no one can put into purgatory. Item, St. Paul 1 Cor. 3, 13-15. speaks of the fire on the last day: it will test the good works, and through it some will be saved, even if their works are damaged, because they keep the faith. From this fire make they also have a purgatory, as they are accustomed to tear up the Scriptures and make of them what they will.

243 Thus also the saying is drawn with the hair, where Christ says Matth. 12, 32: "Whoever speaks a word of shame in the Holy Spirit, it will not be forgiven him, neither in this world nor in the next. So that Christ wills, it shall never be forgiven him, as also Marc. 3, 29. declares the same opinion, saying, "He that sinneth in the Holy Ghost with words of shame hath no forgiveness for ever," but is guilty of an eternal sin. Although St. Gregory also interprets the word Matth. 12 as meaning that some sins will be forgiven in that world, St. Marcus does not allow such an interpretation and is more valid than all teachers.

I have said all this so that we may know that no one is guilty of believing more than is founded in Scripture, and that those who do not believe in Purgatory are not to be called heretics, if they otherwise hold the Scriptures in their entirety, as the Greek Church does. For that I believe that St. Peter and St. James are holy, the Gospel compels me; but that St. Peter is buried in Rome, and St. James in Compostel, and lies there, there is no need to believe, because the Scriptures do not report this. Item, that I consider none of the saints to be holy, whom the pope raises, is without sin, and the saints are not angry about it; since there are many saints in heaven, whom we do not know whether they are anything, keep silent about them, and are not angry about it, nor do they consider us heretics because of it. The pope with his sect plays such a game, that he only teaches many wild articles of the faith, while the right articles of the Scriptures are silenced and suppressed.

245 But that they refer to the book 2 Macc. 12, 43, how Judas Maccabaeus sent money to Jerusalem to pray for the slain in the conflict, does not conclude. For the same book is not among the books of sacred Scripture; and as Saint Jerome says, it is not found in the Hebrew tongue, in which all the books of the Old Testament are found. Also, the same book has little faith otherwise. For it is contrary to the first book of Maccabaeorum, in which King Antiochus description [1 Macc. 6, 4-16. 2 Macc. 1, 2. ff., Cap. 9] and has many more fables that take away his faith. And even if it is already valid, it would still be necessary, in such a large article, that even at least a saying from one of the main books would come to his aid, so that all speech would be in the mouth of two or three witnesses [2 Cor. 13:1. Matth. 18:16]. It is suspicious that on this article alone in the whole Bible not more than one sentence should be found, moreover in the least, most despised book, if it is so great and so much attached to it, that the papacy and the whole priesthood are almost built on it, and all have their goods and honor from it, and without doubt that more parts would die of hunger, where purgatory would not be. One should not give our faith such a loose and weak foundation!

The thirty-eighth.

The souls in purgatory are not sure of their blessedness, to speak of all. Nor is it proven by Scripture or reason that they no longer deserve nor increase the love of God.

The thirty-ninth.

The souls in purgatory sin without ceasing, seeking rest and fleeing torment.

The fortieth.

The souls taken out of purgatory, through the intercession of the living, have less reward than if they had done enough themselves.

246 I have only disputed these three articles on school law, often stating that it is my discretion, but I know of no reason to indicate anything certain about it. And what I think of it may be read in my Resolutionibus. But that the papists and bullists condemn me therein, and set no other cause than their own wanton conceit, puffed up without Scripture and reason, and in addition do not answer my Scripture and reason, I do not allow myself to dispute; I despise their mere condemnation as highly as they despise my reason and cause. The pope with his bullists know less of these things than the rude block that lies there.

247. so my advice is that no one let him put the pope new articles, but

I will gladly remain ignorant with St. Augustine about what the souls in purgatory are doing and what is happening to them. It is enough that you know how they are in great, unbearable torment and desire your help.

But if you ever want to argue about it, let it remain a delusion and good opinion, as I do. Do not make articles of faith out of your thoughts, as the abomination of Rome does, lest perhaps your faith become a dream. Stick to the Scriptures and God's word; there is truth, there you will be sure; there is faith and belief, whole, pure, sufficient, and lasting.

The last [article].

The ecclesiastical prelates and secular princes would not do badly to wipe out all the beggar sacks.

In this article Johann Eck has been the holy spirit of the pope, yes, in the whole bull, who probably lies as reluctantly as he seldom babbles, so that this holy spirit may be like the teacher, and one knave like the other. I did not say about prelates and princes, but when I wanted it not to be a mendicant order. I still say that, and with me many pious people, amen.

450 Protective letter of Christ our Lord for M. Luther to the city of Rome.

From Kapp's Nachlese, Vol. II, p. 481, where it is printed from Spalatin's autograph. This writing is also directed against Leo X's bull.

Translated from the Latin by Joh. Frick.

1. you call me to stand up and judge my cause, just as if I were completely satisfied with your cause. You deceive yourself if you think I am the same as you. I will punish you and put it before your eyes [Ps. 50:21]. This, I say, I will put under your eyes, what I myself and the one who was sent by me have done.

I have chosen Paul to teach you, namely humility, gentleness, temperance and peace, but not arrogance, tyranny, indulgence and war. List just one of the virtues that Paul commanded. Can you say that you are free from one vice, from which Peter and Paul have an abhorrence? Thou sayest, my Martin reproach upon thee with an empty and unfounded cry. But if the cry of the tyranny of Count Jerome 1) had been unfounded, the nine peasants whom he had hanged for the sake of a single hunting dog would have lived longer, and Florence would have remained free from treachery. If it had been an empty talk of the brother Peter, the Cardinal Sixti, and of his splendor and expense, the verses would not have been sung of him at Rome:

*Sancta supervacuum dederat mi Roma galerum.
Haec Petrum nivei marmoris urna tenet. Plorat Sylvetus; plorat Tyresia et agnus.*

Hic leno; haec meretrix; ille cinaedus erit.

What is said about the virtues or vices of Caesar is also true. The whole world has heard about his life, as well as that of his father, Alexander VI, which was led against my teachings and regulations, and strangers from all nations and kingdoms have noticed his company with women in the jubilee year, which is not at all suitable for my vicarium. Greater and more frightening things have been told by Johann Franciscus Sutrius, who administers the oratory in you. There are people who speak publicly of Julius' lechery and lust, and say that young boys danced around with completely naked girls before his holiness. You refer to the sayings of my prophets. I have other prophets, one of whom proclaimed [Isa. 5:8, 11, 12], "Woe to them that set house against house, and bring one field to another, until there be no more room, that they alone may possess the land. Woe to those who rise up early in the morning to drink, and sit up till night, so that the wine heats them up. And have harps, psalteries, kettledrums, pipes, and wine, in their good life, and look not to the work of the Lord." Another of my prophets broke out into the words [Bar. 3, 16. 17.]: "Where are the princes of the Gentiles, who play with the birds of the air, who gather silver and gold, on which the

Do you put your trust in people, and can never be satisfied with them? You could also have gone into yourself long ago, after other teachings and punitive sermons of some of my good friends, who recently pulled through your vices.

3 You could have read the 85th Sermon; the Franciscum Petrarcham, Joannem Campanum, Bernhardum Ludolfum, Joannem Picum, Philelphum, Volaterranum, Paccensis speech on the death Innocentii VIII, Baptistam Mantuanum in Sylvis, Fastis, de calamitatibus, in prima Parthenice, in eclogis; the Platina at the very most Oertern, You never took care of the taken away city Constantinople, and were unconcerned that you would bring it back to me. And although you have always reported the Crusades in the Indulgence Bulls many years after each other, and have made the resolution to drive out the enemies of truth from the alms of the poor and simple, to what end has the money that you sent with you been distributed? Where is the treasure left behind by Paul II and Julius II? Where is the astonishing sum of money, which you are in the habit of spending every hour in all human affairs (you do not fail anything, where only money is seen)? But you will have to give an account of your business one day. You cannot deceive me. You will not escape my judgment, even if you win because of the simplicity of my sons, as an ambitious city.

451 Letter from an unnamed man to Spalatin concerning the Apologia Christi pro Luthero; also some collectanea from Rome and the Roman popes 2c. which should be presented to Aleander.

From Kapp's Nachlese, Vol. II, p. 496.

Translated into German by Joh. Frick.

To Duke of Saxony, Friedrich, court preacher, Georgium Spalatinum, or in his absence to Herr Ulrich Hutten.

I have long since sent Christ's letter of protection for Luther against the Eckische Bulle, and I would like to know if you have received it. Be well and commend me to Frederick, your prince. I am Yours, as well as his.

1) It is this Jerome Aleander (Walch). -

Hochstraten's pupil, Brother P. H., of the Predicant Order, to Brother Petrum, N. Order.

I am frightened when I think of what I have seen, heard, and know for certain here, namely, of the villainies, wickedness, deceit, cunning, ungodliness, abominations, heresies, blasphemies, and where I did not firmly believe in divine providence, I would almost think that along with divine laws, human laws would also be completely banished from the city.

This has been written in truth from Rome itself. God is witness. Bertold, Archbishop of Mainz, convened a Provincial Synod for the glory of God; soon, however, when he was betrayed by the courtiers, he received from the Pope an atrocious decree, how he would dare to establish a Provincial Synod without the prior knowledge of the Pope.

Pabst Eußenius incited the Dauphin in France, Louis, against the assembly in Basel, so that he also devastated almost all of Alsace. Read about it at Platina.

It is common for the adultery of a wife to become known throughout the neighborhood or city before the husband can believe it. In the same way, the vices of the city of Rome have become known throughout the world before she herself is convinced of her own abominable stains. So great is her blindness; so evidently has the divine grace, which she is not at all disposed to recover, departed from her. The mendicant monks usually go through everything in sermons, but they remain silent about it. For, if Rome were to fall, their freedoms and powers, the mendicancy forbidden to the priests in the past, would also be lost.

From Spalatin's Autographo.

The following pieces are to be advanced to the Aleander:

I. When the Duke of Pomerania returned from the city [Rome] and was asked what he thought of it, he answered that the city was indeed large, but completely full of arrogant preachers.

II. Theodoretus Arides, later bishop, ... said: soon after his arrival, a Jewish arrival registered for baptism; and when asked about the reason, answered: because your God can see through the fingers of great sins. I heard this myself from Theodoreti's mouth.

III. to Ascanius, duke's ... Brother, who

When Ascanius confessed to everything, if he could prepare a love potion, a clever Jew promised 1) to procure it, if he would get the blood of two Christian children. Ascanius then bought two boys from a beggar woman, had them killed, and gave them to the Jew to burn to powder. This was said by George, Ge. Ascanii's trusted friend, with whom he had been acquainted at the time when eating meat was forbidden; and when he heard that he had been given a red hat, he burst into the words: For the sake of God and man's faithfulness, is this a cardinal? That's what George told me.

IV. Caesar, a son of Alexander VI, as he was collecting money for the army, said to his face: You poltro, *) give so and so much 1000, if you do not want to be stabbed by me with the dagger. From the mouth of Eliä von Westhofen.

*) What this word is supposed to mean, has not been guessed, therefore one must leave it only Latin. In the 6th History, where this word also occurs, it seems to go to the Cardinals. (Walch. It will be Frick's comment.)

V. The archbishop in Hungary wrote to a certain widow that she should not send her sons to Rome. One of them had already left for Rome, and he wanted to send the other brothers there as well. When the archbishop found out about this son, he wrote: he asks for the wounds of Christ, that she should not let him or the other sons go there, but send them to him in Hungary, where he would take care of them honestly. I have translated the archbishop's letter for the widow.

VI A Latin Saracen, who had been in Rome for a long time, decided to leave that place. And when he was asked why he did not want to be baptized first, he answered: "I do not like your religion, because out of 24 poltronibus, or cardinals, you choose one whom you worship as a god. From the mouth of Thomä Volphii.

VII Alexander VI, now elected Pope, when Julianus, Cardinal de vincula Petri, took his hand to kiss it, 'as other Cardinals have done, he put his thumb between his index and middle finger, pointing to the borders of Italy. From the mouth of Jacobi Brunn.

George Spalatino.

Ulrich Hutten did it.

1) The old edition offers: "Ascanius, Duke's... brother, promised a clever Jew, who confessed to everything, if he could prepare a love potion" 2c. Because this makes no sense at all, and we lack a model, we have changed it to make some sense.

C. Of the publication of the papal dulle by Eck and the great difficulties that occurred in the process.

1. what difficulties Eck has found.

a. At the publication in Leipzig.

Excerpt from a letter from Carl von Miltitz to the Elector, dated October 3, 1520, in which he gives news of Eck's arrival in Leipzig, of his grandiloquent threats, and how badly he had been received by the students.

This letter is found in Cyprian's useful documents on the history of the Reformation, vol. I, p. 438 ff; our excerpt in Seckendorf, 8i8t. I)utü., lib. I, p. 116, 8 75 translated into Latin. He drank 1) flux and recklessly, started talking about his orders, how he wanted to learn Doctor Martinum. With very pointed words he said that he had had the Papal Bull published and posted in Meissen on the 21st day of September, in Merseburg on the 25th, in Brandenburg on the 29th, and gave me a copy of the same Bull, which I am sending to Your Electoral Grace. To the Rector magnificus and the other Regents of the University of Wittenberg, his ever-honoring masters.

Hail in the Lord Jesus! I am sending you, Rector magnificus and most worthy fathers, by order of our most holy Lord, the Pope, a copy of the bull, printed in Rome, with a seal and a public notary's signature, the contents of which your dignities will diligently investigate. As far as I am concerned, however, and the order which is imposed on me against my will, I ask you for God's sake to obey and execute this bull, so that the articles which are condemned and rejected therein may not be publicly taught or spoken by anyone who is subject to your university 2c. Otherwise, according to the bull, our most holy Lord would be urged to proceed with the deprivation of all liberties granted by the apostolic see, with incapacity to hold a university 2c., which you should prevent for the sake of the true Christian religion and your honor. But that by papal command I have placed Carlstadt and Dolschius 1) next to Martinus, you shall hear that it was not done by me without noticeable cause. But if they recognize the church as a mother and are willing to renounce all heresy, I will gladly and kindly accept them, and absolve them by special power given to me by the pope, and deliver them from the penalties into which they have fallen. But if they harden themselves, which is far, they shall be punished with deserved penance, and you shall not keep them in your university after the end of the term, with penance, expressed in the bull. As for me, I would rather do something favorable to your university than do something unfriendly. I commend myself to your excellence. Given at Leipzig, on the third day of October, in the year of grace 1520.

Your Magnificence and worthy Lords willing Corner, Apostolic Nuncio and Orator.

457: The Elector Frederick of Saxony's response to the report of the bull sent by Peter Burckhard, then Rector of the University of Wittenberg. Dated at Homberg in Hesse, November 18, 1520.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 100; in the Jena edition (1564), vol. I, p. 353; in the Altenburg edition, vol. I, p. 539; and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVII, p. 378.

By the Grace of God Frederick, Duke of Saxony and Elector 2c.

Our greeting before. Esteemed, dear, faithful one! We have received your letter, which was recently delivered to us at Cologne, with notification of what letters have come to you from D. Ecken in the matter of Doctoris Martini Luther 2c., and have heard all the contents. We do not want to reassure you that nothing has reached us about this before; but recently, before we departed for Cologne, the message of papal holiness, namely Marinus Caracciolus and Jerome, called Aleander, acted with us on account of papal holiness on a letter concerning the Doctoris Martini mentioned; and you will hear from the enclosed copy how this action has been carried out everywhere. Whether anything further will reach us because of this, that shall remain undisclosed to you.

We would be well inclined to inform you of our intentions in this matter; however, something has happened to us in the meantime that prevents this. We have also asked the messenger whether you would further report the matter. We do not want to leave this unopened in your gracious opinion. Date at Homberg in Hesse, on the 18th day of November, Anno 1520.

To the highly learned, our faithful, Peter Burckhard, Doctor and Rector of our University of Wittenberg.

458 Veit von Warbeck's letter of reply to the Elector Prince John Frederick of Saxony, in which he expresses his joy that this excellent prince is learning to recognize the good cause, and also asks him not to refuse Luther and not to let him move away from Wittenberg, but to protect him constantly and to write to him. October 22, 1520.

Sublime Highborn Prince, my entire submissive and obedient dinst are E. F. G. before beraidt.

Dear Sir, E. F. G.'s letter, dated Sunday after Dionysius, received by me on Sunday Ursula, I have read in all confidentiality, from which I understand E. F. G.'s effort in Doctor Martinus' matter. Oh, God be praised and honored, that E. F. G. will take such a challenge, as if unborn, against Doctor Martinus, heartily and comfortably. I have this hope in God, that he will not abandon his own, as at times we have been threatened, we poor people have been abandoned, but this is only from God, to call upon him for divine mercy.

Noble Prince and Lord. As I suspected that E. F. G. would receive the bulls from the corner, I did not hear (such), and I am not a bit relieved that he would have been so bold as to answer such to E. F. G. (But there is nothing too bad). (But Im nothing to vill.) Dan he will have it for it, E. F. G. sey cruelly denounced by the Bapst D. M. zu meyden. Regardless of this, E. F. G. thinks of the damage that the above-mentioned Doctor Martinus of Wittenberg has done to the laudable university there. Hereby E. F. G. is obliged to defend the same, also, as a German prince, all privileged persons of the same, since all your consolation stands on E. F. G., so that the same is not only a privileged person, but also a privileged person of the same, since all your consolation stands on E. F. G., so that the same is a privileged person of the same. F. G., if the same were to be withdrawn, it might not be good.

E. F. G. should also write D.M. himself, it will not make E. F. G. a small praise, the lon will E. F. G. on zweyfell von GOtt empfaehen.

Noble Prince and Sir. The copy sent to me by E. F. G. in charge of my most noble Lord, I have read with great pleasure. In which E. F. G. has heartily and confidently advised me to protect the innocent as well. My most noble lord has also not received a little joy from it, think also his Churf^G. will not pass E. F. G. on antwort.

E. F. G. I am aware that my most noble lord has become a little weak here, and has caused his elector to remain here, and has ordered his elector to be crowned, and the entry is to take place today, and the coronation tomorrow. As Your Majesty has diligently urged My Lord to be pleased to have his Curf. It has not been possible, and all the other princes have moved to Ach, and as long as they say, the coronation shall take place here, but the people of Ach have thus made a great deal of trouble with the finances, namely XM. fl. as they say, so that it will not happen there, but rather that it will take place tomorrow.

with them. There might also be something about it, that the Colognians would not have liked to see it happen in Cologne, since he has not yet ridden in, they do not want to let him in with the power, but if he rides in like a bishop, they must let it go.

However, it is said that after the crowning, His Royal Majesty will come here with 2c. along with other surges.

The Holy Roman Emperor has also sent his own post to my most noble lord and has requested that, if His Majesty's Supreme Leader requires a physician, His Royal Highness shall not be shy about it, but shall be willing to send the same to His Royal Highness.

However, His Royal Highness has again replied that His Royal Highness should keep them for himself, as the readers are thus. I would also have liked to send E. F. G. the German bull, but Magister Spalatinus cannot bring the printers to Cologne. Doctor M. will not forget us, but the scholars do not like to see it translated into German, because they fear that the common man will understand how to deal with the matter, but if it is printed, I will send it to E. F. G. in the most expedient way. Herewith, I am grateful to you as a poor chaplain. Date Cologne Monday after Ursula [Oct. 22], anno 1520.

E.C. F. G.

Eck's letter from Coburg, where he fled from Freiberg, to Duke Johann of Saxony, with a copy of the bull, and notification that he has publicized it in Meissen, Merseburg and Brandenburg, and that such bishops have promised to obey it; at the same time, he encloses a copy of the papal breve to Chursachsen found above, No. 439, and asks to wait in Bamberg for a while for an answer. Dated Sublime, highborn prince! Your Princely Grace finds my subservient willing services ready with diligence beforehand, together with my n a poor prayer to God. Gracious Prince and Lord, Papal Holiness, after great diligence, has, through the most learned men in Rome, held up Doctor Martinus Luther's teachings and doctrines, in the College of Cardinals, and since it has thus been found that some articles have long since been condemned in the Holy Councils, are much erroneous, seductive and vexatious, for which reason His Holiness has issued a Bull, as I am sending the credible copy to E. F. G., and have also had the same published by me in Meissen, Merseburg and Brandenburg. F. G., also had the same, and also managed to publicize it through me in Meissen, Merseburg and Brandenburg, as was done through me, also the bishops, as is well due to their reverend and graces, out of required obedience, offered to comply with the bull and papal mandate, and to do so. However, if Luther and his followers abstain under the most noble, highborn Elector, and E. F. G. to the good of the Christian Church, they will be punished. F. G. for the good of the Christian faith and unity, also that the pious Christians are not seduced by false learning, Papal Holiness has especially sent E. F. G.'s brother, the Most Serene Elector, also E. F. G. an admonition to this effect, requesting your help for this as Christian princes, as E. F. G. will further hear from the letter enclosed here. And although I myself would have liked to hand this over personally to E. F. G., the same rode ahead when I came to Coburg, and I also, for lack of horses, left those with the servants on the way, thus without servants and proper clothing, I did not want to go before E. F. G., whom I was quite willing to serve with the greatest diligence. However, if E. F. G. desires further instruction on the matter, I will remain in Bamberg with the suffragan bishop. If something comes to me in writing, I will decide according to my possible diligence. Hereupon I ask with all humility that E. F. G. will not accept my letter, and all this I have done, in disgrace, if I do this alone for the good of the faith, with much effort, work and expense. For to be in E. F. G.'s service, I wanted to be unsaved, hereby commanding E. F. G.. Date the 6th of October, Anno 1520.

My most willing, strictest, most favorable lords and freemen, I wish to order that Duke Albrecht of Meckelburg be accepted and granted alongside the Margrave. The bishop of Brandenburg has been asked by the governor how he would like the bishop of Brandenburg, if he were to come to Wittenberg with the Margrave, to have the bull, such as Doctor Martinus, announced and proclaimed, whereupon I have left with the burgomaster, first of all, after the Margrave and other princes with a large number have come to Wittenberg, that he, to avert all kinds of danger, should appoint some of the burghers to the council, Secondly, that he should not fail to order the places where it is most improper to charge the bullets with soldiers, and that, if anyone should refuse to charge the bullets, he should let them be told in good faith to continue charging the bullets until they have told their lords. In addition, the bishop of Brandenburg should be addressed by the presidents here, and asked on their behalf to stand still with the execution, and in the absence of their lord, who is at this time before Rome. In lands, which may not be let down with equity, his Lordship, as a praiseworthy Christian surfer, will know how to keep all equity. And if such an argument would not convince the bishop of Brandenburg to relinquish his appointment, unless the appointed authorities, for their own sake, consider such a matter differently, and if I, before the time of your consideration, also have the right to it, and want to follow it, then the execution shall not be given to him, and we shall also be obliged to do the work; as much as possible shall be done, and with the proviso that such removal shall be taken for no other cause than to prevent further loss and damage, and as the word shall give. Therefore, my dear sir, if this will be done, as mentioned, if it is possible and seen, let me know your meaning. There is no one here with whom I could obtain sound advice. From Cyprian's "Useful Documents," vol. II, p. 178.

Translated into German.

To the venerable father, the most reverend Lord Bishop of Naumburg Official, his ever-honoring Lord.

Hail! During the past winter, our most holy Lord had highly learned men in Rome examine Luther's teachings in many disputations, conversations and writings. Since they were in

2) This is Doctor Henning Göde. Compare No. 65 in the appendix of this volume.

3) This will be Luther's writing "An den Bock zu Leipzig". This results in a somewhat earlier going out of the same than was assumed in the 18th volume of the St. Louis edition (end of January).

1) In his introduction Cyprian calls him: Stehelin.

In this way, His Holiness summoned the College of Cardinals, and after a diligent and sharp investigation of the matter, finally, as the governor of Christ and the head of the entire Christian world, 1) issued a pronouncement so that the faithful might recognize what is in accordance with the truth and what is in conflict with it. Therefore, although against my will, he has ordered me to publish this bull in certain countries, as is contained more extensively in the order issued by his Holiness concerning this matter. Accordingly, by virtue of the authority given to me by the Apostolic See, of which I hereby avail myself and obey the orders of said See, I send you, venerable father, the most reverend Lord Bishop of Naumburg Official, whose place you now represent in spiritual matters in his absence, a copy of this Bull printed in Rome and provided with the seal of a prelate and the signature of a notary, and command you in the name of our most holy Lord, and remind you of your duty, that you publish the said bull, and also earnestly command all elders, prelates, archdeacons, lay priests and religious in the Naumburg diocese, that they likewise publish it, and with all seriousness take care that the erroneous Lutheran writings are destroyed by fire; whereby you will have to proceed against the unruly and disobedient, according to the contents of the bull, or report them to the apostolic see. Hereby you will undoubtedly render the obedience due to God and a useful service to the Holy Church. And although I have no doubt that you will all obey this apostolic decree, since you are bound, even without the pope's command, to eradicate error for the sake of your souls' salvation, the pope, if you do not obey his command, must, according to his justice, deal harshly with you and your most reverend lord bishop and cast his complete disfavor upon you. From this you will guard yourselves in a holy way and put into action what you have been commanded to do, which will bring honor to your most reverend lord and to you, for other bishops in your neighborhood have also promised to do this as soon as possible. Your excellence, to whom I commend this matter of faith and myself, be well. From Leipzig on Oct. 1, in the year of the Lord 1520.

From Cyprian's "Useful Documents," Vol. I, p. 466.

Our friendly and wholehearted service before, Ernvhessen, 1) gestrengen, günstige liebe Herren und sreunth. We have on this day at Wittenberg in assembled council upon a reply credentz and your done order from the eight-barn, highly-regarded Mr. Wolffgangen Sthelin, Hieronymus Schurff and Christian Beyer doctor, to the city of our most gracious herm Churfürsten 2c., your bevehls tragere in Werbung und bericht, was sich doctor Eckius gegen dem Herrn official zu Czeitz vermittelst Nickol Wilden des Rats diener zu Leipzig, besagten bebstlichen bullen halben Widder D. Mart. Luther and others, and what you have therefore received from the city of our most gracious Lord at the suggestion of the city governors of Czeitz, along with the above-mentioned letter from Doctor Eckius and the above-mentioned copy of the official bull, its contents, and thereupon the matter has been put to the council, considered, and we have decided upon the following opinion. 2) First of all, we believe that such D. Ecken assume, allerseitz unserer gnedigstett und gnedigen Herrn von Sachssen und irer Churfürstlich er und fürstl. The same is also a matter of great necessity that all of our Electoral and Princely Graces, who have the right to take the matter into their hands, should take the matter into their hands. and princely graces, as it concerns the common land, on the city council's advice and consideration, even if it is necessary, with the common land authority, or the most cautious, a true opinion, what your graces at the same time decide is necessary or convenient, and thus stand for one man. Then so a prince to the prince of D. We consider it impossible, according to the land and the people, and that the other part does not want to have the matter taken care of itself, so that both parts of the subjects may remain united and in peace in the length and hardship of the matter: And should our most gracious and kind lords of Saxony be able to agree on this in the future, 4) then it is certain that Doctor Eckius has ordered such by official sanctity, because Doctor Martinus Luther has asked for knowledge of the Holy Scriptures from unauthorized high authorities and has requested that the matter be referred to him in Germany by 5) official sanctity, for a proper and necessary hearing and knowledge of the same, unauthorized and unauthorized, high angels of the Holy Scriptures, and what is found there, which would be kept by all parts. In particular, 6) concerning the letter of the city governors of Czeitz, 7) we find, as do the city governors themselves, that D. Eckius did not proceed formally and properly with the submission of the said copy of the official document, since he did not show any proper appearance to the Lord official of Czeitz of his claimed authority and said bull, for which reason he is obliged to believe the same. In his letter, the same Eckius has also not set any reasonable time for the said official to comply with the matter, and for the present reason, and for other reasons, we are obliged to advise the said official, and it is not demonstrable, that he has brought the matter to the attention of the Lord of Naumburg in a hurry and, above all, with his opportunity and circumstance, which he has done. f. g. hir Inne gesellig, abweisen, mit vormeldung unseres gnedigen Herrn Churfürsten, dan es eure, unsers gnedigsten Herrn des Churfürsten von Sachssen Stadthaldern, notturfft in dem vahl auch sein würde: And because it is presumed that now, in the assembly of the Holy Roman Emperor and the Electors of the Holy Roman Empire, there are also official offers that the Roman Emperor and the Electors of the Holy Roman Empire should be granted the same. and the princes of the Holy Roman Empire and of the Christian faith, 8) and that the matter be brought to a proper legal hearing and settlement, or that in other ways the matter be brought to the proper sanctity, or that it be settled there, as in the case of the fountains, the nobles, and the city halts, according to the justice of the needful discussion and action. Since it is common in law that in lesser matters, than those concerning the holy Christian faith, one has had an official stand on official or pious writings and orders, from which common stencils have arisen, even if they have been credibly proclaimed, until one has actually taken the official sanctity or the Holy Roman Emperor's comfort and opinion, but that such an offence has occurred. 468 The Electoral Councils wrote to the Councils of Zeitz, in which they said that they knew nothing more about the fact that Luther had appealed the bull and intended to write against it. Philipp Melanchthon would give their friend thorough information about it. November 15, 1520.

From Cyprian's "Nützliche Urkunden", Vol. I, p. 472. According to the above letter, the Electoral Councils had requested that Chancellor Schmiedburg appear before them in person on "Monday after Martinmas" (Nov. 15). Since the latter had died on Nov. 5, the people of Zeitz, as it seems, sent another envoy to the Electoral Councils on the same day. The latter gave him the following letter to Melanchthon.

Our dearest, most sincere, most respectable, most kind, most good friend. We have read our current letter, which you sent to us in response to our request, concerning Doctor Eck's action and the official bulls of Doctor Martinum, with your request for its contents, because we then actually report that the aforementioned Doctor Martinus has to expire 2) and write against the bulls, but we still do not receive a report at the time, as it will be assumed by us. Our gracious lord, the bishop of Freysing and Numburg, governors and rescuers, have now written to us concerning the official bulls and the doctor's corner action, and have asked us to demand that they show their respect for your history at Wittenberg, so that he may obtain a printed notice or copy of the appeal of the worthy and highly respected Doctor Martinus Luther against the reported bulls and other charges, as you will then appreciate from such your writings. If, however, we have no other report or knowledge of such an appeal, or of how Doctor Martinus is to excipirate and write against the official bulls, than what has come to us, we have written to the governors and ranks above, that we have given their 1) sent letter to you, as the one who has the most knowledge of our understanding of Doctor Martinus' action and opportunity, to inquire about it from you. Therefore, on behalf of our most gracious Lord Duke Frederick Elector of Saxony 2c., we freely request that you inform the governors and rescuers of Ezekia of his further report here, as much as you are aware of these matters, so that he may report this to the governors and rescuers of Ezekia. From Cyprian's "Nützliche Urkunden", Vol. II, p. 181. There it is stated that this is the answer to the letter sent in No. 467. This document therefore falls between November 5 and 15.

Special good friends, we have received your letter, in which you are obliged to inform us that the respectable and highly respected Heynrich Schmideburg, doctor and cantor, has decided his last day and has passed away in God, along with other eternal requests, and have read the content of his 2) petition, we would like to inform you that we do not like to obey such a request of the aforementioned cantor, but that the eternal God would be gracious and merciful to you. According to your writings, the charges that doctor Eckius has sent to the official between two times, doctor Martinus, have been shared with our council between two, so that you may still note our goodwill, we do not want to withhold our consideration from you, and first of all, we find that the alleged bulla, through a bad abuse, has been punished. by a bad missive, or letter of transmittal, the official, doctor schmidbergk blessed gedechtnis, zw sent, and darynnen is not indicated or verleüptt the official zw time, the itzunntt is, or könnftigk wyrtr 2c., and the honorable doctor, as an official, in the meantime, the execution, which is also not scheduled for a named time, is in God's hands, we respect that the aforementioned mandate, due to the abuse, is null and void, dead and gone. On the other hand, we do not consider that such a bull has been handed over in the form that it should have been, and has used the solitary power that was then in use, but rather that the doctor has been made official with a missive that is supposed to be compulsory, and that there is no credible evidence of the power and authority of the court, how it would extend, and how it would be justified, or presented, which should have been done at our discretion, after one had not committed or obligated himself on his own bad word and mere word. Thirdly, we are told that doctor Martinus has been accused of a great deal of fraudulent bulla, so that he has been excused and the execution has taken place. Therefore, our concern should be to give a second warning, and not to take any action until it is seen how it will be, and how the other bishops, who, as we have heard, may have been dealt with in a different way than before, will also hand over the case to them.

2) Cyprian: "seys".

You are to be guided by this, and you are to report this matter, with its location and circumstances, to our noble Lords of Freysingen and Naumburg before all dynasties, and thereupon to your F. G. We have not wished to withhold this from you on your request and good will, with a friendly request from us in our friendly will, 2c. to you, 2c. 2c.

From Kapp's "Nachlese," Part III, p. 467.

Translated into German by Joh. Frick.

Much salvation! Venerable and excellent licentiate, I do not know what people praised me for before I was called to the preaching ministry. I consider myself unworthy of being praised and extolled by anyone. God's praise and glory, to whose grace alone everything I have done that is good, is to be attributed. But if an adverse rumor is now spread about me, as if I wanted to change the previous habit and act against all respectability, I am not at all surprised about it, because my office and status want something different. When I preached Christ in Schneeberg, building and tearing down was not in my line, although I punished many abuses without hesitation. But now that such an important care of souls has been entrusted to my faithfulness by God's providence, what else can I do but gather Christ's lost and strayed sheep, and straighten out and restore what is weak? What account would I have to give to the strict judge if I were negligent in this? But in order to answer your letter, venerable licentiate, I will begin with the bull, which is indeed a bull. I understand very well what this fright of the Roman bishop has to do with his bull. I am more afraid of God than of men, and I do not allow myself to be turned away from the Christian faith, but hold fast to the Gospel of Christ. If this bull were to be issued according to the apo

If it were to be set up in a stolical sense and remind me to take care of the growth of the common being, I would accept it with all joy and reverence; but since it is so pompous and full of rage and earthly honor, I can make so much less of it, because I see that it is approved and accepted by no one. Am I therefore disobedient? Even if I promised obedience to the bishop once, I will not show it in all things. No one is bound to obey what is said against faith and love. It may happen in permissible matters; although I may have promised obedience according to custom when I was in Altenburg, I will not allow myself to be bound by oaths. I know that in carelessly promised things one can take back one's given word; but it has now come to the point with the oath that one makes it a rope of malice, and the one who commits himself with it may not then boldly confess and defend the truth. I will protect the honor of Christ and all his defenders to the best of my ability; but I will not allow myself to swear for eternity. If I remain obedient to Christ, I will also show obedience to all prelates. But as far as judicial rule is concerned, I confess that I have publicly reminded people who want to enter into a marriage alliance, or who have already entered into one, that they should first, if they are not one, report to their parish priest as their judge, and if he cannot satisfy them, they should be referred to the episcopal vicarii, because it would be fair that each one should first be presented to his own. This godly thing also belongs to the pastoral care, and I will by no means let it be suspended by force. As often as I have received orders from a messenger, I have carried them out, but not without the prior knowledge of the council, and that by right; for it wants to use force against the disobedient even in permitted matters, but in such a way that no one will be demanded unfairly and unjustly. Here you have, my Lord Licentiate, my apology and obedience. In the past days, the Conventual, Mr. M. Zeiner, has also very graciously excused me. I recognize that your admonition flowed from the reason of love, which I will constantly remember even without the slightest bitterness of heart, and by the grace of Christ will in the future do nothing that is contrary to justice and equity; as I then follow your excellence in all lawful things, I hereby make myself a pledge, and hope to be able to do the same in the future.

You will not be so gullible when the most disgraceful calumnies of me come to your ears now and then. Be well and have recommended me to your intercession. From Zwickau on the day before St. Peter's chain celebration [July 31], in the year after the virgin birth in 1521.

473: The objection of Hieronymus von Endorf, imperial councilor, to Mr. Siegmund von Dietrichstein, heir to Carinthia and governor of Styria, about the Eckische Bulle. Deu January 11, 1521.

From Cyprian's "Useful Documents," vol. II, p. 199.

Wolgebornner, noble dear Lord. Your Grace is my very willing beforehand. Your G. as a councilor, governor in Steyr, also general with commissaries of Roman Khays. Majesty, for himself as a Christian and yes, as a member of the nobility and as my lord, whom I consider in other respects to be my noble lord, and more noble, and who would gladly do harm and warn, to promote his need and benefit to the best of my ability, and before that, according to my old, undischarged duty as a councillor to His Majesty. Majesty, who then greatly concerns such things, as well as my name is forgotten, I do to know with this own my potency, as I have now been to Ingoldstat: Nemlich an sannd Stephans tag 2) ist diss Babstlich Bull (der copy Im Drugk, so Ich hernach zuwegen brachte E. G. hierJnn zu vernemen hat) auf der Canntzl in sannd Mauricii Pfarckirchen have been sold. And how I freely grant for the sake of the Biblical Holiness, the highest obedience and pious obedience, but because I take such a brutal and vnuat attitude towards every Christian man; and so contemptuous of a common Christian assembly, and after that so interfering with His Majesty's will. Majesty; to this end, I do not like any thing better, than that I (although I have a good reason) should also have gone to the church, and contradicted these things with sincerity, especially for the sake of our Lord, as it seems to me that everyone is guilty of this; I would also be glad to do so if I had not ensured that such a thing had been brought to my attention, and had appealed to his Majesty himself. E. G. also now asks with whom I have been acquainted to intercede such unheard of things and perhaps with less exhortation, such fate (and we have heard of Luther, who is not yet alive, nor has he been able to read his shrines yet, so that they are lost), and therefore would have liked to come to our Lord in Cham, so that I could inform His Royal Majesty of this. Majesty with the fundamental, evident recognition of the holy shrine, item of the right and other high and protected reproaches of my few achievements to them and their descendants, and also to report something to the country and the people, and especially to the people of the nation of great and urgent need. Now there is so much of this bull that it is too much for a letter, and not all things (as godly, just, and faithful as such a one may be) want to be written about; therefore I will report all of them, the most important, and after the most recent.

First of all, your Lord sees in the book of rulings, especially from the words, through me, (which are interpreted to you by a thoughtful, rather than a little learned, lay), how the Babst of the Weltlichkhait, and before our Lord Khaiser, takes up the sword. Then he shall, in the event of the forfeiture of any hereditary right, and fiefs, as the others 3) have been transferred, be transferred to it. I will confess that I have not heard of any great misfortune or folly (which arises from your lordship and everything else, and must arise out of necessity).

To the third, fourth and fifth of the B-bar, as it is also forbidden by law, so it is also forbidden by law in the case of the forfeiture.

khait, that is, khainer erlannung vnd vnteüglkhait zu allen vnd yeden Rechtslichen Vebungen. Item 1) the nunc also of the renunciation of the serene majesty, although he does not express which majesty, the benevolent, imperial, or whether he himself wants to create one with it; which, however, has been of sann Peter weyt, but has learned and learned at the other. Namely, in the other chapter of his first epistle [v. 13-15], according to Khriechian law text, in Latin, thus speaking: Proinde subditi estote cuivis humanae creaturae propter Dominum, sive Regi tanquam praecellenti, sive praesidibus, ut qui per eum mittuntur in vindictam quidem nocentium, laudem vero recte seu bene agentium, quoniam sic est voluntas Dei. But where all these things are concerned, and to whom it is a matter of seizing the sword, the scepter, and the crown, even if it is a matter of leniency, it is a matter of mercy? that is what Eur G. thinks.

Sixthly, in the Puechstabn C, the Baebstlich Heyligkait shows how Luther's appeal, which he has made to the church, should be against the statutes of Babst Pii des Anndern, and also Julii des Anndern, in which statute it is foreseen that such appeals are to be punished as the khetzer. However, this statute is included in the ecclesiastical laws, so that it can be followed, even if it is included in them. Majesty, whether he may and should suffer this on account of his own sovereignty and ambition, and also on account of his Christian assembly. Then what would be at the council, or why should it be held (as it is to be held every 10 years), if nothing or all that the bishops like is to be brought for it. I want to be sure that his appeal may not be understood from any point of view. Then we have been in the tenth year, in which the common Christian assembly should have been wrapped up, and therefore the time would have been there every hour, if only some clergy themselves would not have been silent.

On the seventh day, at the end of the book, there is such a richly woven net for all of us, with so much yarn, with so much knitting and mashing, that I do not know which of them, so high or so low, so unlearned, so wise or so low, does not have to deal with it. Then, the Autumnal Holy Spirit will, with the utmost care, and also in front of all the announced weltlichenn penen, that no one of Luther's Schrifftn nothing lesenn, but verprennen.

nor shall he praise anything of his; and yet often one may have heard something good or praiseworthy now and then from him, even his sermon, shrift, and thing. This is so, because of the things that a person does not want to do other than according to the good and right of his mind for right, last of all, higher and more understandable.

Nor more of the things that have been left undone by others or by divine authority itself. But all this is not so simple (then one would not read more in one hour than he would in ten years), but the most important thing, with a mouth given by God and nature, to keep silent about the slogan of one's high mind, so that one may praise good things, again according to one's own knowledge, experience, and conscience. Therefore, if our Lord were a holy man, he would have something to do with the faithful, as much more than a Christian, and indeed the head of the Christian Church, in the midst of its members, and as many of the faithful as possible, according to the divine prophecy (which may only now have been properly applied) and likeness, Luke 10, when the Lord did more mercy than the letter, and helped the wounded to salvation.

To the eighth and last (although there are many more), at the time of the election of His Holiness, the most important, and amenable to the unheard-of intervention of all the authorities, and before that, of Kay's Majesty. Majesty. Then the Holy Roman Pontifical will there be held by all and any prelates: that Luther, his companions, associates, keepers and patrons are to be personally seen, held in custody, and that they are to be sent to us. Neither does anyone leave out, but the spiritual, as well as the ecclesiastical, against the imperial and even bavarian law, which is then 6. de sum. tri. I. III. L IV. when the emperor himself punishes the unrighteous members of the Christian congregation and the clergy, both spiritual and ecclesiastical, each according to his rank, and the priest asks for them to be taken to be punished by his majesty: Nor, in his own bishopric of Rome, to any corporal punishment, even in the midst of the ecclesiastical, nor to any punishment, but to the disenfranchisement of the Christians. And it has come to this, if one speaks against spirituality, that he is to be caught for it and sent to Rome. Thus, we are the armies that have been visited on the long, great, and unspeakable many times. E. G. knows what selltzam things have come to you out of your rule of the noble principality of Steyr, and some even to Finckhenstain. The sacraments, and indeed the most important, practiced by the clergy against all devout, heir, and meeting

1) Cyprian: "maggel".
2) "nynndert" - nowhere. In Cyprian: "mynndert".

How then may it be with the great, poor, single-minded sharen, which there armuet halb nit mag, noch ainfallt halben khan: Our Lord's apostle and the dear saints made the plynndten seen, the deaf 1) belonging, the dumb speaking, the stooping, the shrinking and the lamens straight, and in sum the shrancken healthy, also the dead refreshed 2) them. But our present apostles and living saints make us blind with eyes to see, so that we also only have to hear what they want to hear, to be a horn and a fool, to make us sick and then healthy. If we also kill, perhaps more, and before that, many people like to die, because of the Selgerät. And that our Most Gracious Lord would suffer, and would have it decreed (though I cannot remember), what else would be more necessary, higher, and greater for Him. And that many emperors may have hindered him), his majesty shall not tolerate it for the sake of the Holy Roman Empire. When no one is obliged to concede and to pay such unlawful leave. Then his forefathers in the empire are mostly guilty of this with their rejection of the letters, 3) the papal stool, and the rule of the Roman churches, and how this is in good order for the sake of the integrity and rightness of the faith. Because there was still confusion in some articles, especially concerning the drifalltigkhait. And even though such disagreement was only with the letter, and therefore only with measure, now his Majesty, as it is known, has judged many things about it, and has drawn into disputes, and yet Christianity has neither changed nor improved, but has changed and changed noticeably. It may also be that our most gracious lord cannot help the church itself. Then, as well as in the ecclesiastical law dist. IXIII. [sic!] 4) one chapter is thus saying: I, Louis, Roman Emperor, decree and grant, by the grant of our confirmation, to thee selgen Petern and by thee to thy vicarius, Mr. Pascali, highest bishop and his descendants, in perpetuity, as you of our predecessors have hitherto had in your power and dominion and have raised up the state of Rome 2c., it is to be remembered that when St. Peter was in the flesh, he said: I do not accept your assignment.

When I was a Roman bishop, I left all things and did not ask Nerone for any opinion about Rome, and he was not allowed to, but saw that he did much harm to my descendants, then he misled them in the preaching of the Gospel, in holy prayer, and in the fulfillment of God's commandments, and made himself great to take over, and to be noble. As he also speaks enough himself, by learning to be subject to the emperor and his governors, that is, to the princes and other administrators, as then indicated in Latin.

It is also important to see to it that the Lord God does not speak again or do anything else (Then it has been said before, Matthew 21 [v. 43]: The kingdom of God will be lifted up by you, and given to a people, and it will bear its fruit). As soon as I have come home, I will also write to my own messengers at the end of my term of office, and I do not want anyone else to know, according to my knowledge, also according to my merits, for the sake of the welfare of the well. I want to have (as I hope) a blessing, as I also can no longer. Take from it what is good, and handle it according to good, rich reason. It is indeed high time, so that we ourselves do not grow in the sword of him, who has so long graciously waited, and after all my needs, even high, apparent needs, will not wait any longer. E. G. also wants to keep this my unambiguous letter. If I cannot escape my longstanding faithfulness (perhaps to the extent of my own guilt), that I will not be denied, then I am (dear God) a mere mosquito, and would like to be able to deal with it easily in the future, although this should not be done to me by anyone; then I may not harm anyone, but to all good, even God before and after Kay.Maj, for my Christian benefit, out of the debt of conscience and most faithful loyalty. Your Lord will also not let himself be oppressed to write me something little in return. To whom I, as to my Lord, in all things and in all times, most sincerely commit myself. D. Masenn, the 11th day of January, anno XXI.

475: The Bishop of Eichstädt, Gabriel von Eib, at D. Eck's request. Eck's publicized mandate, or publication diploma, concerning the papal bull against Luther. Date: October 24, 1520.

This document is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 97b; in the Jena edition (1564), vol. I, p. 316 b; in the Altenburg edition, vol. I, p. 512; and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVII, p. 318.

Gabriel von GÖttes Gnaden, Bishop zu Eichstädt.

1. To all and everyone, secular, ecclesiastical or regular churches and monasteries, prelates, abbots, provosts, deans, priors, guardians, custodians and ministers, of all orders, also of the beggars, also to our field deans, governors, parish lords, parish administrators, canons, chaplains, altarists, priests and all feoffed clerics, and unfeoffed, throughout our diocese; also to all and every one to whom this letter of ours shall come, and to whom the business hereunder shall concern, or may concern in time to come: blessedness in the Lord, and to obey these our, more apostolic or papal mandates. Because in days gone by, the worthy and noble, our dear faithful, Johann Eck, Canonick of our Churches, of our most holy in God Fathers and Lord, Lord Leo, by divine providence Pabst of the Tenth, to things written hereafter Nuncio, has had us reminded and requested by some of his missive letters that we want to command you and each of you to read the papal letter, from the named our most holy Lord Pabst at Rome, at St. Peter's, in the year of the Incarnation of the Holy Spirit. Peter, in the year of the Incarnation 1520, on the 17th day before the first day of the month of July [June 15], of his 8th Pontificate, concerning the erroneous and benign teachings of a brother, Martin Luther, of the Hermit Order of St. Augustine.

2. Because we now desire, in the duty of our pastoral office, to turn our minds to the blessedness of our subjects, as well as to the unity, peace and peace of the Holy Mother of the Church, and to be obedient to the papal mandates and commandments, as we are obliged to do: So we command you all and every one above, and in virtue of holy obedience, by the censures, penalties, and penalties, contained in the touched papal letter; Earnestly commanding that when such papal letter, or a true copy thereof, is signed with a prelate's and notary's seal, affixed, and vidified by our vicar in ecclesiastical matters, be delivered to you, and that everything and anything contained therein be proclaimed and proclaimed in your churches before the multitude of the people, with preceding interpretation. Also reminds and requests all Christian believers of both sexes to obey the papal letter or bull in question, in all and every article, concerning them or each of them respectively or visually, in the censures and penalties expressed therein 1).

with the work, which we also, and each of them, by virtue of this letter, request and remind, as much as they thus reminded and requested, the divine vengeance, and the Holy Papal See's disfavor, also the penalties and censures in the said bull understood, want to avoid: We therefore remind and request that we nevertheless proceed and proceed against the disobedient and recalcitrant, if they are reported to us, according to the force, form, content and capacity of the bull, and otherwise as we may rightfully do, unhindered by their disobedience and recalcitrance.

b. With the bishop at Freifingen.

476 Bishop Philip of Naumburg and Freifingen, Count Palatine of the Rhine, publication diploma and mandate against Martin Luther's books and writings. Dat. Freifingen, January 10, 1521.

This document is found in Latin in the Jena edition (1566), tom. II, fol. 469 d. German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 101; in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 359 b; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 554 and in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p. 562.

Philipps, von Gottes und des päpstlichen Stuhls Gnaden, Bischof zu Freifingen, Administrator zum Naumburg, Pfalzgraf bei Rhein, Herzog zu Bayern 2c.

1. To all and every one of our beloved in the Lord, of the churches and monasteries, also freed prelates, abbots, priors, deans, chapters, parish lords, parish administrators, and other priests, Clerics, and open scribes through our city and diocese of Freisingen, to whom this document of ours will come, which concerns this matter, to render blessedness in the Lord, and to firmly obey our, even more the papal mandates and orders.

2. you should know that we, by virtue of a transfusion of a letter of our most holy in God Father and Lord, Lord Leo, by divine providence of Pabst, the name of the tithe, against a brother, Martin Luther, of the Order of St. Augustine the Hermit, and his an-dependent. Patrons and holders, on account of the erroneous and such doctrine and writings of the touched brother Martin, that they seduce the kind and Christian minds; which papal letter recently went out at Rome on the seventeenth day before the month of Julius [15 June] in the twentieth year. June] in the twentieth year, by the worthy, our beloved in God Johann Ecken, Doctor of Holy Scripture and Papal Law, of our named Lord Pabst's nuncios or skilful ones, find requested several times that we want to procure the same Papal Scripture, or the same credible Transumpta, to be proclaimed and publicized by touched our city and diocese.

3. Since we now want to follow such request, and such papal mandates, out of duty of obedience, we therefore order you all and every one concerned, earnestly commanding in virtue of the holy obedience, and at penance, understood in said papal letter, that if you are requested in virtue of this letter, or if your one is requested, that you will diligently proclaim and publicly announce to the Christian faithful the papal letter referred to, or the credible transcript thereof, and everything and anything contained therein, in the sermons in your churches and monasteries, as well as elsewhere, when and as often as it may be necessary, and that you will also permit and create the proclamation and public announcement thereof. Also to faithfully remind all and every believer in Christ to refrain from the errors and the teachings of the aforementioned brother Martin Luther, as reported and indicated in the aforementioned papal letter, also from the same preaching, proclamation, defense and handling, and from the presentation of the same booklet, sermon, writing, or slips of paper, who have and hold the erroneous teachings of the aforementioned Martin Luther, not to praise, extol, print, sell, proclaim, publish, or handle and protect them, publicly or secretly, or to have or conceal them in their dwellings or other ends, in some ways.

4) If, however, one of you should dare to deliver the same books and writings to the prelates and deans of the chapters, after this mandate has been issued, to burn them without any delay and to deliver them, and to do otherwise, which is due to them or to each of them, according to the papal letter, either in accordance with or in opposition to the divine vengeance and the disgrace or wrath of our Lord the Pope, also avoid the judgments, censures, and other sounds and punishments expressed in the papal letter.

Given at our castle in Freisingen, on the tenth day of Januarii. In the year of the Lord, one thousand five hundred and in the one and twentieth, under the expression of our secret or petition.

Jesus.

Let it be known to every devout Christian that I, D. Martinus Luther, moved earlier by honest complaint, have made an appeal legally and properly, from Pope Leo the Tenth to a free Christian concilium, which follows according to its content, and is that: 1)

1) This first paragraph is on the back of the title page in most editions. In the Latin Jena

1. since the divine, natural and human law, for the comfort and protection of the oppressed, has invented and instituted the appeal, or appeal from the inferior to the superior, and no inferior has power to resist it, or to bind the superior's hand; also it is evident how a Christian common council, especially in matters concerning the Christian faith, is over the pope, and he, to appeal from him to the same, has no power to resist, although Julius II. and Pius II. with their sacrilegious, mad laws have resisted it in vain:

I, Martinus Luther, 2) Augustinian, Doctor of Holy Scripture at Wittenberg, 2c., before you, Mr. Notary, as before a public credible person, besides these present witnesses, will and noble to appeal and call, that, after in past days, by some papal (as they pretend) preachers of indulgences in Saxon lands was preached too unskillfully, to seduce and damage the poor people, and I with honest reason of the Scriptures resisted them, by a free public disputation; Then they were furious with me, and after many blasphemies, so that they publicly and freely proclaimed me a heretic from the pulpits, at last also sued before the most holy in God Father Leo the Tenth, through He Marium de Perusiis, and thus obtained a letter of summons, cited me to Rome, to put me on trial, before He Hieronymo de Genu- tiis and Sylvester Prierias.

I complained that I was not safe in Wittenberg, much less in Rome, that I was poor and weak in body, and that I was unable to make such a long journey, and that the judges were suspicious and displeased with me, because Sylvester, my adversary, had written against me publicly; is referred to Document No. 243 at the end of the same, and notes that what follows (from 8 12 of our writing) is an appendix to this appeal. In contrast, in the Erlangen edition, opr>. vur. urZ., tom. V, p. 121-128 the whole document No. 243 is printed again, which already idick. tom. II, p. 438 sqa- in its entirety. What follows here in German, § 1 biss 11, is not No. 243 itself, but only a summary.

2) The "called" is in the original edition only after: "the holy scripture".

in the sacred Scriptures of these things quite unlearned; and He Jerome, as a jurist, and not a theologian, who could not be judge of these things,

I have requested through the most illustrious, highborn Lord, Duke Frederick, Elector of Saxony 2c., 1) that the matter be ordered out to honest and learned persons: they have again needed their gross stoicism, and by papal sanctity obtained that the matter be ordered out to Mr. Thomas of Cajeta, the Cardinal St. Sixti, and of the time papal embassy in German lands, so that they themselves remain judges in this matter. For since the same Cardinal is the most distinguished of their order and mind, it was to be presumed that he would judge against me, or that I would be frightened before such an adversarial judge, would fail to appear, and would fall disobediently into punishment and judgment.

5 However, I took comfort in the truth, came to Augsburg with great effort, food and travel, and was kindly received by the Reverendiss. I was kindly received by the Reverendissary Cardinal.

6 But regardless of the fact that I offered to answer, publicly and secretly, and also appealed to four high schools, he pushed me hard to contradict, and would not show cause or reason. No pleading or submission helped me. Finally, he threatened me with a gruesome papal order letter, and I should no longer come before his eyes if I did not object. So that I was forced to appeal to the most holy Father Leo to better inform him of such a complaint; as is further noted in the same appeal 2).

Now, however, they despise such appeal, and I still today desire to prove my errors to myself, and I would be willing to contradict where I would have erred, that I testify to this; in addition, I have submitted my disputation to the pope, and am still waiting daily for the verdict: so I do hear, and the same Rev. Thomas Cardinal S. Sixti writes to the most noble Lord, Elector of Saxony 2c., how the above-mentioned judges at Rome continue to condemn me in this matter.

They have disregarded my faithfulness and superfluous obedience in appearing at Augsburg with such difficulty; they will not heed my offer of an answer, openly and secretly; they will even disdain to teach me, poor sheep of Christ, the truth and to lead me away from error; but, for an unheard and unproven reason, out of sheer force and iniquity, they press me to contradict the speech that I hold true in my conscience, so that they want to lead me astray from the Christian faith and the public opinion of the Scriptures.

(8) For the authority of the pope is not over nor against, but for and under the Scriptures and divine truth, and he has no authority to choke the sheep of Christ, to throw them into the jaws of wolves, to hand them over to false teachers, but to lead them to the truth, as is fitting for a shepherd, a bishop, who sits in the place of God.

(9) For this reason I find myself complained of and offended. For it should come to pass that henceforth no one should confess Christ, nor read the Scriptures publicly, and so be forcibly cast out from the right, true Christian faith and Scriptural understanding into vain, human conceits and opinions, and be driven into seductive fables.

10. Therefore, with this writing, I appeal and call for a future free, safe concilium, for me and for all who adhere to me and want to adhere to me in the future, from the above-mentioned most holy Pope Leo, who has not well considered and understood this matter, and also from the aforementioned judges and their loading, dealings, and everything that may result and occur from it, and all that may result therefrom, from all their judgments, sentences, and from all the complaints that may come to me from them in general or in particular, as from those who are nothing, unjust, free and unreasonable, and I request, first, second, third, to give me the Apostolos 3) who has to give them, especially from you, Notaris, testimoniale.].

3) Apostoli are letters of permission (äirmssorius littkE) given by officials and ecclesiastical judges to witness the appeal when appealed by the bishops to the pope or by the pope to a general concil. See Du OuirZs s. v. ^x>c>8toli.

1) In the original: erbeitet.

2) No. 212 in this volume.

(11) And I condition that I will execute this appeal, and prove its void, abusive, unjust and unreasonable proceeding, as it may best be done, with reservation to increase, diminish, change, improve, and all the benefits that the rights give to me, my adherents, and those who will still adhere to me.

12. But now the same Pope Leo persists in his unchristian outrage, hardens and multiplies, so nearly that he also in a bull, as I hear him say, condemns me uncalled, unheard and unconquered, in addition to denying God and his holy word, and promises, as an apostate and unchristian, the power of the Christian church and a free Concilii, also gives me to deny the Christian faith publicly, and with unheard blasphemy suppresses the holy word of God:

I hereby inform everyone that I still stand by my previous and present appeal, and that I have legally denied the same before a common scribe 1) and a fair witness, and that I hereby deny and deny before everyone, on and in virtue of the same, and that I hereby appeal anew, and invoke a Christian concilium, by the same Pope Leo,

14. first, as of a sacrilegious power, presumptuous, unjust judge, in that he condemned me unconvicted, and undicted reason or report.

(15) On the other hand, as of a heretic and apostate who is obstinate, erroneous, condemned in all Scripture, in that he gives me to deny the Christian faith in the sacraments.

Thirdly, as of an enemy, adversary, oppressor of all holy scripture, in that he sets his own mere words against all divine words publicly and insolently.

Fourth, as of a despiser, blasphemer, and reviler of the holy Christian Church and of a free concilii, in that he pretends and denies, with his unchristian ancestors, Pío II and Julio II, that a Christian concilium is nothing, knowing well that, though it is not yet assembled, yet there are those who belong to a concilium, that is, the Christian community. Just as the Roman Empire or the council of any city does not mean anything if the princes and lords who belong to it are not assembled. With these and all other matters and undertakings, I hereby publicly offer to come forward and instruct.

18. For this reason, I humbly ask the most noble, highborn, well-born, noble, strict, wise, prudent lords, Carolum, Roman emperors, princes, counts, lords, knights, nobility, councils, cities and communities of the entire German nation, to save divine honor and protect Christian churches, doctrine and faith, and preservation of free Christian churches, doctrine and faith, adhere to me and my appeal, fall away from the Pope's unchristian authority, resist, and do not follow his mighty outrage, or stand still, and do not follow the same unchristian bull, until I and my cause are honestly summoned, and interrogated by unsuspicious judges, and refuted with thorough writing. Without a doubt, Christ our Lord, the right judge, will pay each one abundantly at his last judgment with eternal grace.

But if someone would despise such my request, continue to follow the pope, I hereby want to excuse myself, and have weighed down his conscience by such my faithfully given warning, brotherly requested before, and leave room for God's final judgment on him, the pope and all papal heaps. 2)

Maledicent illi, et tu benedices. Psalm. 109, 28. Verum est.

1) The "common scribe" or notary who acted in this appeal was Johannes Agricola of Eisleben. The witnesses were Johann Pockmann, Master of Philosophy, of Hof; Valentin Klochtzer of Geir, Imperial Notary; Jakob Seidler of Neuendorf, Thomas Kluege of Zwickau, priest; and Caspar Creuciger of Leipzig, cleric. About Agricola compare St. Louis edition, vol. XX, introduction, p.41 f.

2) This is followed in Latin by notarization.

Gestrengen, Erenvhesten, besondere gonstige Herren, gonner und forderer. Your gratitude is our willing consent at all times. We kindly request you to inform us how Doctor Martinus is ordered by us, how he has appealed to the holy future council, that he might come under ecclesiastical ban, which half of us, the council, have obtained on account of the whole community, that we want to adhere to him in his appeal. Because these matters are somewhat large and important, we have asked our most gracious lord, the Elector 2c., or most graciously E. G., as his Cf. Gn. Stadthaltern, did not know how to promise the same adherence to him, but rather took a long and urgent time, E. G. in high lead ask, E. G., will inform us in writing what we are to do and what we are to do, so that we may commit the above-mentioned Doctor Martinus without delay, in accordance with his intentions, and without fail, and you will not leave us with an anthwort. This we want to do for the sake of E. G., our special lords, benefactors and claimants, with our willing and friendly services. Given EylendsMontags Nach aller heyligen tage [5.Nov.]. The Electoral Councillors' letter to the learned Councillors of Wittenberg, in which, together with the enclosed letter of inquiry from the Council of Wittenberg, they ask the learned Councillors for their opinion on what answer they should give to the Council of Wittenberg, so that it can act without reprimand in this matter.

From Cyprian's "Useful Documents," vol. II, p. 186.

Our willingly friendly dinst before, honorable, highly noble and respectable special lord and good friend. In the absence of the Most Illustrious, Highborn Prince and Lord, Mr. Frederick, Duke of Saxony and Elector 2c., Our most gracious lord, the council of Wittenberg has now come to us with a letter in which it is reported that although Doctor Martinus has recently appealed to the future council, he was afraid that he might come under ecclesiastical ban, for which reason he has procured from you on behalf of the whole community that they would adhere to him in his appeal 2c. With requested request to inform them what they should do in this matter. As you will then further see from your letter.

If then this matter is somewhat great, and we as members of the council do not have an adequate understanding of it, then we, in place of Our Lord's Highness, freely request on our behalf that you consider this matter on your behalf, and report what we think we should give to the council of Wittenberg for answer to such a letter, so that they may be protected as much as possible from complaint, and yet show themselves to be ignorant of the matter. If, without a doubt, you do our Lord's friendly opinion, we will gladly and willingly do it for you. Date

Pope Leo X.

Beloved Son, Beatitude and Apostolic Benediction. We have sent to our most beloved Son in Christ, Carl, elected Roman Emperor and Catholic King in Spain, our Nuncio and Notary, our beloved son Marinus Caraccioli, a man of whose fidelity and prudence we have many samples, with the intention that he may always be mindful of maintaining friendship and good understanding with His Majesty, that he will always be careful to maintain the friendship and good understanding that exists between us, and that he will be a reliable interpreter and guardian of our will in matters that have occurred for the benefit and honor of both parties. Since we have now ordered him to go to your Serene Highness and communicate some things to you in our name, we do not wish to go further, but only to remind your Serene Highness in the Lord, as we do, that after your previous praiseworthy performance and respectful testimony against us and this Holy See, you may give complete credence to this our Nuncio, in regard to us, which will be very agreeable to us. Date Rome at St. Peter's under the Fisherman's Ring, June 6, 1520, of our papal dignity in the eighth year.

Pope Leo X.

Beloved Son, Beatitude and Apostolic Benediction. We have sent the beloved sons, Hieronymus Aleander and Johann Eck, both our notaries and nuncios, people whose special learning and faithfulness are well known to us, to your Serene Highness and the other princes and prelates in Germany, where it has been necessary, so that they may condemn the Lutheran heresy that has arisen, which, although it is obviously in conflict with the Catholic faith, we have nevertheless condemned by virtue of our and this Holy Apostolic See's prestige and authority, strengthened by your help and favor, but bring the authors of this evil, especially the instigator Martin Luther himself, the child of wickedness, either to repentance, or, if they stubbornly persist in their mind, bring them to due punishment, as your Serene Highness will see more extensively from other letters of ours bearing the lead seal and sent to you in the form of a breve. Since the virtue and godliness of your Serene Highness can nowhere be expressed more praiseworthy than when you help to cleanse the Catholic faith of all dross, and since it is also fair and eminently worthy of your family and ancestors that you prefer the common good to private gain in such matters: We exhort your Serene Highness in the Lord to listen favorably to our nuncios, Jerome and John Eck, or to one of them, and to give them complete faith, as well as to use all power and exert all effort, so that all this corruption from the pure Christian faith may be eradicated the better and easier, even in the first time, in which God will be pleased, and you will be honored. Given in Rome at St. Peter's under the Fisherman's Ring, July 17, 1520, in the eighth year of our papal dignity.

Yes. Sadoletus.

B. The same action. Application and request to the Elector.

483 Short account of the action at Cologne between the papal envoys Caraccioli and Aleander and Elector Frederick of Saxony concerning Luther. Nov. 1520.

This writing is found in the Latin Wittenberg edition (1551), tora. II, col. 116; in the Jena (1566), torn. II, col. 314d; in German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 98; in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 317; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 512 and in the Leipzig, vol. X VII, p. 376. Walch notes that the narrative itself is attributed to Heinrich von Zütphen, but the addition to Spalatin.

1. papal holiness sent, Martinus Caraccioli and Hieronymus Aleander, on Sunday after all holy days [Nov. 4], 1520 at Cologne in the Barfüßerkloster, in the presence of the bishops of Trent and Trief, my most gracious lord, Elector of Saxony, 2c., and, after displaying the gracious and paternal attention of their papal greeting and avoidance, how praiseworthy his electoral graces, ancestors, and his electoral grace have hitherto held against the holy Christian faith, papal holiness, and the Roman See, and what greater hope there should also be at this time in his electoral graces.

Finally, two things were requested in the resolution. First, that S. C. F. G. would be willing that the bull be executed, and Doctor Martinu's books be burned 2c. Secondly, that S. C. F. G. want to punish him, or accept and hold him in prison, or send him to Father H.

3 His Electoral Grace has given them notice that they want to take a stand on the matter, and to give them an answer on their occasion. On the following Wednesday [Nov. 7], S. C. F. G. had the papal nuncios or delegates, in the presence of the bishops of Trent and Trief, answer in Latin through some of their councilors and servants, according to the following German notice.

[Answer given by the Elector Frederick, Duke of Saxony, to the Roman papal envoys, Marinus Caraccioli and Aleander.] 1)

4 Our most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony 2c., has in no way provided that papal sanctity should have had such a search carried out by S. C. F. G.. For S. C. F. G. has always, in praise of God and without speaking of glory, endeavored to remain in the laudable footsteps of his ancestors and parents, highly glorious and of blessed memory. As then reported by reason of papal sanctity of both their courtship, and S. C. F. G. again, by divine help, is willing to do, and to keep himself as a pious Christian prince and obedient son of the holy Christian church. Now S. C. F. G. notices from the delivered letters that besides Aleander Johann Eck is ordered and given by Father H. to be nuncio in this matter. Thereupon Eck (just at the same time that S. C. F. G. was required by the Roman Imperial Majesty for her coronation, and therefore absent from her principality and lands) took the liberty, contrary to the content and capacity of P. H.'s bull, to name and complain about other persons besides Doctor Martinus; which action is quite inappropriate for this application, and what complaint S. C. F. G. had against it. C. F. G. may and should have about it, they both, Aleander and Eck, and manly to judge, have considered that his electoral grace's brother, and his electoral grace, like their parents, according to their humble showing, should have been spared against P. H. with such a submission.

1) This heading is found in the Latin editions.

Moreover, our most gracious Lord, the Elector of Saxony, is unaware of 2) what has been done to her absence by D. M. and her subjects. M. and her subjects had taken such a burdensome action; so that it could have happened that a considerable number of people, learned and unlearned, clergy and secular, would have wanted to murder D. Martini pending the cause and the intended appeal.

His Electoral Grace has never had anything to do with D. Martinu's matter, nor has he yet. Should D. M. should have written and done something improper against papal sanctity, or even have taught, preached, or written anything other than what is proper for a Christian man, H. C. F. G. would have no pleasure in it at all.

7 S. C. F. G., for the good of the matter, two years ago, at the request and request of the Legate and Cardinal S. Sixti to act paternally and to settle the matter amicably, has had Doctor Martino negotiate to join him in Augsburg; as was then done by Doctor Martino, there is also the archbishop of Trier 2c. D. Martino was given by the pope as commissary, against whom D. Martinus, if required and assured with free escort, would have proved himself without doubt. Doctor Martinus also offered to do all sorts of things, and again he inherited. D. Martinus may also think, as he and many honorable, Christian and highly learned people should talk about it, that he was caused to write by manifold, unspiritual attacks of his enemies, which nevertheless leaves S. C. F. G. in his dignities.

2) In Latin: obscurum; in the German editions: "not unconscious".

8 Our most gracious lord is also truly neither reported by imperial majesty, nor anyone else sufficiently that D. Martini's teachings, writings and sermons have been so overcome that they should be burned. If, however, this had been truly reported to H. C. F. G., they should actually believe that H. C. F. G. wanted to have kept himself as a Christian prince and obedient son of the holy Christian church.

(9) Because it would not be in the best interest of S. C. F. G.'s brother and S. C. F. G. to allow such a swift execution and burden to grow on their Christian and princely graces and on their Electors' and S. G.'s understanding, country and people: therefore, S. C. F. G.'s request that this swift proceeding be stopped. Therefore, S. C. F. G. requests that this swift action be stopped, and that the matter be directed so that Doctor Martinus may come before equal, learned, pious and unsuspicious judges, on a free, safe, sufficient escort, in convenient, safe places for interrogation, and that his books not be burned uninterrogated and unconquered.

If it were found that Doctor Martinus had acted wrongly, S.C.F.G. would not know how to give him a coincidence, and would hope that P.H. would not seek anything from S.C.F.G. about this report, which could be dishonest and referable to S.C.F.G.. This is what S. C. F. G. is willing and able to do for P. H., as an obedient son of the holy Christian church.

When Marinus and Aleander heard such a request, they discussed it secretly with the others who had joined them from Father H.; but after they had again been admitted to the discussion by the most illustrious of our most gracious lord, the Elector, Aleander began, repeated what our most gracious prince had previously had brought forward; he also mentioned how by many and various means Father H. D. had always been willing to turn Luther away from his error and bring him back to the right path. H. D. Luthern from his error and to bring him back on the right path. Marinus also let himself be heard in all kinds of speech, and D. Mart. Luther very badly.

indicates that he would not have fulfilled his manifold hereditary duties.

12 Aleander also made the same and other speeches, and he was most pleased that he was considered to be leading a good cause; he also did not want to admit in any way that the archbishop of Trier should have any power or right to judge or pass judgment in this matter. For the commission of a lower, appointed (subdelegati) judge had expired when the principal had taken the matter back to himself. 1) And because it was a matter of faith, he stated that no one but only P. H. was entitled to speak in it. He gave such an example, which is not much heard, as: If one of our most gracious lord the Elector 2c. If one of the subjects of our most gracious lord of the Elector 2c. were to call either the King of France or a foreign prince to judge in his matter, our prince and sovereign would be very unhappy about it and would not be able to stand it.

When he had made many vain words, and had often spoken against himself, he finally said: it was neither in his nor Caraccioli's power or authority to do something that was not written in the Bulla; therefore they wanted to continue according to the Bulla and burn Luther's books. For P. H.'s mind and opinion would not be to proceed against Luther's person, but against his error, as they did not want to make their hands (to use Aleander's words) 2) fat with Luther's blood. This happened around evening; and it seemed that they still wanted to bring up a lot, but since there was no order to give further answers, and the Elector, prevented by important business, could not be there himself, both parts parted from each other. Done at Cologne, Anno 1520.

Since Marinus Caraccioli and Hieronymus Aleander, papal legates and orators, were dispatched by the pope to Emperor Carl to sue D. Luther before his majesty, and to obtain that books of his that had gone out of print be burned 2c., it was said that imperial majesty would soon give this answer to their speech without some advice: Dear, let us first hear what our father Duke Friederich says about this 2c., then we will answer P. H. Legaten.

15 The same orators have also promised Erasmo Roterodamo, by order of Fr.

and wanted to rebel against Luther by writing. Erasmus, however, rejected this and said: "Luther has a greater reputation with me than that I should write against him; also, his books are so covered with divine scripture that I can neither judge myself well in them nor understand them sufficiently. He is such a great man that I learn more from one leaf of his writings when I read them than from the whole of St. Thomas.

16 The Sophists of Louvain, when they once complained to the Margarites that Luther was confusing the whole of Christendom with his writings

When she was revenged and turned back, she asked who Luther was. But when she answered that he was an unlearned monk, it was said that she had replied, "You scholars, of whom there are a great number, write against the one unlearned monk, and the world will undoubtedly give more credence to many scholars than to one unlearned man. 1)

1) At the end, the German Wittenberg edition and the Jena edition have: "Solchs ist geschriebe von D. Heinricho Züphoniensi." More correctly, the Latin editions have it after § 13. The following would then be Spalatin's addition.

B. How Luther, after the adversaries had burned his writings, publicly burned the Papal Dulle and the Decretals, along with Emser's and Eck's roofs at Wittenberg.

486 A brief history of how the antichristic Decretals of D. M. Luther were burned.
Dec. 10, 1520.

This writing is found in Latin in the Wittenberg edition (1551), tom. II, fol. 123b; in the Jena edition (1566), tom. II, fol. 320 (incorrect 230) and in the Erlanger, opp. var. arZ., tom. V, p. 253. German in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 1M; in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 353; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 539 and in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p. 332.

In the year of the birth of our Lord and Savior Christ, 1520, on the tenth day of the Christian month, all the students in Wittenberg were called together by a public notice, posted on the black board in front of the Lectorio, to the effect that the antichristian decrees should be burned at nine o'clock (before noon). At that time, the students often gathered at a place in front of the Elsterthor, behind the hospital; there, a handsome magister prepared the fireplace, piled up wood, and set it on fire. Then D. M. L. threw the antichristian decrees, together with the Bulla Leonis X., which had recently gone out against him, into the fire with these words: Because thou hast afflicted the Holy One of the Lord, let the eternal fire afflict and consume thee [Jos. 7:25].

When this was done, D. Luther went back to the city. Luther went back to the city, and many doctors, masters and students with him.

The next day, D. Mart. Luther, after reading and explaining the Psalter, which he had begun to read and explain in the previous year 1519 mensē Martio, admonished all listeners to beware of the papal laws and statutes.

4) That the decrees be burned would be child's play; it would be highly necessary that the pope, that is, the Roman see itself, together with all its

He said, "If you do not contradict the Pope's blasphemous rule with all your heart, you cannot be saved. He further said with great seriousness: "If you do not wholeheartedly oppose the blasphemous rule of the pope, you cannot be saved. For the kingdom of the pope is so contrary to the kingdom of Christ and Christian life that it would be better and safer to live in a wasteland where no man is to be seen than to live in and under the antichristic kingdom.

(5) Therefore every Christian should take care, as much as he loves the salvation of his soul, that he does not deny Christ. This will certainly happen if he keeps company with the papists. So that anyone who puts up with their religion and false services in the church, as they are in use today under the papacy, and does not contradict their powerful errors, must be eternally lost in that life. But if he contradicts them, he must certainly expect the death of his body and life. But, he said, I would rather wait in this world for all kinds of journeys than burden my conscience with silence, for which I would have to give an account to God (where I would remain silent).

Because I have been heartily disgusted with the raging Roman beast for some time, I consider the Babylonian plague and pestilence to be an abomination, and I want to report this to my brothers as long as I live and warn them. If I cannot resist the great harm and destruction of countless souls, some of ours are to be preserved so that they will not be cast into the abyss of hell together with the others. The others may do what they will in this matter; for it is time that we take it seriously to amend.

This and many other things like it were told by Doctor Luther in clear, distinct words, with the beautiful adornment of innate fatherly language, which I, as a clumsy, unspeaking man, cannot claim. But no one among us doubts that he is more senseless than a stick (as all papists are), that this and other things he has said are the truth. It is also clear to all simple believers who are still children in Christ, that is, who are not yet poisoned with the stain of papist doctrine and the splendid good opinion (as it can be seen) of this world, and to all innocent Christians, that Doctor Luther is an angel of the living God [Mal. 2, 7], who shall feed the erring sheep with the word of truth alone; because these same are dumb dogs and sleep [Is. 56, 10], so ascribing to them the name with dishonor that they are shepherds of the flock. And even though the mountains, that is, the high leaders of the world and Cedern Libani (the rulers of the church) oppose with all force and pride, yet the sheep of Christ recognize their shepherd's voice, which is presented to them through his messenger [John 10:4, 5]. But these sheep do not hear the voice of a strange shepherd. Blessed are those who do not take offense at the contemptible figure of this man (Luther), who touches the mountains of the world, who cannot do otherwise, according to their nature, but smoke [Ps. 144, 5].

487 V.M. Luther's writing: "Why the Pope's and his disciples' books were burned by D. M. Luther. Let also show whoever will, why they burned D. Luther's books." December 1520.

This writing, after the burning had taken place on December 10, was published in the same month in Latin and German at Wittenberg in quarto. The title of the Latin is: tzware kouitiōis Uolnani et ckisoipnlorrn eins lūbri u D. Nrrtino l,ntkero eornkntsi slnt. Oomroonstret vieissiin ynisaus volet: enr luitbori libros exnsseerint. [^]VittenberZ. Recorded in the Wittenberg edition (1551), torn. II, fol. 1191^r; Jenaer (1566), torn. II, col. 316 d and Erlanger, opp. var. nrZ., torn. V, p. 257. In German, it has appeared in many individual editions under the title we have placed in the heading (the Erlanger edition lists thirteen of them). In the collective editions: in the Wittenberg (1554), vol. VII, p.138; in the Jena (1564), vol. I, p. 354b; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p.540; in the Leipzig, vol.XVII, p.333; in the Erlangen, I. edition, vol. 24, p. 150 and in the 2nd edition, vol.24, p.151.

Jesus.

To all lovers of Christian truth be desired grace and peace from GOD.

I, Martinus Luther, 1) Doctor of the Holy Scriptures, Augustinian at Wittenberg, hereby declare that by my will, advice and consent, on Monday after St. Nicolai [December 10] in the year 1520, the books of the Pope of Rome and some of his disciples were burned. If anyone should be surprised at this, as I am sure he is, [and] should ask for what cause and command I have done this, let him be answered herewith.

1) This is how it is interpunctured in the German Wittenberg and Jena editions. In the Latin editions and in the Erlangen edition, the comma precedes "genannt". But compare ?3.

2. first, it is an ancient custom to burn poisonous, evil books; as we read in the stories of the apostles Cap. 19:19, where they burned books for five thousand pennies, according to the teaching of St. Paul.

(3) Secondly, I am ever unworthy to be a baptized Christian, and a sworn Doctor of the Holy Scriptures; above which a daily preacher, by virtue of his name, standing, oath, and office, is bound to destroy, or ever repel, false, seductive, unchristian doctrine. And although there are many more in the same duty who would not or would not do the same, perhaps out of ignorance or infirm fear, I would still not be excused, if my conscience were sufficiently informed and my spirit courageously enough awakened by God's grace, someone's example would let me endure.

4. Thirdly, I would not have undertaken such a work if I had not experienced and seen that the pope and the papal seducers not only err and deceive, but, after many vain instructions from me, are so hardened and obdurate in their unchristian error and ruin of souls, that they not only do not want to be instructed nor taught, but blindly condemn and burn the evangelical doctrine with blocked ears and eyes to confirm and maintain their end-Christian, devilish doctrine.

5) Fourthly, I also do not believe that they have this order from the Pope Leo the Tenth, as much as it lies in his person, I still learn otherwise; whom I also hope that such books burned by 1) me (although his ancestors) do not please himself, and whether they pleased him, I therefore have no interest in it. I also know and have certain information that the people of Cologne and Louvain, who boast that they have the imperial majesty's leave and order to burn my books, are saving the truth; for they have bought such nobles, with many thousand guilders worth of gifts, from some officials.

Fifthly, because by burning books like this, the truth has a great aftereffect.

1) Wittenberger: "before". - The Erlanger notes: "all old prints: before"; but the Jenaer has correctly: "from".

In order to prevent the evil of the common people from becoming delusional, to the ruin of many souls, I have, by stimulating (as I hope) the spirit to strengthen and preserve them, burned the books of the adversaries, again, in view of their unpleasant 2) improvement.

(7) Therefore, let not any man be moved by the high titles, names, and cries of the papal estate, of the spiritual law, of the long-standing custom of these burned books; but listen, and see first what the pope has taught in his books, and what in the sacred spiritual law is poisonous and abominable doctrine, and what we have hitherto worshipped instead of the truth, and then judge freely whether I have burned these books lawfully or unlawfully.

Articles and errors in ecclesiastical law and papal books, therefore they are to be burned and avoided.

The first.

The pope and his own are not guilty of being subject and obedient to God's commandments.

This abominable doctrine, he writes clearly in the chapter Solitae, de majoritate et obedientia, as he interprets St. Peter's word, who says [1. Ep. 2,13.]: "You shall be subject to all sovereigns": St. Peter did not mean himself nor his successors, but his subjects.

The second.

It is not a commandment, but a counsel of St. Peter, since he teaches [1. Ep. 2, 13.] that all Christians should be subject to kings, ididem.

The third.

The sun signifies papal, the moon 3) secular power in Christendom, ibidem.

The fourth.

The pope and his see are not obliged to be subject to Christian conciliarities and orders, Cap. Significasti de elect.

2) "unhöfliche" (so the Jenaer correctly; Wittenberger and Erlanger: "impolite") - not to be hoped for. In Latin: luspavili.

3) Thus the Wittenbergers and the Jenaers. Erlanger: "month". Latin: l'uua.

The fifth.

The pope has full power over all rights in his heart. In ?rolo. 8cxti.

The sixth.

From this it follows that the pope has the power to tear down, change, and establish all conciliation and all order, as he does daily, so that no power nor benefit remains for the conciliis and Christian orders.

The seventh.

The pope had right to demand oath and duty from bishops for their coats, c. Significasti ; contra illud: Gratis accepistis, gratis date [Matth. 10, 8].

The eighth.

If the pope was so evil that he led countless people to the devil with great heaps, still no one should punish him for it, Dist. 40. Si Papa.

This article, if it were alone, it should be enough cause to burn all Pabst's books. What should they not do devilishly, unchristianly, if they hold and teach such an abominable thing impudently? Behold, Christian man, what spiritual law teaches you!

The ninth.

Next to God, the blessedness of all Christendom is in the pope, ibidem; contra illud: Credo ecclesiam sanctam etc.. Thus all Christians would have to perish as often as the pope is evil.

The tenth.

No one may judge the pope on earth, nor judge his judgment, but he shall judge all men on earth. 9. q. 3. c. Cuncta.

This article is the main article, and in order that it may be well established, it is always attracted by many chapters and by the entire spiritual law, so that it seems that the spiritual law is only invented so that the pope may freely do what he wants, give leave to sin and hinder the good. If this article exists, then Christ and his word are down. But if it does not exist, so the whole spiritual right with the pope and chair lies down.

Now he does not exist; for St. Peter says 1 Ep. 5, 5: "You should all be humble toward one another"; and St. Paul [Phil. 2, 3] Rom. 12, 10: "Each one hold the other higher than himself"; and Christ often says: "He who wants to be the greatest, let him be the least" [Luc. 22, 26]. St. Paul punishes Peter, Gal. 2, 11, in such a way that he does not walk rightly according to the Gospel; and Apost. 8, 14, St. Peter was sent out with St. John by the other apostles as a subject. Therefore it is not and cannot be true that the pope is subject to no one, nor is he to be judged; but he is to be subject to everyone and to be judged, because he wants to be the supreme. And the spiritual law, because this is its reason and its whole essence, strives in all things against the gospel.

It is true that worldly authorities are not to be subject to their subjects. 1) But Christ turns and changes this and says: You shall not be like the worldly rulers. But Christ turns and changes this and says: You shall not be like the worldly rulers, and he wants his people's rulers to be subject to everyone and to suffer judgment from them. As he saith Luc. 22:25, 26: "The rulers of the Gentiles are mighty over them: but ye ought not to be so: but whosoever will be chief among you, let him be the lowest." But how can he be the lowest, if he will not let anyone judge him?

If one wants to force Christ's word (as some do) that he should respect the lowest in his heart and not show himself outwardly in this way, then one must also say that he should respect the highest in his heart and not show himself outwardly in this way. And so, either keep both spiritually in the heart, or show both outwardly, that Christ's words may stand.

This is the article where all misfortune has come from in all the world. Therefore the spiritual right, as a poisonous thing, is to be destroyed and avoided. For from this it follows, as it has followed, publicly to all, that no evil can be prevented, no good promoted, and we must continually let the gospel and faith perish.

1) In the original and in the Wittenberg: "Unterern". Latin: inlsrioritnis.

The eleventh.

The Roman See gives power and authority to all rights, but it is not subject to them, 25. q. 1.. That is to say, what he wills is right; but he owes no allegiance to it. Just as Christ says of the Jewish Pharisees, Matt. 23:4: "They lay heavy burdens on men's backs, but they will not touch them with a finger." Against this St. Paul says Gal. 5, 1: "Stand in your liberty, and be not subject to the laws of men."

The twelfth.

The rock where Christ builds His church, Matth. 16, 18, is called the Roman See, dist. 19. cum proxim" suis; but Christ alone is the same rock, 1 Cor. 10, 4.

The thirteenth.

That the keys are given to St. Peter alone, but Christ gives them to the whole church (Matth. 16, 19.) 18,18.

The fourteenth.

That Christ's priesthood was transferred from him to St. Peter, de constit. c. translato. 1) Against this David says Ps. 110, 4 and Paul to the Hebrews [Cap. 7, 17]: that Christ is a unique, eternal priest, which priesthood will never be transferred.

The fifteenth.

That the pope has authority to make law over the Christian church, 25. q. 1. ideo permittente. Against this St. Paul says Gal. 5,13: "You are called to a freedom from God."

The sixteenth.

That he interprets the saying [Matth.16,19.): Quodcunque ligaveris etc. to the effect that he has power to burden the whole of Christendom with his wanton laws, when Christ wants nothing else with it than to drive sinners to punishment and repentance, and nothing at all to burden the other innocent with laws, as the words clearly read.

1) So in all Latin editions and in the German Wittenberg. Jenaer and Erlanger: trmWlatio; the latter notes that this is wrong.

The seventeenth.

That he should not eat meat, eggs, butter, this and that for several days, when he has no power to do so, and should only kindly admonish each person's free will and leave it unrestrained.

The eighteenth.

That he forbade the whole priesthood to marry, thereby increasing much sin and disgrace without cause, against God's command and Christian freedom.

The nineteenth.

That the Pope Nicolaus the Third or Fourth in his final Christian decree, among many evil pieces, puts: Christ has given with the keys to St. Petro and his descendants power of the heavenly and earthly kingdom, so everyone knows well how Christ fled the earthly kingdom [John 6, 15.], and all priests have the keys, but not all emperors are over heavenly and earthly kingdom.

The twentieth.

That he considers the great unchristian lie, that Emperor Constantinus gave him Rome, land, empire and power on earth, to be true and demands, against which Christ says Matth. 6, 19: "You shall not gather treasures on earth"; item, v. 24: "You may not serve good and God at the same time."

The twenty-first.

That he boasts that he is the heir of the Roman Empire, de sent. et re jud. c. Pastoralis; so everyone knows well that spiritual office and secular government do not suffer with each other. And St. Paul teaches [Titus 1,9] that a bishop should wait for the word of God.

The twenty-second.

That he teaches that it is right for a Christian to protect himself against violence by force; against and about Christ, who says, Matth. 5, 40: "Whoever takes away your skirt, let him also have your coat."

The twenty-third.

That the nations may disobey their overlords, and the kings he may depose; as in many places he sets and often does, against and above God.

The twenty-fourth.

That he also will tear all oaths, covenants and duties, made between high and low estates, against and above God, who commanded that everyone should keep faith with the other.

The twenty-fifth.

The pope has the power to discard and change the vows made to God, de vot. et vot. redempt. which is also against and above God.

The twenty-sixth.

Whoever pardons his vow to fulfill the Pope's commandment is not guilty of the vow's crime. Ibidem. That is so much said: The pope is above God.

The twenty-seventh.

Let no one serve God who is legitimate; yet Abraham and many saints were legitimate, and God Himself instituted marriage, without doubt. Thus, the final Christian rises above God.

The twenty-eighth.

That he makes his useless law equal to the gospels and holy scripture; as he indicates many times in the decree.

The twenty-ninth.

That the pope has the power to interpret and guide the holy scripture according to his own will, and that no one may interpret it differently than he wills; so that he sets himself above God's word, and tears it apart and destroys it. St. Paul 1 Cor. 14,30. says: The superior shall give way to the inferior enlightenment.

The thirtieth.

That not the pope from the Scripture, but the Scripture from him have credible continuance, power and honor; which is the main article of one, therefore he, as a right final Christian, deserves that Christ from heaven himself destroy him with his regiment; as Paul proclaimed. In these and similar articles, of which there are countless many more, all are directed to the effect that the pope is above God and man, and that he alone is subject to no one, but to everyone, including God and the angels.

that they themselves also say, his disciples, that the pope is a strange thing; that he is not God, nor is he a man (perhaps the devil himself), now Paul's saying [2 Thess. 2, 3. f.] is fulfilled, when he says: "There shall come forth a man of sins, and a child of perdition, who shall resist, and exalt himself above all that is called a god, by the working of the evil spirit" 2c. When he calls him a man of sin and a child of perdition, he does not mean his person alone, for that would be a small pity; but that his rule is nothing but sin and perdition, and that he will only rule to lead all the world to sin and hell. As can be seen from such articles, and is evident today, that nothing but sin and destruction has come into the world from the pope, and more is coming every day.

(9) They themselves, who hold the spiritual law, though in the corner, have confessed that it stinks of vain avarice and violence. This is also true; and he who does not want to lie must confess this. For if you want to know in brief what is written in spiritual law, listen. It is Summa Summarum:

The pope is a god on earth, over everything heavenly, earthly, spiritual and worldly, and everything is his own. For no one may say, "What are you doing?"

10. this is the abomination and stink, because Christ says about it Matth. 24,15: "When you see the stinking abomination, which makes all things desolate, that it stands in the holy city, of which Daniel said: He that readeth these things understandeth them well," 2c., and St. Paul [2 Thess. 2:4.]: "He shall sit in the temple of GOD (that is, in Christendom), and shall present himself as if he were a god."

(11) That no one, or few people, should have told the pope of such an abomination is not surprising, for it is proclaimed that he will burn all those who oppose him, and will have the followers of all kings and princes.

(12) If the seduction of the end Christ were so gross that everyone would know it, or so small that the kings and great men would not be the most noble in it, then the prophets and apostles cried out and wrote about it so much and so earnestly in vain.

(13) When Christ was on earth, many people who heard his word and saw his work spoke against those who would not let him be Christ: If Christ comes, how can he do more miracles than this one? So now they also mumble. If the final Christ is already coming, what more evil can he do than the Pabst's regiment has done, and does daily? Surely it is not credible, if his regiment were of God, that he should so much corrupt and sin come out of it, and let the evil spirit rule so mightily in it. We do not believe yet, until we are lost, and all too slowly recognize the final Christ.

14. just as from the beginning of all creatures the greatest evil has always come from the best. For in the highest choir of angels, where God worked the greatest, Lucifer sinned and did great harm. In Paradise, the greatest sin and harm happened to the first, best man; after that, Genesis 6:4, the giants and tyrants grew from none but the holy children of God. And Christ, the Son of God, was not crucified except in the holy city of Jerusalem, where he was most honored and did many miracles; and by none but the princes and chief priests and most learned, most holy. And Judas also had to damage none but the apostles. Thus God has not endowed any city on earth with so many graces and saints as Rome, and has done more for her than for any other. Therefore, she, like Jerusalem, must do the greatest harm in gratitude to Him, and give the world the right, most harmful final Christ, who will do more harm than Christ did good before. And so it certainly goes, and all this must happen under the name and appearance of Christ and God, so that no one believes it until he himself comes and illuminates such darkness with the light of his future, as St. Paul says.

15 This article is enough for now. But if someone is a relative of the pope's, and if he is funny, and if he refrains from protecting and defending them, I will explain them to him more clearly.

and raise much more of the same. These should be a beginning of the seriousness; because up to now I have only joked and played with the Pabst's thing. I have started it in God's name; I hope that it is time that it also carries itself out in the same without me. Here I want to understand all the articles, which have been condemned and burned by the endchrist's messenger, now from Rome, in the last bull, as being Christian and true, and as many articles have been imposed on the pope, which are endchristian and unchristian, as many of my articles are condemned. If they may burn my articles, since there is more gospel and well-founded holy scripture in them (which I want to say and prove with truth without glory) than in all Pabst's books, I will burn their unchristian law books much more cheaply, in which there is nothing good. And even if there is something good in it, as I must confess about the decree, it is all intended to do harm and to strengthen the pope in his endchristian regiment; for this none of it is ever kept, above all other diligence, only what is evil and harmful that is in it.

(16) I leave each one his own conceit; I am most moved by the fact that the pope has never refuted with writing or reason anyone who has spoken, written, or done against him, but has always used force, banishment, kings, princes, and other followers, or suppressed, chased away, burned, or otherwise strangled with lists and false words, of which I will convince him with all history. For this reason, he has never wanted to suffer any judgment 1) or verdict, and has always proclaimed that he is above all scripture, judgment and power.

Now it is true that truth and righteousness do not shy away from judgment, that they love nothing better than light and judgment, 1) that they like to be looked at and tried. The apostles gave Apost. 4:19 to their enemies, saying, "Judge for yourselves whether it is right to be more obedient to you than to God"; so certain was the truth. But the pope wants to blind everyone's eyes, to let no one judge, but to judge everyone alone; so utterly uncertain and fearful is he of his cause, and

1) In the original: "Richt"; Latin: judicium.

Handel. And this his mourning in darkness and shunning of the light makes that, if the pope were a vain angel, I could still believe nothing of him. Everyone hates the dark business and loves the light. Amen.

In all this I offer myself [to] stand in judgment before everyone.

Section Six of Chapter Six.

How the German nobility, especially in Franconia, offered Luther protection and security.

A. From the shoe offered by the German nobility Luther.

488 Johann Aurifaber's report on how the nobility accepted Luther.

This writing is found in the Eisleben Collection, vol. I, p. 26; in the Altenburg, vol. I, p. 549 and in the Leipzig, vol. XVII, p. 380.

When in 1520 the pope with his Romanists and bishops, and also with the universities, sat down violently against M. Luther, condemned him as a heretic, and from all quarters sent books and writings against the united man, and also the pope's legates at Cologne at the imperial diet wanted to embitter the new emperor Carol against D. Luther, and demanded that his books, which had gone out of print, be burned by their imperial majesty's edict; but their imperial majesty did not condemn the legates as heretics. Luther, and requested that his books, which had gone out of print, be burned by edict of their imperial majesty; but their imperial majesty did not answer the legates soon, but told them that he would first ask his father, Duke Friederich, Elector of Saxony, what he said about it, and inquire how things stood with D. Mart. Luther's teachings 2c., and thus D. Luther was in great fear and distress, that also the courtiers of the Elector of Saxony wanted to be angry with D. Luther, therefore, that he wrote against the note of the official, or bishop of Meissen, publicly; for Duke George of Saxony took up the same letter harshly, was very angry and raged, therefore stood completely on the fact that D. Martin Luther should have been removed from Wittenberg. Martin Luther would have had to leave Wittenberg and go into exile, was also planning to hide in the country of Bohemia:

God gave Doctor Luther comfort and courage again. For Ulrich von Hütten, a German nobleman and poet, wrote violently against the Pope and proclaimed him to be the Antichrist. So Luther now had a companion, who would stand with him publicly against the pope and storm the antichrist empire.

God also gave Doctor Luther physical protection. For since the Pope and his followers wanted him dead, or even chased out of the German country, Ulrich von Hutten wrote to D. Luthern that Franciscus von Sickingen, also a nobleman living in the Palatinate, offered to house and shelter Doctor Luthern and to protect him against all his enemies.

Therefore Silvester von Schaumburg, a Franconian nobleman, also wrote to Luther, and reported that he and others, theirs being a hundred of the nobility, wanted to protect him against all his opponents; as the same letter follows. This made Doctor Luthern's heart grow fonder, so that he really got into the Pope's wool, and wrote a booklet to the Christian nobility of the German nation, about the Christian state's improvement, in which he treated the Pope as nothing other than the true, right Antichrist.

God thus awakened the nobility to take up Doctor Luther and his teachings, since he otherwise had no comfort or help from princes or bishops; as Franz von Sickingen put him off in a writing, even for the sake of protection.

489 Letter from Silvester von Schaumburg to Luther, in which he admonishes him not to turn to Bohemia, but, since he could no longer live safely in Saxony, to go to him, with the promise that he would raise a hundred of the nobility and, with their help, protect him until the matter was settled. Dated Münnerstadt, June 11, 1520.

This letter is found in the Eisleben Collection, vol. I, p. 26b; in the Altenburger, vol. I, p. 549; in the Leipziger, vol. XVII, p. 380 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 415.

To the highly respected and spiritual gentleman, Martin Luther, teacher of the Holy Scriptures, Augustinian order, at Wittenberg, my special dear gentleman and friend.

My unknown services and friendship before, esteemed, special, dear Lord and friend! I have received from many persons, who have nevertheless also taught and adhered to the learning, that your doctrine and opinion should be founded on the holy, divine Scriptures; but that you should be opposed to disfavored and envious persons, harassed with avarice, which is conducive to idolatry. And even though you refrain from and refrain from divorcing your good opinion by a common Christian calling, or otherwise by the judgment of unsuspicious, understanding, pious men, you should still expect danger to your body, and be caused to associate with foreign nations, and especially with the Bohemians, who do not esteem spiritual, self-willed constraint highly.

But I beg and admonish you in God the Lord, even though electoral, princely, or other authorities want to express themselves against you, rather and rather want to disobey your own spiritual compulsion, 1) that you will not let such deviation and apostasy grieve you, nor will you go to the Bohemians, with whom some high-minded people in times past have received noticeable reprimands and annoyance, and thus have accumulated and increased disfavor. For I, and otherwise, of my own accord, a hundred of nobility, whom I (God willing) want to muster to keep you honest, and to protect you from danger against your repugnants, as long as your good opinion would be disproved and un rebutted by common Christian calling and assembly, or by unsuspicious, reasonable jurists, 2) and you would be better informed, as you have pacified yourselves, for the previous reason of submission. All this I have not wished to leave undeclared to you, as I am willing with unknown services and friendship, to be comforted for this reason. Date Monday after Corporis Christi [June 11], Anno 1520.

490: Letter from Ulrich von Hutten to Martin Luther, exhorting him to steadfastness and caution against secret persecution, and offering his faithful assistance. Dated Mainz, June 4, 1520.

This letter is found in Latin (incomplete) in the Wittenberg edition (1551), tom. II, toi. 485; complete in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 409. German in the Wittenberger (1569), vol. IX, p. 1325; in the Altenburger, vol. I, p. 444 and in the Leipziger, vol. XVII, p. 304. We have retranslated according to the Erlanger Briefwechsel.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Wake up, O freedom!

Ulrich von Hütten, knight, greets Martin Luther, the theologian.

If, as I see it, an obstacle gets in the way of what you are now planning to do there with great courage, I am sorry for that, of necessity, and indeed from the bottom of my heart. We have made some progress here. May Christ help us, may Christ help us, since we are defending what he has instituted, to bring his teaching, darkened by the darkness of the papal statutes, back to light; you with great success, I to the best of my ability. Would God that either all would be so minded, or that those people would of their own free will recognize themselves and return to the right path. They say that you have been banished. How great, O Luther, how great you are, if this is true! For all the godly will say of thee [Ps. 94:21, 23: "They arm themselves against the soul of the righteous, and condemn innocent blood; but the LORD our GOD will recompense them their wrong, and will destroy them for their wickedness." This shall be our hope, this our faith. Eck returns from Rome, richly provided with benefices and money by the pope, as they say. What else? [Ps. 10, 3:] "The wicked boasts of his will of courage", may GOD guide us in his truth Ms. 25, 5.]. And therefore we hate the assembly of the wicked, and sit not with the wicked [Ps. 26, 5. 4.]. But look well about thee, and have both eyes and mind fixed on them. Thou seest, if thou wert to fall now, what a harm would come to all Christendom (publico); for, as for thee.

4) This will refer to Luther's writing "An den christlichen Adel deutscher Nation" 2c. (Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. X, 266), the production of which Luther dealt with at the time.

I know that you are so minded that you would rather die like this than live under any circumstances. I am also being pursued; I will guard myself as much as I can. 1) When they come with force, there will be forces against them, not only equal but, I hope, even superior. Would to God that they despised me! 2) Eck has described me as one who would stand with you, and in this he has not spoken the untruth. For I have always kept it with you in the things that I have understood. 3) But in the past we had no intercourse with each other. For what the same said, that we used to conspire with each other, he lied to please the Roman bishop. Oh about the impudently bad man! But one must see that he is paid what he deserves. You be firm and strong and do not waver. But what do I exhort where it is not necessary? You have me as your accomplice, whatever may happen. Therefore, from now on, you can boldly entrust all your advice to me. We want to protect the common freedom, we want to liberate the long oppressed fatherland! We have God on our side. [Rom. 8, 31. "If God is for us, who can be against us?"] Those in Cologne and Louvain have belittled you; these are those devilish, wretched associations (conciliubula) against the truth; but we want to break through, bravely break through with Christ's help. But it would have been more fitting for them, if a matter had arisen, to judge freely. I have reminded them of this in a certain preface 4) which you will read; Capito will send it. 5) Today I leave for Ferdinand. Everything that I can do there for our good, I will do unceasingly. 6) N. 7) asks you to come to him if you are not safe enough there. He will keep you glorious according to your dignity and bravely defend you against enemies of every kind.

1) This and the preceding sentence precedes the account of Eck in the Latin Wittenberg and German editions.

2) The two preceding sentences are only in the Erlanger.

3) In a letter to Hermann von Neuenar of April 3, 1518, Hütten had still spoken approvingly of Luther and his cause (Erl. Briefw.).

4) In the praslato likri cks uuitats ssslssias soussrvuucka (Erl. Briefw.) addressed to Ferdinand of Austria.

5) The following up to "In Brabant" is missing in all editions except the Erlangen one. - Capito was court preacher in Mainz at that time. - Ferdinand was in Brussels.

6) Smelters did not make a difference.

7) Franz von Sickingen.

theidigen. He has told me three or four times to write this to you. Your letters will reach me in Brabant, and write there. Farewell in Christ. In haste. Mainz, June 4, 1520.

Greetings to Melanchthon and Fach and all the good people there. Once again, farewell.

491 Two letters from Ulrich von Hütten to Melanchthon, dated January 20 and February 28, 1520, in which he asks him to report to Luther that Sickingen is willing to take his side.

From Kapp's "Nachlese," Part II, p. 425.

Translated from the Latin by Joh. Frick.

Ulrich Hütten wishes Philipp Melanchthon salvation.

Perhaps you already know how Franciscus has freed Capnio 8) from the rude boys by force and at my command, which they will leave so gladly that they may also give money for it. But now this brave hero wants me to tell Luther that, if he had to suffer something for his cause and no other means were available, he would only come to him; he wanted to do what he could for him, as he also made every possible effort for Capnio. I do not do this for many urgent reasons; but I write to you with the intention that you remind him that he should honor this patron of his, who freely offers himself so graciously to him, with a letter. Be assured that he will not get through anywhere more safely. What he wrote to the monks I wish you could see. Four days ago I left him in Naustal, where he is staying at present. There, too, I want to take up the cause of Erasmus, who reports to me many distressing circumstances from his enemies; above all, we must steer Ferdinand to our side, for whom Franciscus would like to make himself deserving. Then it will not be difficult to get angry with the godless people. Franciscus is fond of Luther, partly because he seems honest to him and others, and that is precisely why he is so hated by them; partly because one of the Counts of Solms recommended him to him in writing. Just remind him in a hurry that he knows from where he has hope and where he has to save himself. Farewell. From Mainz, 20 Jan. 1520.

8) "Capnio", that is, Reuchlin.

To the highly learned Philipp Melanchthon von Breiten, his much beloved friend.

Hail! It has been a long time since I wrote this letter, but it is only now arriving because those to whom I entrusted it have not handled it carefully. What I wrote from Franciscus, that you should tell Luther, I ask that you tell him soon, so that he will know that I have not interceded in the matter through anyone. It would be too much of a stretch to state the cause. If he makes an effort, it is not necessary for him to look for other help. Here he is doing well. Here, one works so that he can insult all his enemies without fear. I have very important things to discuss with Franciscus. If you were present, I would talk about it. I hope it will not go well with the barbarians who want to throw the Roman yoke on everyone. I am now having conversations printed under the title: Trias romana; likewise: Inspicientes, in which I have very freely attacked the pope and the thieves of common goods in Germany. I have no doubt that you will like them, or at least not entirely dislike them. Above all, remember Luthern. If his cause is still doubtful, let him hasten to Franciscus without delay. On the way he could easily meet me; but I do not know whether I will be here then. For in a few days I must ride away. He will take the way via Fulda, several miles from here, and there he will find out whether I am to be found at the innkeeper of the Ursinā Hostel, zu dem Bären. If he meets me there, I will by all means present him with travel money. Be that as it may, answer me quickly, or send your letter to Fulda, or to the court in Magdeburg to Tillmann Kreych, the prince's court preacher. You will seal the letter and have it delivered to me for my own opening. Be well, February 28, in the Huttian castle of Steckelbergk.

There 1) Balthasar Fach, my old and tested friend, is staying. Greet this man kindly for my sake.

492 Franz von Sickingen's letter to Luther, in which he offers to show him support and favor according to his ability. Cologne, Nov. 3, 1520.

1) That is, in Wittenberg. There, Fach was professor of humanistic sciences. Cf. De Wette, Vol. I, p. 385.

This letter is found in the Eisleben Collection, vol. I, p. 27; in the Altenburger, vol. I, p. 549; in the Leipziger, vol. XVII, p. 381 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 506.

Venerable, esteemed, favorable, dear doctor, and especially good friend! My willing services, and what I am able to do dear and good, are ready for you with all diligence beforehand. I have received your previous and present last letter here in Cologne, have read the same, together with your posted apology and request 2), have also heard the request of Magister Georgen Spalatini, and have also gladly understood that your mind is directed toward displaying Christian truth and adhering to it, and am well inclined to prove to you my support and favor in such matters. I did not want to give you this answer to your letter. For with what I can show you favor, you shall find me willing. I hereby command God, who may order your affairs according to His will. Date Cologne, on the third day of November, Anno 1520.

Franciscus von Sickingen, my hand.

B. How Luther behaved against this offer.

493 Luther's sending of the above (No. 489) Schaumburg letter to Spalatin, with a request, if possible, to have it mentioned in the princely answer to Cardinal St. Georgii, so that they would see in Rome that they would not achieve anything if they took him away from Wittenberg, since there were people in the middle of Germany who wanted to protect him against the papal ban.

496: Luther's Writings: An den christlichen Adel deutscher Nation von des christlichen Standes Besserung.

It is in the 10th part of this collection, Col. 266.

497 Luther's report of the publication of this book to Link, in which he says that this writing against the Pope exposes all the ungodly arts and violence of the papists, and will therefore cause much anger in Rome.

See Appendix, No. 64, § 3.

498 Luther's letter to Lang about the book "An den christlichen Adel" (To the Christian Nobility), in which he calls the papacy the seat of the Antichrist and the pope the man of sin and the child of perdition, and also adds that the book is not entirely disliked by the court. August 18, 1520.

This letter is found handwritten in the Ooä. Oottün. 399, toi. 129d; printed in Aurifaber, vol. I, p. 278; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 477 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. II, p. 461.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To the venerable father Johann Lang, the honest theologian, the temporary 1) vicar of the Augustinians at Erfurt, his superior in the Lord.

JEsus.

Hail! Whether my little book, my dear father, which you call a war trumpet, is so terrible and cruel, you 2) and all others may see. I confess that it is exceedingly full of freedom and impetuosity, yet many like it, and even our court does not entirely dislike it. I cannot say anything definite about myself in these matters. Perhaps I am the forerunner of Philip, whom I will prepare the way for in spirit and in power, following the example of Elijah, by confounding Israel and the followers of Ahab. The one thing hold fast, that the publication of the same was not in my hand. For it was already printed, in 4000 copies, and was sold, and I was allowed to not cause so much damage to our lottery. Therefore, prayer will be needed when something is missed.

Here we are convinced that the papacy is the chair of the true and actual Antichrist, against whose deceitfulness and unworthiness, we believe, everything is permissible for the sake of the salvation of souls. 3) I, for my part, confess that I owe no other obedience to the pope than that which I owe to the true Antichrist. The rest you consider, and do not judge us hastily; there is good reason that imposes this opinion on us.

Philipp is marrying Catharina Krappe, and people are shouting that this is happening at my instigation. I do the man all possible good and do not care about the cries of all; may God turn it for the best. I heartily hate that man of sin and the child of perdition with all his kingdom, by whom 4) nothing but sin and hypocrisy is cherished and fostered. Fare well in the Lord. From Wittenberg, 1520, on the day of St. Agapiti [August 18].

Yours, Brother Martin Luther.

finds? O gracious blessedness! If I loved you warmly before, my Jodoce, I love you a hundred times more because of that now. It is said that they have dealt with it, that, because Martinus is safe by an imperial escort, now you, who also have a part in the ban, are being attacked. O clever plot ! how beautifully the people consider the matter. That is why this assembly will be separated. For I have no doubt that most of the people there will talk with you. If only I could be present and make a tangle in the matter, or cause a disturbance. But it is better to be quiet. May the Lord Christ grant that it may be done, and prevent in every way that violence may not be needed, so that we may not avenge in death those whom we would rather defend in life. Write me something of what is going on, likewise what you hope and fear. But my dear Crotus has still been held back by the unfortunate authorities from putting himself in the desired danger. Oh, if you had carried him off with you, as he would undoubtedly have liked to go; but who should do him violence now? I have hardly been able to write that much, since Bucer quickly departed. Be very well. From Ebernburg, 17 Apr. 1521 in the greatest haste.

500: Hermann Busch's curious letter to Ulrich von Hütten, dated May 5, 1521, from Worms, concerning the Papists' mockery of Hutten's threats, as well as their, and especially the Spaniards', rage against Hutten and Luther's writings at the Diet of Worms, and Aleander's favor with Carl 2c.

From Kapp's "Nachlese," Part II, p. 448.

Translated into German by Johann Frick.

Ulrich von Hütten, the knight, his lover, Hermann Busch.

I wish very much that after your threats the popes would fare worse than they really do. They were terribly afraid of you at the beginning, but now they are not afraid to laugh at you and to take the opportunity to mock you in company (even our people). They go so far in their madness because you, as they speak, only bite and bark. It is easy, they say, to have as an enemy one who tries to harm only with words and not with blows. But what is the use of these constant threats, which are only

Wind go? How long is it going to go on like this? How long will it continue to pull itself through? Well, he begins to thunder once, if this ineffective cloud is to do its work. Your huts can be frightened, but no one can harm you. So, as they speak, his anger and zeal is an empty zeal, which has no emphasis. He writes to Carolum, to the princes, archbishops and to us. He is always threatening, and nevertheless, if he does not make a more important attempt than he has done so far, we are safe. I believe you Germans will have seen for yourselves whether, in the meantime, we have forgiven Hutten's small threats to our duty, or whether we have not rather pushed such threats higher. And we also let ourselves be the more sharply concerned with such things, the more he concerns us with his futile threats. We will not let ourselves be misled by his or anyone else's overcome terrors until we bring our work to completion and bring it before Leo with rejoicing and congratulations. Luther must be condemned, even if it costs a defeat of the Germans, if someone carelessly undertakes to oppose us. I die when they publicly wash and chatter so boldly in the pulpits. The other day a certain Spaniard tore up in anger the annotated bull of Leo, which he had taken from a bookseller; and this having been done, he threw it on the ground and trampled it underfoot in the midst of the muck. Moreover, on the third of May next, a court preacher of Emperor Carl, with two Spanish servants from the said court, gave about 80 copies of the Captivitas Babylonicae to a poor, wretched man downstairs in front of the palace. This would also have happened to the others, if the closest neighbors had not finally jumped to the bookseller's aid and forced the villain to flee with the servants to the castle. I have also seen a certain Spanish horseman with a bare sword pursuing one of our people with such fury that he fell from his horse in front of the door, which the fugitive barely reached, and would not have been able to get up if a German had not come to his aid. And even though there were more Germans around him, no one dared to touch him, not even with a finger. So I learn that we call these people lazy and despondent without reason; they are truly the most despondent of all. Aleander has interfered with Carl in such a way-

The Spaniard is so cautious that he almost never leaves his side, even if princely persons follow him. Every day one sees three or four Spaniards riding through the market on their mules, and everyone has to avoid them, or he is ridden down. Thus we are chased around the whole market; nevertheless we keep quiet about it and give in. That is all our freedom. Do you think you can help them, what are you waiting for? For Carl to leave? Waiting for that seems to many to be too slow, until those get to safety against whom one should primarily take revenge, and who most of all have offended German freedom, and who have also been most obnoxious to Luther and yourselves. I mean the apostolic nuncios, which, if you let them leave Germany unscented, most of the good hope and desire of many will fall away, my dear Hutten. Therefore, take care that they at least do not all get through without harm, so that one cannot say that these threats of yours were completely in vain. If one has to announce war to the Curtisians, as they are commonly called, one must start with them, who, as they are not Germans, are mortal enemies to them and do them all harm. I fear that if ours, who are going to Rome, are persecuted daily, this will cause more bitterness than honor, because they have gone out through no fault of their own. Therefore, I would rather that vengeance should fall on them than on our people. Be that as it may, it is to be lamented that up to now you have not cared for your most trusted friends. I am waiting here for the announcement of the Augsburg Edict against Luther and all his followers, with which the popes threaten us with great clamor, and in which the Protestant books as well as the entire Lutheran body are supposed to have been violently attacked. Farewell. Worms, May 5, from Doct. Theobald: House, in haste. Do not take offense at what I have kindly written. 1521.

Luther's report to Spalatin that he had received letters from lodges that were full of zeal against the pope, so that he now threatened to fight papal tyranny with writing and weapons, because the pope had ordered daggers and poison on him, and also wanted to have him captured by the archbishop of Mainz and led bound to Rome.

503 Hartmuth's Christian exhortation to the four mendicant orders, January 25, 1522.

This manuscript and the following three were printed in quarto at Wittenberg in 1522. After that in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 143b; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 63b. In these two editions it is written: "This Christian exhortation to the four mendicant orders was written by D. Martinus, of blessed memory, himself (but in such a way that one cannot easily notice it), as his own handwriting shows, for which reason he also let it go out under another name, namely Hartmut of Cronberg, though not without cause. Further in the Altenburger, Vol. II, p. 84 and in the Leipziger, Vol. XVIII, p. 215.

To the mendicant orders.

Dear Brothers! I, Hartmuth von Cronberg, offer you, the mendicant order, my friendly service, with heartfelt wish of God's grace, and bring to your attention that the evangelical truth and Christian brotherly love, which flows from it, compels me; Therefore, I cannot refrain from giving you a fraternal admonition concerning the clear, pure, evangelical doctrine, which, in these times of ours, shines with a clear, heavenly light, through the highest goodness of God, to us unworthy poor people.

(2) We are to rejoice in such evangelical teachings from the bottom of our hearts and to the highest degree, and we are also to give humble thanks to Almighty God and accept this supreme grace of ours with joy. Moreover, we should also be all the more grateful to God Almighty; item, humble ourselves all the more, because we know that we have not deserved such grace, but must confess that by despising the light burden of Christ, and by accepting the heavy, infallible burden of man, and ways that we have devised in our heads, we have acted contrary to and against the pure, truthful evangelical doctrine; because of which we are worthy of infernal and eternal death, and with our sins deserve that God should have let us die cheaply in our horrible darkness.

3 Therefore, dear brothers, let us take to heart the unspeakable grace that the kind, merciful God has given us, without all of our mis-

The Lord has given us the true way, the beautiful heavenly light, and the heavenly living bread. And in this wholesome doctrine the true way, the heavenly truth, and the shining beautiful heavenly light, and the heavenly living bread, Christ Jesus, are shown pure and clear.

Dear brethren, the doctrine preached by D. Luther is not his doctrine. Luther preached is not his teaching, but flowed from the fountain of Christ. Whoever follows this heavenly teaching does not follow Luther, but Christ. We do not believe D. Luther further and further, because as much as we find founded in the holy Gospel. The holy fathers instruct us that we should not believe or accept their teaching any further than it is founded in the holy gospel. We must confess that we have all strayed far from the true evangelical truth, blinded in our own discretion by contempt for the light burden of Christ. Because of this, God Almighty, how justly, on account of all our sins, has decreed that the devil, through his devilish spirit, has possessed us; therefore we have all erred as the blind. Neither should we be envious or angry with you because of your blindness, and because you have led us beside the true, honest evangelical way. For we have earned such leaders of the blind with our grievous sins and much anger.

(5) But you should not be impatient for us to leave the devilish way and follow the true, straight, evangelical way, which the eternal, merciful God, out of special, undeserved grace, shows us so clearly through Christian doctrine. By God's grace and help, according to St. Paul's teaching Gal. 1:8, we will not let any creature, whether it be an angel or a saint from heaven, tear us away from the true evangelical teaching, and we want to be instructed further, as far as the Christian faith is concerned, on the basis of the holy Scriptures. Christ is the true rock, 1 Cor. 10:4, on which we want to build. But how we have been Christians until now, we may take a certain test by the signs of Christian love, how far such a Christian sign has not been in any state of the world, and each one has sought his own profit and avarice. Thus true, Christian, brotherly love has grown cold in all of us. Therefore I want to admonish you in a brotherly way, that you accept the truth with us, and rejoice in this our common heavenly light, which shines so clearly for our common eternal bliss.

6. want to cast out from you, or a bridle

Put on your monastery brothers, who without any reason of the holy evangelical scripture say that Luther's teaching is heretical and against God. They also say that such teaching is seditious among the common people. But since no one among all scholars has, with some just cause, refuted Doctor Luther's teaching; indeed, even all the high schools that have written against him may have no Christian cause against and against him: thus the truth and the power of the indestructible Word of God will be recognized by all of us the more, and thus will take strong root in us, the longer the more. We will take strong hold of the living, wholesome words of Christ; we will not let ourselves be led away from them by the teachings and laws of men. We will keep in mind that every branch that does not bear fruit in Christ will be cut off and thrown into the fire [Matth. 3, 10, 7, 19].

7 Therefore I exhort you, out of Christian brotherly faithfulness and love, not to despise this most high grace, together with us, lest you and we be reproached, as Capernaum [Matth. 11, 23.] and their like, the high grace of God appeared to them, and they used it evil and wickedly; lest we be numbered among the unholy multitude, which shall be offended in Christ.

(8) I hereby entreat and admonish you not to despise this writing of mine, because such admonition comes from me, as a bad layman. For Christianity is not to be despised by Christians who profess baptism, even if this is said and pronounced by the least creature; lest it be said to us that we have despised the good counsels, because they were given to us by God through lowly persons.

The almighty God has hidden his heavenly wisdom from the wise and witty, and has revealed it to the little ones, Luc. 10, 21. Therefore even the poorest sowerd, who would speak the divine truth 1), should be accepted by us. Why then should we not accept the divine, undoubted truth revealed to us by Doctor Luther, who is full of the holy Scriptures and desires to accept no more of his teaching than that which is founded in the divine true Scriptures and confirmed by the mouth of truth, Christ Jesus? Summa, we do not want to follow the old scribes, gleees and scribes.

1) Thus the Jenaer. Wittenbergers: address.

The only thing that we can be sure of is that we will not follow the methods that Christ clearly illustrates in the holy Gospel, which are completely contrary to Him and to the truth.

10. Christ afflicts Jerusalem, saying [Matth. 23, 37.]: "Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you slay those who prophesy; you stone those who are sent to you. How often would I have gathered thy sons together, as the hen gathereth her little chickens under her wings, but thou wouldest not." How many manifold clear warnings we have in the holy, true Gospel Scriptures of the horrible eternal punishment of all those who do not accept Christ and the true Gospel. Truly, the Promiser, Christ, will be sure of all His promises, rewards and punishments. For even though Christ died for us, he rose again from the dead, reserving to his almighty power the judgment over us of all his pleasure. He will not fail anyone who firmly puts his trust in him. No one who is against his word can abstain from his power.

I have not omitted this reminder out of Christian love, as in brief and in summary, trusting that you will understand and accept it without any other opinion. May the good Christ help you and us, amen.

Date Saturday, Conversionis Pauli [January 25], Anno Domini 1522.

504: Hartmuth von Kronberg's letter to Pope Leo the Tenth. 1521.

This and the two following letters are found in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 247 and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XVIII, p. 217 ff. We have placed this document in the year 1521 because Leo X died on Dec. 1, 1521.

1 Pope Leo, called the Tenth. I, one of the least servants of my Lord Jesus Christ, am moved to write to you out of true Christian love, sincerely wishing you the grace and highest goodness of God. Although I have no doubt that you would consider this a foolish boldness or foolishness on my part, and especially since I have left out your usual title, in view of the fact that all kings and princes of the whole of Christendom are in your hands. kings and princes of all Christendom are subject and obedient to you, in opinion as a governor of Almighty God, and so is your ancestor and your power pervades all Christendom, and you have brought all the people of Christendom under your power and obedience, and you are respected and respected in all Christendom.

held for the head of the whole Christianity. For this reason, it is undoubtedly considered by many to be great foolishness on my part that I, as a poor, foolish man (as I also want to confess myself), dare to write to such an exalted human majesty as you are, and especially because I have left out your exalted title. But, O virtuous Leo! to this letter I am urged by true Christian and brotherly love, and that I hope you will read this my writing before and before you judge, and that you would recognize by the high grace of God that such my writing is truly done out of heartfelt Christian love. And to such I have a comforting hope, for reasons that I have understood from many who walked with you before and before you became a pope, who respected and considered you a virtuous man. Therefore, O Leo, my humble request is that you, for the sake of your innate virtue, hear me, as a servant of God, with patience, for the sake of your salvation. Know that I will be your faithful servant if you will obey our Lord Christ.

2 O Leo, your papacy truly stands on an evil, rotten foundation; the house built upon it may not stand up to the winds and downpours. For this truly stands on the most rotten, most evil foundation, the devil, who is the father of lies. Such things are truly not the word of men, but God tells us these things by His divine mouth, spoken by the prophets, Christ Himself and the apostles; as all these things are made manifest by the supreme goodness of God in these times of ours, so that we poor laymen and children may also see the same things that the disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ saw, to whom He said: "Blessed are those who see the things that you see. Luc. 10, 23.

3 O Leo! if such devilish seduction had its cause and origin only from your ancestors and you, as the popes, there would be no hope that you would obtain some grace from God, but it would be entirely to fear that you would be hardened by the wrath of God into the devil's wickedness until the end of your life.

4. but if the truth is that such devilish seduction has sprung from all men's sins, the abominable and blasphemous sin of ingratitude, that we should have the supreme grace of God, our blessedness (which is given to all of us in baptism), and our salvation (which is given to all of us in baptism).

which supreme blessedness cannot be pronounced by any man, but which grace is unitedly expressed and declared in the Word of God, and is to be understood by the grace of God by every desiring man, and is further confirmed and quite undoubtedly assured by the blood and death of Christ, our Lord God and Savior. Because such our grace and true salvation has been held in such low esteem by us, and instead of the light burdens of our Lord Christ, the heavy burdens of man have been laid upon us by the spirit of the devil, which has possessed us by the doom of God Almighty, because of our cruel sin and blasphemous ingratitude. Therefore, God has justly given us such blind shepherds as punishment. Which shepherds have not tasted God's supreme grace, nor have they prevented their sheep from tasting it, so that the sweetest love for God and our neighbor or fellow man has grown cold in us, and in its place nothing else rules in us but devilish avarice and selfishness.

5 Therefore, O Pope Leo! we do not have cause and reason for vengeance and wrath against you, because we have all been guilty of such punishment with our great sins of contempt for the light burden of Christ; but we should be more inclined towards you with mercy, and fraternally forgive you all unkind, unchristian protection, with the highest gratitude towards our most gracious and mild God; Who our gracious God, out of undeserved mercy, united by His unspeakable grace and goodness, opens our eyes in this terrible darkness of ours, and lets us see and feel our great foolishness, sin and darkness, in this time of grace, so superficially.

O Leo! You should rejoice with us from the bottom of your heart in this true heavenly light, which shines in this horrible darkness of ours. You need no doubt; if you accept this supreme grace from God with a humble spirit, you will recognize yourself as the poorest of men, and call upon God with heart and mind for his divine grace, so that you may depart from your father, the devil, whose place and rule you have possessed under your threefold crown. Consider that your life will not be long. Depart from your lord Lucifer; for his reward is eternal hellish fire, which is also his own fire.

is eternal reward, because of his hope. Our Lord Jesus Christ is so gracious that he accepts you. If you have the grace to recognize yourself in this time of grace, you will be blessed, and will despise and tear apart your devilish pomp and power, and by the grace of God become a true follower of our Lord Christ and St. Peter. You will throw the devil's stink, your devilish spiritual title, and also the hope of the outward affliction with the devilish laws of man into the desolate muck to the devil, where such things completely belong. For if thou shalt not do the same in thy life, then thou shalt be sure that thou shalt be bodily with thy majesty and all thy successors of the devil; this need not be doubted.

O Leo! do not rely on your diabolical power, which God Almighty will not impose any longer than as long as His divine will and good pleasure is. I trust in God, your diabolical power and diabolical darkness, which God has justly imposed on us because of all our sins, will and can no longer exist, because the kind, merciful God, through His faithful servant, Doctor Luther, has led so many countless people of baptized Christians to the true way of Christ, through His Christian teachings, through which a great hunger and thirst for the living Word of God has grown, which still accumulates and increases daily. We have such grace not from our own merit, but unitedly from the overflowing, supreme grace of Almighty God. Therefore, the devil has no hope that his worldly kingdom, the papacy, will last long. The truth shines out superficially; we actually recognize the wolves in sheep's clothing. They cannot bark, according to the command of the Holy Gospel; by their singing and howling we recognize that they are the real wolves, of which Christ warned us; their fruits we have well recognized by the grace of God. In their place, by the supreme grace of God, many good shepherd dogs have come and gone; these can bark rightly, which dogs faithfully guard their sheep from the devilish wolves. The truth takes over, like a horrible weapon river, which cannot be prevented.

8. I hope to God that it means the flood of sin, of which our astronomers say that in the near future there will be a gracious, miraculous flood of sin by the supreme grace of God.

The flood of sin of the blessed water of holy baptism will come upon us, so that it may overflow the whole world, so that all Gentiles, Turks, Jews, and unrighteous people, and all of us, may be drowned in the same supreme grace of baptism, and so that one sheepfold and one shepherd may become one. Oh, what a blessed, grace-filled flood of sin that will be! O Leo, you would not be less blessed than St. Peter, if by the grace of God you still have the power to become a child of God, provided that you make proper use of such grace.

O Leo! resign from your worldly rule and devilish power, hand it over to the youthful emperor Carl; submit to the office of a good shepherd, as Christ teaches you and has commanded you. Take to thee the good shepherds and shepherd dogs, and shepherd thy sheep with the help of the chief shepherd, Christ JEsu. Take to your hand the good shepherd dog, the youthful, high noble blood, our emperor Carl. He is of the right kind; admonish him and shout at him against the Turk; let him be the right leader against the Turk. Try and make peace between the Christian kings and princes through good remembrance. Hand over your wealth to the emperor; follow Christ, as St. Peter and others have done. Do not let your kingdom be of this world, John 18:36. Send out some true bishops to the Turks who preach the word of God, and that such bishops be ready to suffer persecution and death for the sake of the true faith. It is not for you to conquer in any other way than with the mouth and the word of God; for this you do not need to have any treasure or dominion, as all this is clearly spoken and commanded by the mouth of our Lord Jesus Christ.

(10) Truly, if you attack the matter according to Christ's commandment and commandment, it is entirely to be hoped that the true Christian faith will increase greatly and wonderfully through the power of the true, living Word of God. Truly, the Turks are also human beings, they also have hearts of flesh, the grace of God is not denied to them by God. They may also understand the truth by the grace of God, if the word of God is preached to them correctly, they also find reasonable creatures of God and men, they belong to the sheepfold of Christ. If you accept the office of a right shepherd, and if you ask them rightly through right and pious bishops, whom you must take and find from among the good shepherds, who have the living

Word of God loud and pure by the grace of God will well say and preach.

11 O Leo! if the Turks are thoroughly reported, that you, because of and in the name of our Lord JESUS CHRIST, do not seek their gold and riches and your own benefit, but unitedly their eternal blessedness, with attainment of the eternal heavenly goods, and that CHRIST, our Lord, has earned for us all such to take freely, and if we hear the words of Christ, which are full of grace and comforting promise of God, and unitedly believe the same words, we are assured of the eternal heavenly inheritance, of eternal life. Truly, the living word and promise of the true God will surely work in the Turks by the grace of God, if they are told of the strong foundation of our Christian faith. Have no doubt, the Word of God will have its ancient effect.

(12) O Leo, forsake all stinginess, despise all earthly goods, as St. Peter did; let the grace of God, as Christ commanded, be taken freely by every man who desires it; let heavenly goods be your treasure, and do not shut up the same, for the same heavenly treasure may not fail. For as much more of it is given and taken, so much more abundantly does such heavenly treasure of grace flow forth. Truly, the Lord Christ wants his treasure to be distributed abundantly, superfluously, and out of pure grace. He desires and wants nothing else than a true believing heart in Christ, which is his divinely true, living word, the holy gospel.

(13) O Leo, let this be your only concern, that this supreme grace and heavenly treasure be proclaimed throughout the world, and how such heavenly treasure may be so easily obtained and retained by the grace of God through the light and sweet burden of Christ. Be diligent that such things be proclaimed throughout the world.

14 Abstain from useless worries; hand over your rule and temporal wealth to the youthful Emperor Carl, and let him repel the Turks. Do not doubt that the emperor will be strong enough to resist the Turks; and even if he does not hold more than his excellent, male warriors of the Roman and Hispanic empires, he will still be able to resist the Turks sufficiently with the help of God. For it does not depend on the great multitude of the people, but on the Most High, on the grace of God Almighty. Therefore, O Leo, place your concern on the heavenly, living, loud word

God, that this may be preached and proclaimed in all the world. Admonish all people to the most sweet and supreme love for God and their neighbor, in which two pieces the fulfillment of all commandments and the whole foundation of our faith are found, on which it is your duty to place all your care.

There is no doubt that through the word of God, and no other, true faith in Christ can be attained. And even if the emperor and we Christians had slain the Turks half to death, this will not be profitable for the faith of Christ, if the same is not preached purely and loudly, as Christ commanded. For if such preaching were not done better than the Roman papal see has hitherto provided for preaching the word of God, it is much sooner and more certain that many of the Christians will become Turks than that the Turks may come to the true faith of Christ. For no one can attain or have the true faith in Christ, except through the pure, living Word of GOD in the holy Gospel; Christ's office was to preach this. He also commanded the apostles and their descendants that they should have no other ministry than to preach his word. And do not doubt that the emperor will also do him justice, by the grace of God. Therefore, we are all to be highly exhorted to call upon God and ask for His divine grace and mercy, so that through His divine grace, through you, also the emperor, kings and princes, and through all of us, He may create and work that His divine will, praise and honor be for the benefit and comfort of all people whom God has chosen for Him; to this end, God help us, amen.

505 Hartmuth of Kronberg's letter to the inhabitants of Kronverg. 1522. 1)

See No. 504.

1) To all and every inhabitant of Cronenberg, 2) old and young, I wish Hartmuth von Cronenberg the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the knowledge of our salvation. And after the merciful, almighty God has saved us in these times of ours, in our darkness, so by his divine grace, by his heavenly light, the pure word of God, which is Christ himself. Such truly heavenly light has darkened the laws of men and the discretion of men, and led us into a dark fog through their human doctrine and laws, by which we have been prevented for many hundred years from coming to the true knowledge of our one Lord Jesus Christ. He is the only true light, the only way, the truth and the life; he is the only word, the true bread of heaven, in which all our salvation is found; everyone who believes the word (that is, in the promise of Christ) is blessed.

2. According to all this, since we find that we, as the erring ones, are stuck deep and far in the dark fog, and thereby prevented from coming to the unified light of Christ, therefore, out of the highest duty of Christian and brotherly love, and also especially because of this, because I have a special duty to care for you, and more than for others, I have taken upon myself to point out a short and certain way, by which we may, through the help and grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, come out of the dark fog of our ghastly darknesses.

3. Accordingly, our need requires that we confess our sin with a certain mind and heart, and humbly call upon our Savior Christ, that He may show His heavenly, causeless grace to us unworthy of His creatures, and for the sake of His name and glory, remove us from the cruel darkness, and to guide us by his divine grace into his strong, easy, certain and most loving way, and to keep us there forever, so that we may become, be and remain true children of God and joint heirs of our Father's kingdom in heaven.

(4) Dear brothers and sisters, let us take rightly to mind and heart the most gracious brotherhood which we have obtained in baptism. If we would have the grace to bring such brotherhood worthiness into our minds, we would be blessed.

(5) Truly, all the nobility, power and wealth of the whole world cannot be compared to this heavenly brotherhood. For what is the use of temporal wealth, of the most powerful and blissful dominion over all temporal emperors and kingdoms, if it is not established in this heavenly Christian brotherhood? On the other hand, what hinders one from poverty, sickness, or all the contempt of the world, if he is fortified in this heavenly brotherhood?

1) This time is based on the words of Luther at the beginning of No. 507.

2) Kronberg is located in the Duchy of Nassau, on the slopes of the Taunus.

He is a brother and joint heir of the Most High. The Lord of heaven and earth has spurned the riches of this world. He has assured us that everyone who will firmly place his trust and faith in Christ has the power to be a child of God and a joint heir of His eternal judgment. But what man would believe such great, wonderful grace, clearly expressed in the Gospel, if it were not pronounced and promised by the Son of God Himself? Who, because of divine mercy, descended from heaven and became man, for the sake that He might bear and bear our sins, and thereby make us His brothers and fellow heirs of His heavenly kingdom.

I pray to Almighty God to give us grace, so that we may be thoroughly instructed in our highest grace, acquired through Christ, and then, no doubt, the one gracious brotherhood given to us in baptism will be accepted by all of us with all joy and highest dignity, and will be increased and preserved in brotherly love. Therefore, there will be no need to look for other, man-made brotherhoods that have to be bought for money, which are nothing but a seduction.

In order to understand how easily we can come out of our dark mists and devilish darkness through the help of our Lord Jesus Christ, it is irrefutably true that we have a sure and certain path before us, which is indicated to us by God Himself. We want to let the holy fathers and men's writings with the church rituals be as good as they can be, but we cannot deny that we have put too much trust in such things, also in the dear saints' invocations, pilgrimages, and other such things, and have thereby been led into the dark fog. And because we have no commandment from God concerning such things, nor any promise or promise of Christ concerning these works, we should not and will not take these outward works so harshly to heart, as if they belonged to our salvation. To this end, God instructs us through the prophets, through Christ Himself, and through the apostles, that we should not do anything contrary to the word of God, nor should we do what seems good to us or what seems good to men, but what Christ says and instructs us to do, that we should do. Therefore we may tolerate the ceremonies or church ceremonies, as far as they happen, and let them remain, so long (until) we are reported better, but we are not to build anything on it.

8. but to hear the strong foundation on which we may build after all our need, that neither men, nor devils, nor all the floods of sin may not overthrow us, that the words of the strong God, his divine commandments, doctrine, promise and addition, spoken and confirmed by Christ the Lord, are true. "Heaven and earth will pass away, but my words must remain forever", Luc. 21, 33. No one can make us blessed, but the eternal faith in Christ and his word, as this is expressed in many ways in the holy Gospel. No one can know God except through the word of God; only this cancels sin, only the word of God and the teachings of Christ are confirmed by God: "He who believes in the Son", that is the word, "has eternal life", Jn. 3, 16. Only the word of God gives the spirit and quenches the thirst of the soul, Jn. 4, 14. 4, 14. Christ says: "Whosoever shall drink of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall become in him a well of springing water, or fountain into everlasting life." Christ says, "He that heareth my sayings, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation," or into judgment, "but is already passed from death unto life," or passed, John 5:24. 5, 24. Christ says: "I am the bread of life, he who comes to me will never hunger, and he who believes in me will never thirst", Joh. 6, 35. The whole gospel is full of divine grace, promise and teaching. The apostolic sermons and teachings are based entirely on the holy gospel and on Christ; in which alone every Christian, when he hears it, can sufficiently understand what he should do and not do. Summa Summarum, all salvation, all grace and eternal life are united in our Savior Christ. He who builds on the one rock, Christ, on his word and promise, stands firmer than heaven and earth. But he who builds on the laws of men and on their own judgment will have built on sand and ice, and may not stand before the winds and the floods. The evangelist John testifies of the most holy John the Baptist that he was nothing more than a witness of light; the holy Baptist points and points us to the one Christ, the little lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world, saying: He is the one of whom I said, John 1:29.

(9) St. John and all evangelical teachers may point us no further than to the Word, to Christ. No one can enter except through the one gate, Christ Jesus. Therefore, our great need requires that we do not rely on the laws of men. Christ and the holy apostles instruct us to be obedient to the worldly authorities in those things that are not contrary to the Christian faith. In addition, Christ has given us a clear warning against false shepherds, so that we may easily understand and see that the papal rule, as it has been used for many hundreds of years, is the most unchristian on earth. For it is irrefutably true that such a papal kingdom is all worldly and earthly, quite contrary to the life and words of Christ; therefore the same may truly be said, in virtue of the words of Christ, to be a kingdom and regiment of the devil. The greatest wickedness of the devilish seductions of the papal regime may not be sufficiently expressed by man; their fruits have been revealed everywhere by the grace of God.

But to hear the most harmful wolves, which the Lord Christ has shown us in sheep's clothing: they have seduced us all together in a most spiritual appearance, preaching and confirming the papal Antichrist regiment as Christian in all churches, as in a spiritual appearance. This seduction is so glaring, in a good form of sheep's clothing, preached in all Christendom, that it has not been possible to recognize such, but only from the clear warning of God through the prophets, through Christ Himself and the apostles. He who has eyes and ears, let him see and hear; the warning is so clearly written (of) the abominable seduction of the false wolves and shepherds, that we may grasp such things. But the devil has had us so hard in his power, and as to worry that we are not yet completely rid of him. Therefore we have been blind with our seeing eyes. And to this day, the devil takes it upon himself to snatch from us the heavenly light that God gave us by grace, and to lead us into our old darkness. This is what the devil does and works through his devilish shepherds and wolves in sheep's clothing. The ravening wolves were completely unknown to us because of their assumed clothes and their spiritual appearance, and because of our blindness. Praise and thanks be to God that through His grace He made us know their devilish fruit. God alone, through His divine Word and through His Divine, gracious and truthful promise will help us, not by our merit, but unitedly and alone, so that his divine mercy, the power and glory of his divine word will be revealed. Unified by the divine Word, the seduction of Antichrist (which the devil has sown among us all) must be eradicated. God grant His grace that this may be done through an evangelical, youthful way, so that we may all confess our sin and error ourselves and renounce it, all through Christian and evangelical teaching and instruction, so that true, divine, brotherly love may grow in us, from which the false shepherds, the false apostles, and the hooded wolves are far and away in their mummeries. If they want to test themselves, they will find that real, true, Christian signs of true love are not at all with and among them. For if they had loved Christ, they would not have led us so far away from Christ to the laws of men, which are quite far from the way of Christ. The Lord testifies to us: "He who is of Christ hears his voice and follows it," John 10:27. But the wolves in sheep's clothing point to the doctrines and ways of men that lead far away from the true gospel way.

Therefore, dear brothers and sisters, who want to accept the unity of the heavenly brotherhood of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, do not be afraid of this gracious disagreement or discord, which has arisen for the sake of our Christian faith. Let us seek out the true epistles sent to us from heaven, assured and confirmed by the mouth of truth, Christ Jesus, sealed by the blood and death of our Lord and God. If, by the grace of God, we take such a letter into our hands, we must have no doubt that we will find everything in it that is useful and necessary for us, so that we will not miss the heavenly, united, eternal brotherhood, but will be assured and certain of it without any doubt.

Our faith and assurance is easily understood and heard from the Gospel by any desiring reader or listener. The sum and fulfillment of our Christian faith, of all the commandments of our Lord, and by this we become completely pious and blessed, that is, that we should love God with all our strength of mind, body and soul, and our neighbor as ourselves, therein stands the whole sum of evangelical doctrine and commandments. Matth.

22, 37. We may not have such Christian and brotherly love in full by our own strength; only through the grace and proclamation of the Word of God may we attain it, through a firm faith and trust in Christ, and does not require any doubt. Anyone who calls upon God with firm trust and faith, and asks in childlike fear, the heavenly Father will give it to him and will not deny it, as it is so clearly promised to us in many ways in the holy Gospel by the true God. Therefore, St. Paul warns us strongly that we should not believe, that we should call upon the saints and angels and ask them to help us to salvation. For this reason, the Almighty God has promised us so many answers and graces, so that we may have certain hope that God will hear us if we ask with firm trust and childlike fear. And even if one has done the greatest, most shameful wickedness and sins of the world, if he has remorse and sorrow for his sin, and asks with firm trust in God, as in his Father, with a true, good heart, he can have no doubt that he will be heard by God and that his request will be granted, with the assurance that God will give him what he asks for, or something better, according to his soul's salvation. Just as a wise, faithful, kind father does not give his child poison if the child asks for it, but gives him what he knows to be useful and necessary to him, and sometimes, if it is necessary, a good rod. Just as a son is understanding, and knows that he has a wise, faithful father, so the same son is at peace in all things of his father, both in the punishment and in the clemency or kindness of the father. For the son believes that his father knows and is faithful to his child; therefore the understanding son patiently endures all the punishment he forfeits. Why then should we not trust our heavenly Father and his unchanging truth, who promises us freely that we should reckon our sin and wickedness, and he will forget them and remember them no more against us? But we must take care that we also forgive our brother, as we ask in the Lord's Prayer. No one may be afraid of the heavenly Father because of his great sins, as far as he may have the grace to ask for forgiveness with firm trust in God. We have a clear reason for this in the Gospel, Luc. 15, 11. ff, about the prodigal son, and in many other places. God has no pleasure in our seeking pilgrimages and visiting the saints.

We are not to call God because of our sins, but rather, like the prodigal son, we are to go to God immediately and confess our sins to Him. We shall not delay or delay in this; we shall first reconcile ourselves to God, and then work good works toward God and our neighbor through love.

Therefore, let us call and pray to God our Father with such confidence without ceasing. And that we may first of all attain faith and trust in Christ, let us be diligent and earnest, so that we may be fed daily with the bread of heaven, the clear word of God, the clear gospel doctrine. In this same bread of heaven we are unitedly promised and assured of salvation by the almighty Promiser Christ. The holy gospel and the evangelical doctrine, expressed by the holy apostles, instruct us so clearly about everything that serves Christian brotherly love, how each one should conduct himself in his state at all times. From this sufficiently and thoroughly to understand, where we would hear and perceive such with diligence, we will thereby attain blessedness on earth and, after our death, in the heavenly kingdom eternally.

14. want to hear and perceive the most certain way to salvation and the kingdom of god; this is the only, highest, and most certain good work that we can do on earth, that we trust in god and believe according to the words of our lord Jesus Christ. And in that one piece or work Christ has promised us all blessedness. And every person who comes to understand this by the grace of God is truly a child and co-heir with God, and is made righteous by the grace of God. But no one can have such confidence or faith, except through the clear and unambiguous words of Christ in the holy Gospel. For no one can believe the words he does not hear.

(15) Therefore, let us call upon the heavenly, gracious Father to give us grace to hear and hear the word of salvation fruitfully. Against such we want to hear and understand the greatest and most horrible sin on earth, and the greatest dishonor we can do to God Almighty, that is, not trusting or believing in God, letting ourselves be led astray from His ways and words. And all those who despise the gospel (in which the promise of God is understood) or do not listen diligently are guilty of such a cruel sin. But because our salvation stands alone and united in the word of God, that is, in Christ Himself, who is the life-giver of all things, we must not be led astray.

The bread that came down from heaven, John 6:51, as he himself testifies. It is necessary and useful for us to be admonished to direct ourselves to the same, and to take the certain, easy and most lovely evangelical way of our Lord and God before us and to remain on it, and to leave the hard and difficult way of men for themselves in its value, and to put no trust in the ways of men. We want to stay on Christ and his words, so that we can safely and surely walk the next and safest road to heaven, to which our Father, who is in heaven, must draw us, and in whom we therefore want to trust. May the good Christ help us, amen.

506 Hartmuth's letter from Kronberg to Jakob Kobel, town clerk at Oppenheim.

March 6, 1522.

See No. 504.

1. To the respectable, honorable and wise Jakob Kobel, town clerk of Oppenheim, my but good friend, I offer my friendly service to Harmuth von Croneberg, and hereby send you a simple written evangelical exhortation, which I have given to the common people of our Lord Jesus Christ at Cronenberg; Considering that I, in particular, as a co-supervisor of the mentioned village, am obliged, to the best of my ability, to point them to the obedient faith and trust of our Lord Christ in this most gracious time. And even though I realize that I, as a poor, incomprehensible person, cannot produce as much fruit from my writings and admonitions as I would like to do out of the compulsion of true brotherly love, I have not refrained from doing so, regardless of how it is counted to me by everyone. I should be content that God knows my heart and opinion. Moreover, I have no doubt that I have thereby gained the disfavor of many people, whom I would gladly serve with all my ability, for their and all our highest need and benefit. Christian brotherly love teaches us to care for every brother. Why should I keep silent about my brother's illness, since we have a heavenly, almighty, certain physician, the Lord Christ Jesus, who is so willing to heal my illness and that of everyone else? Alone and united

All our strength and health is in confessing our great sickness; and therefore we may well say: O good God! how long will we remain blind, foolish and obstinate? Do we still not want to learn to recognize our unfaithful father, the devil? We have good knowledge of his reward, which he gives us. His reward is eternal hellish fire. If God wanted my admonition to help some, I would admonish all people to confess their sickness with me to the Almighty Physician, who is willing and ready to help us out of all bonds and snares of the devil. The almighty, merciful God has unitedly sent us the heavenly evangelical light out of His grace in these times of ours, by which many people's hearts have been enlightened, by which all the devil's wickedness has been exposed, so that every person may grasp and see it. And we, who should have been the instruments of God, have become the instruments of the devil, which I recognize in part. O a wonderful thing it is! Because we had so great a warning before us, of our enemy the devil's cunning, which we know he, the devil, had used against the human race in so many ways so deceitfully, also the clear warnings by the almighty, kind God, spoken by the prophets, by Christ himself, and the apostles. Such warnings are so clear that no one would want to write them more clearly about the things that have happened. Over all these things the thousand-favored one, our enemy, the devil, has so masterfully crept into us, worked in and through us according to his pleasure. Thereby such a glittering, devil-spiritual seduction of Antichrist was sown among us all, in such a spiritual, glittering appearance, that also, according to the words of God, the elect would have been seduced, if God had wanted to impose it, Matth. 24, 24. But because such deception is revealed in this time of grace, and everyone has the power to tear himself from the devil's bonds, by recognizing our grievous sins, with humble appeal to and trust in the one and only Physician Christ Jesus, and in His divine grace and mercy.

For by the wisdom and ways of men we have come into the strong bonds of the devil. But by all men's wisdom and might we cannot help ourselves out. For if such things were subdued by our wisdom and power, it is certain that the devil, by his cunning, by his hopefulness, and by the way in which we are led, will not be able to help us out.

would still further seduce us by avarice. In this way, it would bring us into a more horrible prison and darkness than we have been, so it is highly necessary for us to be careful of the most cunning enemy of all, the devil. Therefore, we should put our trust in our faithful Lord Christ in this matter, and act according to his command in a youthful, humble way, according to the words and teachings of the holy Gospel. And if we will do this with earnestness and diligence, we may easily overcome our most terrible enemy, the devil, and bring him to all shame through our Lord Jesus Christ. And I have a certain hope of this, since the devil's power and might are nothing else against us, but only deceit and lies, by which he has deceived us until now. But since the Almighty God, through His divine, truthful Word, exposes the devil's wickedness more and more clearly every day, we may well protect ourselves from the devil's lies and wickedness with the help of God, so that neither the devil nor the people who longer desire to follow him, the devil, may harm us. The honor, the glory and the unspeakable grace of God, and His almighty strength and power must be revealed. There we will see the great strength and power of the eternal, heavenly truth, how powerfully the lie must be suppressed by the truth through the powerful, truthful word of God, so that we may fruitfully accept the same and use it in all submission and humility; may the merciful God help us, amen. Hereby commanding you to God. Date on the first Thursday in Lent [March 6]. Anno Domini 2c. 1522.

507 A Missive, Comforting to All Those Who Suffer Persecution Because of the Word of God, by D. Mart. Luther to the honorable Hartmuth von Kronberg written. Mid-March 1522.

This writing was published soon after Luther's return from the Wartburg in Wittenberg in quarto under the title we placed above it. This edition also contains the "Answer of Hartmuth of Cronberg. In the collections: in the Wittenberg (1553), vol. VI, p. 378b; in the Jena (1585), vol. II, p. 78; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 116; in the Leipzig, vol. XVIII, p. 226; in the Erlangen, vol. 53, p. 119 and by De Wette, vol. II, p. 161. Obsopoeus included it, translated into Latin, in his Mart. bilitb. Lpp. karrau.; from this it passed into the Latin Wittenberg edition (1558), torn. VII, fol. 485b and in Aurifaber, vol. II, fol. 100.

They will cast you out of the assembly because of my name [John 16:2]. He who perseveres to the end will be blessed.

JEsus.

1. favor and peace from God our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, be wished to you, favorable Lord and good friend in Christ. I have read and experienced with great joy two of your writings, one addressed to the Imperial Majesty, 2) the other to the mendicant orders, 3) and I thank my God for the favor and gift given to you in the knowledge of Christian truth, as well as the desire and active love for the same. In addition, one senses that your words spring from the heart and fervor, and prove that the word of Christ does not, as in many, hover only on the tongue and in the ears, but dwells earnestly and thoroughly in the heart, so that its nature attracts you, and thus makes you even more joyful and unashamed 4) to praise and confess it, not only with the mouth, but also with deed and scripture, before and against all the world, before such high and wise spirits. But how great and abundant such a gift is, no one can sufficiently move, except he who has the Spirit, who tells us what is given to us, and teaches us to respect spiritual things for spiritual things, as Paul says 1 Cor. 2:12. For it does not go to the heart of animal men.

(2) Therefore I have not failed to visit you in spirit with this writing, and to make known my joy to you. For this I can boast without all lies, that I am not so much offended nor grieved that the pope condemns and persecutes me with all the world, but I am almost strengthened and rejoiced when I hear that a man sows and praises the tender truth. But how much more does it comfort me that I have experienced, and experience daily, that in you and your like they so warmly er-and freely confessed, which God also comforts me with by grace, so that my faith will be the stronger, and I will not have vain sorrow when He lets me see that His word does not go out in vain, as He says in Isaiah 55:11. Again, that all the world opposes it, as He also says in Matthew 24:9: "You must be hateful to all men 1) for My name's sake." So that the way of the divine word is that it has been received most warmly by the few, and most horribly persecuted by the many. Wolves and bears and lions do not pursue it, but men, and "all men," says Christ. What wonder then if the world be full of men, that is, persecutors of Christ? What is the world but full of men! But the Word makes gods out of men, as the 82nd Psalm, v. 6, says: "I have said that ye are gods, and all are the children of the Most High." Which Christ Himself interprets Joh. 10,35. and says: "The Scriptures call the gods, to whom the word of God has happened." And Joh. 1,12: "He gave them power to become children of God, who believe in his name." So it remains: what is man, that pursues God's word and God's children.

(3) But the noble word naturally brings with it a hot hunger and an insatiable thirst, so that we cannot be satisfied, even though many thousands of people believe in it, but would gladly that no man should be in want. Such thirst does not rest and does not rest, and drives us to speak, as David says in Ps. 116:10: "I have believed, therefore I speak. And "we have (says St. Paul 2 Cor. 4, 13.) the same spirit of faith, therefore we also speak," until we press and live everyone in us, and make a cake with us, where it would be possible. But the thirst not only makes a great mistake with his speaking, but is also drenched with gall and vinegar, as Christ was on the cross, Joh. 19, 28. Such thirst had St. Paul Apost. 26, 29, as he desired that everyone would be as he was, except his bonds. Rom. 9, 3. he desires from Christ to be banished for the sake of his brothers, the Jews.

1) De Wette: "ugly". The original, the Mitten, berger and the Jenaer have our reading.

4 Behold, such thirst for brotherly blessedness have ye now also received, for a sure token of a fundamental good faith. What, then, is inferior, but that you must wait for gall and vinegar, that is, blasphemy, shame and persecution, for the sake of your thirsty speech? There is no other way, where Christ is, there must be Judas, Pilate, Herod, Caiphas, Annas, and also his cross; or is not the right Christ.

(5) Therefore we do not grieve because of our affliction, but because of the affliction of those who persecute us, since we have enough for ourselves, and are sure that they will not harm us, but the more they rage, the more they 2) must destroy themselves and promote us, as St. Paul says Phil. 1, 28. For who can afflict us, if we have such a Lord, who has death and the life of all adversaries in his hand? [Rom. 14, 9.] and speaks so comfortingly into our hearts, Joh. 16, 33.: "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." They threaten us with death. If they were as wise as they are foolish, they should threaten us with life. It is a mocking, shameful threat that Christ and his Christians are threatened with death, when they are the masters and victors of death. It is as if I wanted to frighten a man by bridling his horse and making him ride on it.

006 But they believe not that Christ is risen from the dead, and is the Lord of life and death; he is with them still in the grave, even in hell. But we know, defy, and rejoice that he is risen, and that death is no more, but an end of sin, and of himself. For the life in this flesh still clings to and in sins, and cannot be without sin because of the flesh. Therefore, the Spirit that began in us cries out: Come, death and the last day, and put an end to sin and death, amen, as St. Paul writes Rom. 7, 18. 19. and Cap. 8, 22. 23.

7. such joy and gladness in Christo

2) The words: "the more they" are not in the Wittenberg and De Wette, but in the Jena.

do not recognize the wretched enemies, and are angry with us for telling them about it and offering it to them, wanting to kill us for the sake of life. Oh God! Christ's almighty resurrection is too much of a greater defiance than that he should be made timid and cowardly by their instant violence of brazen and paper tyranny. One of them is mainly the pale waster N., 1) defies heaven with her high belly, and has renounced the gospel; also has it in mind that he wants to eat Christ like a wolf eats a mosquito; also makes himself believe that he has not bitten a little scratch into his left spur, and rages along before all the others. I have prayed for him with all my heart, and have almost taken pity on his horrible run-up, but I worry that he has long deserved his sentence.

8) I pray that you will commend him and yours to the Lord, just as we are obligated to be favorable to the adversaries from the heart, even if they do not want to 2) suffer that they are favored, whether he might be saved from the mouth of the dragon at some time or other, and give a Paulum for a Saulum. For we are not helped by the destruction of such wretched people. I would have admonished you to do the same to him, but I would not have let the sanctuary be thrown to the dogs, nor the pearls to the swine, Matt. 7:6, for there is no hearing nor hesitation, for I know nothing but prayer to do for him. He corrupts many souls, and gathers him treasure for the day of wrath, which is great, Rom. 2, 5. But I put this in your spirit. We want to live, whether they kill us or do us all harm.

(9) But something even harsher has recently happened to our faith. Satan, who always mingles with the children of God [Job 1:6], played a fine game for us, especially for me, at Wittenberg, and once atoned for the adversaries' lust for us, and shut us up.

far open to blaspheme the gospel. All my enemies, together with all the devils, how close they have come to me (many times), they have not yet touched me, as I am now touched by ours, and must confess that the smoke bites me badly in the eyes, and almost kills me in the heart. Here I (thought the devil) want to take Luther's heart and weaken his stiff spirit; he will neither understand nor overcome this grip.

(10) I wonder if this will not be done to punish some of my most noble patrons and me. My patrons because, although they believe that Christ has risen, they are still groping with Magdalene in the garden after him, and he has not yet ascended to the Father (John 20:17). But for me, that I might serve good friends at Worms, lest I should be seen to be too stiff-necked, I subdued my spirit, and did not make my confession harder and stricter before the tyrants; though the unbelieving heathen have since time arrogantly reproached me in answering. They judge as pagans (as they are) should judge, who have never felt either spirit or faith. My same humility and reverence has repaid me many times over.

(11) But be it as it may, whether it be sin or well done, therefore undaunted and undaunted. For as we do not despair of our good deeds, so we do not despair of our sins. But we thank God that our faith is higher than our good deeds and sins. For the Father of all mercies has given us to believe, not in a wooden Christ, but in a living Christ, who is the Lord over sin and innocence, who can also raise us up and keep us, even if we fall into a thousand and a thousand sins every hour; there is no doubt in my mind. And if Satan tempts us still higher and worse, let him not tire us before, but let him attack such a one, that he may tear Christ down from the right hand of God. Because Christ remains seated above, we also want to remain lords and rulers over sin, death, the devil and all things, so that nothing can be done about it.

12. we know that he who raised him from the dead is strong and faithful enough [Apost. 5,

1) Duke George of Saxony. The latter had also referred it to himself. Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, 490. - In the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. IV, p. 49, the incorrect proof is: "Walch, IX, 169."

2) "also" is missing in the Wittenberg and De Wette, but is in the Jena.

30, 31] and has set at his right hand to be a Lord over all things, without doubt also over sin, death, devil, hell, but keep silent about the papist swine bladders with their three rustling peas. They shall not take away our defiance; but as long as defiance remains with us, let us cheerfully despise them, and see if they will devour this Christ as easily as they think, and put another in his place, of whom the Father knows not. Therefore, I hope that this Christ will not only set us right, but also turn it to our advantage, according to the abundant riches of his wisdom and goodness, especially if you also ask for help and trust.

(13) Our thing is not yet so far fallen as it was in the days of Christ, when Peter himself denied him, and all the disciples fled from him, and Judas betrayed him, and caught him (Marc. 14:44, 52, 68 ff.). Even if it falls so far, it shall not perish, and our Christ shall not decay. But I know, and am sure, that these things, and whatsoever else may come to pass, are for this purpose, that a common trial and test may be established, whereby the strong may be tried, the weak strengthened, the tried praised, and the false believers exposed; but the enemies, and they that are not worthy to know and to hold it for the word of God, shall be vexed and hardened, as they have deserved.

14. For you know that the sin at Worms, where the divine truth was so childishly spurned, so publicly, wantonly, knowingly condemned without being heard, is certainly a sin of the entire common German nation, because leaders did this and no one persuaded them; so that they are guilty beyond measure before God, that he would completely stop the precious word, or would cause such an uproar that no man would believe it to be God's word, and thus, according to their merit, they would also have to blaspheme and persecute, like devil's doctrine, which they have previously denied and condemned out of loud, free will.

15 Yes, alas, my dear Hartmuth, such merit has the German nation loaded upon itself to serve the pope (at the unfortunate Reichstag); and those who now rage and are obdurate have been guilty of this at that time, when they were driving the little wheel, and had the dice in their hands, and made themselves believe that they were scolding, 1) and that Christ did not see them. O terrible and serious judge, how secret or even horrible are your judgments! How certain and safe is Pharaoh at all times before the Red Sea drowns him, and does not see that his very safety is the right, serious wrath of God against him. O, how grievous is God of the reproach of His precious word, that He has tasted even His dearest child's blood; and men sit and defile 2) and smile when they condemn and persecute it.

(16) So we see that it also happens to the Jews, who, since they condemned God's Son willfully, are given into such a deeply hardened mind that they blaspheme him most surely and boldly and cannot stop, and fulfill the Scripture [Ps. 109:17]: 3) "He did not want benediction, therefore it should come far enough from him. This is what happened to our papists: at Worms they also wanted to hate and blaspheme Christ; now it is given to them that they cannot stop hating and blaspheming, that no plea or admonition helps, but only gets worse. Right is your judgment, heavenly Father. That is, I mean, to have the right St. Vitus dance. God is my witness that I have a fear and worry in my heart, where the last day does not undertake the game, God will cancel his word, and send such blindness to the German nation, and thus harden it, since it is horrible for me to think of.

(17) O Lord, our heavenly Father, let us fall into all sin, if ever we sin; but keep us from hardening, and keep us in him, and in him whom thou hast set a Lord above sin and innocence, that we deny him not, neither let him depart out of our sight; and all sin and death shall be ours,

1) "To scold" here is as much as to joke, to play games.

2) In the Wittenberg "schützen" instead of "schmutzen" in the other editions. The latter will probably be as much as "smirk". In Latin: pro delectatione linUkNUt Niollitor 86 6urnnt68.

3) In the original edition, which Kronberg organized, instead of this citation is: "Schrift, ire. c. viij." The ,Erlanger Briefwechsel Bd. III, p. 309, raises the question: "what does this mean?" It seems to us that the answer to this question is this: Jeremiah Cap. 8.

all hell will do nothing. Ah! what should do us any harm?

(18) But we should thank God with all our heart that he still allows himself to be remembered, as if he did not yet want to cancel the holy word, so that he has given you and others much more of an unruly spirit and love for it. For this is a testimony that they believe not for the sake of men, but for the sake of the word itself. Many are they who believe for my sake; but those alone are the righteous who abide in it, even though they heard that I myself (since God is for) denied and renounced it. These are they who ask nothing of it, how evil, abominable, shameful they hear from me or from ours. For they do not believe in Luther, but in Christ himself. The word has them, and they have the word; they let Luther go, be he a jack or holy. God can speak through Balaam as well as Jesaïam, through Caiphah as well as through Petrum, even through a donkey. I also keep it with them. For I do not know Luther myself, nor do I want to know him; I do not preach anything about him, but about Christ. The devil may take him, if he can; but let Christ remain in peace, and we will remain well.

19 Let us therefore take heed that we be grateful to God, the Father of all mercy and comfort; and let us henceforth establish ourselves, that our faith be not in words, but in power. For St. Paul says in 1 Cor. 4:20: "The kingdom of God is not in word, but in power." It is not enough for us to be able to speak and write finely about it, but life and deed must bear witness to the truth, that we extend our love and charity to friend and foe.

(20) Let us pray, then, first of all, that God may give us and ours more and more strength, and make His dear child Jesus great in our hearts from day to day, so that we may praise, extol, and confess Him with all thirst and joy before the hardened and blinded shepherds of this unrighteous and stiff-necked sect of the papists; and then help to bear such guilt of the common German nation, and pray that God will not look upon the wickedness of the wicked multitude, nor

Let the poor souls be repaid for their wickedness, and do not again withdraw the salvific word, so long suppressed, and do not let the final Christian be imprisoned again, but that at least, as the king Ezekiel asked, peace and truth be in the distant future. Truly, such a request and concern is necessary.

(21) For I fear that the German nation is doing too much, that it will happen to us in the end, just as it is written in the last part of 2 Kings that they killed the prophets until they handed them over to God, and there was no more help. So, unfortunately, I fear that he will also give the German nation its reward in the end. At Costnitz, it first condemned the Gospel, and innocent blood was shed on John Hus and Jerome; then at Worms and Heidelberg on Dramsdorf 1) and many more; item, at Mainz and Cologne; the entire Rhine River is bloody, and does not yet want to be cleansed of the bloodshed, but celebrates the murderers of Christ, the heretics, without ceasing, until God bursts in, and there is no more help. They tempt God too often. Now it is once again condemned to Worms against me; and even if they have not shed my blood, they have not lacked their full will, and still murder me without ceasing in their hearts. You wretched nation! Must you, above all others of the final Christ, be the master of the rod and the executioner of God's saints and prophets?

Behold, how I have run out and overflowed with words. This is what the faith of Christ does, which has been made more difficult 2) in rejoicing over your faith and joyful confession. John must therefore leap in the mortal coil when Christ comes to him, as you see that he has come to me through your Scriptures. Would to God that he would also come to you through this writing of mine, and make not only your John, but also Elizabeth, and the whole house joyful and full of the Spirit, and stay not only three months, but forever. God, the Father of all mercies, grant this, amen.

23 I have nothing special to say about myself

1) Thus the German editions. In the original: "Dranßdorff"; in Latin: OransäorKo.

new newspaper, because that I have now made my way to Wittenberg, 1) whether I could let the devil see something again by the grace of Christ. How long I will stay there, I do not know. I have also resolved to translate the Biblia. This was necessary for me; otherwise I would have died in the error of thinking that I was learned. Such work should be done by those who let themselves think that they are learned. I have attributed to Franzen von Sickingen the booklet on confession, which I hope you will receive, since I was unable to send it. Now there is a piece from the Postill about the Evangelia and Epistles; when it is finished, I hope a Christian will find in it what he needs to know. Greet all our friends in the faith, Mr. Franzen and Mr. Ulrichen von Hütten, and whoever else you are. May God's favor be with you, Amen.

Martinus Luther, D.

508 Hartmuth of Kronberg's Response to Luther's Missive. April 14, 1522.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1553), vol. VI, p. 381 b; in the Leipzig, vol. XVIII, p. 230; and in the Erlangen Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 335.

I wish you, my brother in Christ the Lord, the peace and strength of God, our Savior, from the bottom of my heart. Dearest brother, although I should write to you as I see fit, Father, for the sake of your fatherly proof to all the world, and especially to us poor Germans, whom you have fed with the clear, pure Word of God, and led and guided to the knowledge of our salvation. Therefore, if we had the power to call a father on earth), we would consider you to be a father. But since the Lord Christ declares that we should not call ourselves a father or a master on earth, but rely on our one and only Father who is in heaven, we must also confess him as our one and only Father. The same kind our heavenly Father, certainly by superfluous grace through you, as through his favoured Father, has given us the same Father.

The Father, the Almighty Father, be praised and glorified. To Him, the Almighty Father, be praise and glory.

Accordingly, I consider and respect you as my most beloved brother, for you have highly demonstrated the true brotherly love, in which all commandments are fulfilled, with the works towards all, and especially towards the German nation, and have thereby without a doubt accomplished the will of the heavenly Father, of which you are justly pleased. Therefore you should know that I, by the grace of God, enjoy your and your like brotherhood, which is spurned by the world, more than all bodily brotherhood or all temporal goods. In the help of God, I would rather be spurned and ostracized by the world, with you and others, for the sake of the Almighty Lord and His truth, and suffer what pleases the Almighty Lord, than be excluded from the true Christian brotherhood and from Christ.

3. I am certain that my nobility and wealth, even if I am born of the noblest imperial birth in the world, even if I am lord of all the kingdoms and riches of the whole world, all this is to be counted as a shadow and a nullity compared to the true nobility and wealth of the very least Christian who believes in the Lord Christ and trusts in God with all his heart.

The Almighty God, who made man of the earth, who also gave emperors, kings, princes and lords worldly honor and glory before other men, the same Almighty Lord has done a much greater thing for us by almighty power, by virtue of divine pure gentleness, in that he has given all men who hear and accept his word power to become children of God. To retain such supreme grace, we do not need temporal nobility or wealth, but only that we believe.

5 For it is irrefutably true that all men who hear such a gracious promise and firmly believe Christ are truly noble and rich, because they are assured of the eternal heavenly kingdom. For by united faith in Christ we become truly noble and rich, in an indestructible, heavenly, eternal way, for which reason we are to despise the temporal, earthly, perishable honor and riches that lead us so far away from the true heavenly. In this Christ is a perfect example for us, who spurned all the riches and dominion of the world and wanted none of them.

1) This passage gives clues to the timing of this letter: about mid-March 1522.

2) So the Wittenbergers. Erlanger: to be called.

3) "some" is missing in the Erlanger.

(6) May the kind, merciful God give His grace to our superiors and to all of us, so that we may confess God rightly and also learn to know ourselves, so that we may cast out our pride and avarice from us by the grace of God, since we find that we are so completely unable to do anything good if we do not have the grace of God. For if such things are not confessed and attained with true humility, there is no hope but that all who persist in cruel hope will fall horribly, like the devil Lucifer and his company. May God grant us His grace for the sake of His mercy, that we may awaken from the sleep and prison of sins, and come by the help of God in this time of grace, to suffer and work what God wills.

Dearest brother, after I had written this opinion to you and wanted to decide further 1), I first received your writing, which was sent to me by Hansen von Berlipshen, my good friend and brother. And although I know myself to be still far from true perfect piety, I have nevertheless received such writing with a grateful mind towards God and you, as an admonition from the good God, in whom I will place my thorough trust. For although I am full of infirmities and sins, I am not alarmed or afraid because of them; I am content that I am heartily sorry for such infirmities of mine. But I will pray to the good God daily, and trust in Him that He, through His divine mercy, will take away such of my infirmities and the lack of my faith from me, according to His divine will, whichever time pleases Him; 2) which time I will await with patience and good hope. God help me soon, so that I may grow in perfect love towards God and my neighbor, in which I am still greatly lacking. I will confess this to you, as to my brother, with free confession. Hereupon I ask and desire from you, my brother, of whom I believe to be a special servant of God, an absolution for all my committed sins, be they mortal or daily, as God knows them to be guilty of me; for I am sorry for my sins from the bottom of my heart.

Christian doctor and brother, I hear your great pain and cross, because of the fierce love you have for God and your neighbor. For I thoroughly note your great painful contemplation of the misery, 3) wretchedness, and horrible fall of the whole German nation. And you also have such 4) great and high cause, as you have partly reported in your writing. In addition, every common man may well sense your great diligence and earnestness in your (thus manifold) Christian teachings and exhortations, thus bringing divine truth to light with so much great effort and work, and bringing the truth into so many people's hearts through God's help and grace.

(9) Truly, the translation of the Bible will not be and will not be without a great, miraculous effect of God's grace. Truly, it is a great, frightening thing and a heartache to all devout Christians, because of the carelessness of the clear, inexpressible treasure of grace, the clear, heavenly word of God, so abundantly given and assured, which is the highest and most honest thing we may have in heaven and on earth. It is no wonder that a true Christian's body trembles when he considers the misery of how Germany must fall if the merciful God does not enlighten us with grace so that we may confess Him. For if this does not happen by the grace of God, I consider it a terrible and certain punishment in the future, and a miserable fall of the German nation; for we may not lack the clear warnings of God.

God has revealed His divine word and the irrefutable truth to us Germans before other nations. The art of printing, from which the whole world may derive comfort and bliss, was first invented in the German land. We cannot deny that we have the heavenly Scriptures and truth in good, clear German, from which the poorest of the poor can hear and understand his salvation as well as the richest of the rich. We have a certain heavenly teacher that we may not lack, that is the Holy Spirit, who is promised to all of us in common. Whoever calls upon God with confidence for this teacher with a good right heart will certainly have the heavenly teacher. This teacher is able, where he wants, to teach more principles of the Christian faith in one hour than if one had spent ten years at the school in Paris. Anyone who, by the grace of God, desires this teacher from the heart, will certainly have him. Heaven and earth must break before some rightly asking person can be denied this heavenly schoolmaster. It is the promise of the almighty, true, mild God; the mercy and grace of the Lord is great.

1) In the Wittenberg: "bevliessen" - continue.

2) The words: "which time pleases him" are missing in the Erlanger.

11. I would like to speak and speak to the German country: O Germany, rejoice in your heavenly Lord's visitation; accept with humble thanksgiving the heavenly light, the divine truth and the highest welfare; make use of the supreme clemency of God, who by mercy will forgive you your great sin, regardless of your great contempt; do not burden yourself further, but throw off from you the heavy yoke of the devil, and take upon you the sweet yoke of Christ; as he himself has said: "For my yoke is sweet, and my burden is altogether light." And make thee no ado in such things. But where thou shalt further despise thy visitation, the devil shall possess us all the more, and shall harden us in our wickednesses. Truly, all who willfully despise such a gracious visitation will have a severe judgment from God. Sidon and Tyre will find more favor with God than these; their punishment on the Day of Judgment will be more severe than that of Sodom and Gomorrah; they will have much less excuse before God than Lucifer and his company.

Therefore, let us call out heartily: O merciful, mild God, we confess that we are greatly in debt and have sinned, and that we cannot help ourselves by our strength, art and reason, for in You alone, O Lord God, stands our only hope; But help us by thy grace to confess thee the only helper, and that we put no trust in ourselves or our works, but first make us righteous in a strong faith and trust in thee and thy divine promises alone, that thy divine, supreme name, grace and mercy may be magnified, praised and glorified in all the earth. Help us to confess that all your grace and gifts are pure mercy. Thou bearest our sin, undeserved by us, which thou shouldst justly punish with eternal hellish chastisement, and givest us eternal life in addition. So it has pleased your almighty

We are pleased that you have shown us, your poor, unworthy human creatures, and have demonstrated the virtue of the nature of your divine majesty, the high grace and mercy that you have shown to us, the most unworthy sinners, so that the highest good of your divine majesty may be revealed to us poor sinners, so that we may use this highest grace according to your divine praise and the salvation of our souls forever. This, dearest brother, we ask God to help us with strong trust; likewise, we also want to call heartily to God.

(13) O heavenly Father, because you are eternal and almighty God, the power of all your creatures is not so mighty that they can force or move you to do something by themselves. Therefore, all human request and effect would be in vain, if you yourself had not moved in your infinite goodness and mercy, and had thereby provided, and so much gracious promise had done. Forasmuch then as thine eternal, only begotten, beloved Son, JESUS CHRIST, whom thou hast heard us call, hath commanded that we should ask, and promised, if we ask, that we shall receive; and whatsoever we ask of thee, his heavenly Father, in his name, that thou wilt give us: so we draw from such thy given grace a boldness to ask thee, and a strong confidence of thy granting; and on such ground we beseech thee, O heavenly Father, in the name of JESU Christ, in which name all knees are bent, heavenly and earthly, as Paul teaches, that thou wouldst keep thy instrument, our brother Martinum Luther, in thy divine spirit, that the end of his work may work and exalt thy divine glory. And thou, O God, lead him also not into temptation of lifting up, or rising up in the spirit, but deliver him from evil, Amen.

14 And this you, heavenly Father, will not deny us. For if we ask for such a promise and promise, and ask for nothing else, but finally for the increase of your praise, as you know, explorer of the heart, then you will, in praise of yourself, also from your merciful promise, be done for our comfort, and then from your truth, which you yourself are, which does not let you lie, you may not withdraw your grant from us. O heavenly Father, your will be done now and forever, Amen. Date on Monday after the holy Palm Day [April 14], Anno Domini 1522.

509 Hartmuth von Kronberg's appointment.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1583), vol. VI, p. 383 d.

Hartmuth von Cronberg.

1. a distinction of several main articles, drawn from the order of the Almighty King, comforting and acceptable to all emperors, kings, princes and lords of the whole world, and to all warriors on horseback and on foot, and frightening to all hardened enemies of the divine Word of God.

2 Item, especially so 1 the heavenly king promises his war people the service not for a time of months or years, but freely forever.

3. item, the remuneration of the heavenly king is eternal life, and that everyone who surrenders to the service of God shall be accepted as a son in the heavenly, eternal kingdom, so that he may freely use the highest, heavenly treasure, which cannot be dissipated, as his inheritance.

4. item, the wives and children of the soldiers shall all have perfect wages, so that every one, 2) young or old, healthy or sick, rich or poor, who enters into the service of the Lord, shall have his wages so great and certain, at the same time according to the higher faith of each, and trusting in the Lord of his true, undoubted promises.

(5) There shall be no distinction of wages between men of war, whether they be of horse or foot, among emperors, princes, lords, and among the most despised of the poor; for whosoever believeth or trusteth hath; and whosoever believeth not shall have nothing of the heavenly wages, whether he be lord or servant.

(6) For everyone who enters into the service of the Lord with firm faith and trust, his wages will come immediately, and he will be assured of eternal riches, both temporal and eternal.

Item 7: The heavenly captain also wants to stand for every one's harm for time and eternity, to all those who believe and trust in him; and whoever is deficient in faith and trust, he may ask God for it with earnestness and diligence, and faith and trust will be given him according to all his need.

(8) This heavenly King, by his almighty power, will a hundredfold restore to every man all that he loses for his own sake, who believes and trusts in him and perseveres in faith.

Item 9: All Turks, Gentiles, Jews, heretics, and all apostate Christians are required into the service and order of this Lord. Whoever, by the grace of God, will believe and trust in this almighty, true Lord, may enter the service of the Lord and be assured of the eternal kingdom. Whoever will do this, may not regret it. For all the power and wealth of the Turkish emperor, and even if he would bring the whole world under his power and obedience, that God would prevent according to his will, all this is to be counted as small and void, and everything as a shadow, compared to the least, poorest man's salary, who believes and trusts in God.

10. item, the Almighty God promises grace and strength to all and any of His believers against all their enemies, and they will succumb and prevail against the world and the devil, and overcome cruel death by the power of God, without any worry.

11. All men, be they emperors, kings, princes or lords, poor or rich, who will despise the most high and almighty Lord and his words and truth, and will despise such grace, which he alone and unitedly has given us out of his pure clemency and mercy for nothing, and will persevere in their own way out of their own will, they shall know that the Almighty Lord will execute his cruel wrath and justice on them, on their bodies and goods, and will condemn and sentence their souls to eternal hellish punishment; From this all human power and wealth of the whole wide world will protect none.

List of a letter of articles that must be firmly kept by the common Christian warrior house. And whoever would not keep such a letter of articles, he may freely provide that he is to be discarded by the supreme heavenly Lord and Captain.

Item 12: Whoever has surrendered himself to the service of the heavenly, almighty Lord, be he emperor, king, prince, lord or servant, let him forgive all his brothers and comrades-in-arms, as we ask in the Lord's Prayer, so that we may the more strongly resist all God's enemies with a united mind and heart.

1) Wittenberger: "speaks".

2) Wittenberger: "any".

(13) Let every man direct all his works to the love of God and of his neighbor, that these works may be done in every way with the intention of helping and serving his neighbor. For through love of one's neighbor all God's commandments are fulfilled, as St. Paul teaches.

(14) Let every man hear the commandment of God, which is wholly founded on the two articles next mentioned, and beware of all mutinies that may be preached contrary to and contrary to the two articles aforesaid. For when the hooded wolves come to us in sheep's clothing, which the Lord Christ himself has pictured for us, they do not enter through the door, but go into the sheepfold as thieves and murderers, only to slaughter and destroy the sheep. Which thieving wolves proclaim and preach to us the laws and doctrines of men instead of the word of God. They have taken our daily bread, the Word of God, the heavenly food, from us, and have ordained in its place other things that carry money for them, of which we have no commandment or promise from God, thereby miserably murdering many thousands of souls. These are the devilish fruits, in which one may recognize them. St. Paul [1 Tim. 4:1 ff.] has also clearly portrayed these same deceivers in their special clothing and their own sects, and said that they will teach us the difference of food and of days; they will also have an assumed false chastity, and other such things contrary to God's commandment and contrary to the love of one's neighbor. Therefore, let every man beware of these same glittering deceivers, as of the worst enemies of Christ and of all His Christian people, lest he be cut off from the heavenly people by the chief captain.

Resolution of this appointment.

(15) That every man may be absolutely sure and certain of all things which are contained in these articles of the order, which have been foretold: Know ye that these things are confirmed and ratified by the word of God, and by the death of Christ, sealed with his blood. Heaven and earth will pass away, but the words of the Lord must remain forever. Let every man be hereby exhorted, that he be not put off reading or hearing the true, whole order of Christ the Lord, even the holy gospel, through and through. In the same, let each one read these excerpted articles, and much more.

He will be able to bring himself more clearly into his full understanding by the grace of God. Also, how he should conduct himself in all ways against friends and enemies, actually find report, and thereby truly achieve eternal victory; all through the help of the supreme heavenly captain, who wants to help and overcome the same on every servant's call, in all action and distress, against all enemies; no one should have any doubt about this.

510 Hartmuth von Kronberg's warning to the inhabitants of the city of Frankfurt against the false prophets and wolves, which he had publicly posted on the most prominent gate there. March 16, 1522.

From Ritter's "Evang. Denkmal der Stadt Frankfurt am Main," p. 47.

To all and any 1) and prudent and wise, dignified and highly learned as well as strict, hereditary and hereditary mayor, council and court and all inhabitants of the laudable city of Franckfurt, I offer Hartmudt von Cronberg my willing, friendly service, and what I am well able and willing to do for you, my true brothers in Christ the Lord, to know that out of earnest and brotherly love I am compelled to make an effort to shelter you and provide for you from the ravening wolves, of which the Lord Christ warned us at the second day, and the Lord Christ tells us plainly how to recognize the same wolves, and John at the tenth day, how to guard ourselves against the dens who do not enter through the door through Christ, but go up as thieves and murderers, and their styme is not at all the styme of the Lord Christ, but from the devil, then their voice and lere coming with the styme of the holy gospel. They do not seek to woo the sheep with the pure Word of God, but they seek their own profit according to the devil's will, they esteem the poor people against God and His holy gospel, they sell the poor people against God and His holy gospel, they sell the poor people against God and His holy gospel. They sell the holy divine sacraments according to their will. They sell the burial of the dead at the very highest. I have heard from some of your pious citizens how your priest, because of his exuberant, devilish zeal, will not allow you to bury your dead otherwise.

1) In the original: "iyycklichen"; towards the end of this writing we encounter the form: "igcklicher".

The same is true for many devilish practices, which are bought with butter, and when a child's body dies, the dead body must be blessed, and other devilish, unchristian things must be taken into account. Christ speaks to John on the tenth: I am the door, if anyone enters through me, he will be preserved or saved, and will enter and go out and find salvation. A thief does not come, but only to steal and slaughter or kill, I have come so that they may have eternal life and have it in abundance. O Christian brothers! O heavenly citizens! It is high time that we recognize such thieves and murderers, whom the Lord Christ has made known to us in the sheep-pleasers and in their fruits, but these are their devilish fruits, in which they are known to mislead us, not at all according to the Gospel, namely, when they teach us that the poor should give allmussen to the righteous priests and monks, when they teach us to build churches, to make beautiful images, great bells, beautiful paintings, make delicious tabernacles, offer masses, vigils and brotherhoods in their monasteries, and all such unglamorous services that they provide, which are of no use to the poorest, and which are of no use to God, you should know that, Whichever pastor and preacher persists in such opinions and emptiness is truly a ravening wolf, thief and murderer, for which Christ has warned us, the pre-meditated valsche lere is the fruit, whereby one recognizes them certainly and eygentlich. Your pastor of St. Bartholomew 1) has let it be known that it is not known that I, concerning the Christian faith, am screaming; and has therefore a useless concern; Then I know myself free of the grace of God, that my writings have their foundation in the holy Gospel, therefore I do not shrink from them as from the truth, but I am certain that his teachings and actions are contrary to God and his divine cause and Gospel, I will freely confess this to him, and as long as he persists in his error and the same misconduct, a decent Christian may hold him responsible, and protect himself from his and his little sin as from thieving and murderous crimes. I do not wish to behave in this way, so that I may prove my true brotherly love for you with these works. Given under my seal on the Sunday of Reminiscere [March 16] XXII.

511 Hartmuth von Kronberg's letter to Peter Meyer, pastor of St. Bartholomew's in Frankfurt, in which he sharply rebukes him for oppressing Luther's teaching and elevating the papal regiment so high, and also demands that he state his reasons for doing so in the reply to his letter. 9 June 1522.

The following four writings were published together under the title: "Schriften von Junker Hartmuth von Cronenberg wider D. Peter Meyer, Pfarrherr zu Frankfurt, sein verblendet, verstockt und unchristlich Lehr betreffend, samt zweyer Gegen-Antworten desselben Pfarrherr 1522. See von der Hardt uut. Uütüsr., Theil II, p. 100. They are found in Ritter's "Evang. Denkmal der Stadt Frankfurt am Main", p.81ff.

1. to you, the parish priest of St. Bartholomew in Franckfurt, I send my greetings to Hartmut von Cronbergck, and I invite you to hear how I have reported and explored, to what extent we have suppressed the true Christian sinner Dr. Martin Luther's sins on all the grounds of the Holy Scriptures. The truthful Christian Luther's sins are unreservedly suppressed. Against the princely authority and regiment, we must raise so high that we consider all those heretics who follow the Christian Doctor Martino or his evangelical teachings, and do not want to consider them Christians, but those who are obedient to the prince and his commandment and live, to which our word and public sermon give irrefutable testimony.

Now that I am heartily desirous that the Almighty God is my witness, that I would gladly be a true Christian, and that I may suffer brotherly and Christian reassurance from anyone, of whatever standing he may be, and that I may gladly and expeditiously receive it from the least of these. Because you are a pastor of your great, noble city of Franckfurt, and in my opinion, you have proven the great dishonor of the Gospel and the clear Word by your false, devilish and humanly conceived teachings, which you unashamedly preach in public and thereby lead the entire people of the public city of Franckfurt onto the wrong path.

3. we also do not want to allow a proper evangelical preacher to preach with your permission, and especially on the day of Pentecost we do not want to allow a Christian preacher, whom I sent to Franckfurt, to preach; but because you as a pastor of the city of Franckfurt have the cause and reason for your opinion and public preaching to say, as St. Peter preached, I request and demand of you out of Christian guilt and guilt that you do not allow a Christian preacher to preach on the day of Pentecost.

1) D. Peter Meyer, as can be seen from the following writings.

It is my duty to point out to me, with evangelical reason and holy divine scripture, on what grounds we should believe or obey the papal rule, since it is clear and evident how the papal rule is not entirely consistent with the gospel, but entirely contrary to it, otherwise I cannot reckon it out, whereas Doctor Luther's teachings and sermon on Christ are entirely consistent, so clear that even children may see and grasp them. But nevertheless I may ask that you teach me better, so that I may find the right door, which Christ John teaches in the tenth chapter. But if you do not know these things, I warn you more carefully that you come to God from your error with us, and confess as your great need requires, because you do not know how long you have time, for truly I warn you, if you fail, you will not be at your best with all those whom you fear.

4. But if you know better, I will gladly listen to your words and teachings in a virtuous way, if you know nothing against it other than human papal authority and the Holy Scriptures, then you will have a bad foundation, the Almighty Creator, who made us from nothing in the first place, in the same almighty God's power we still stand between all times, we want to take the manifold warnings of God through the prophets, through Christ himself and the apostles, because if you shepherds do not soon confess yourselves against God, then your fall with all those whom you fear would be more terrible than the fall of the devil. Read the chapter of Ezekiel in the third and fourth and thirtieth and fifth and twentieth chapters, Matthew in the third and twentieth and many other places. I hereby wish you, out of brotherly duty, the grace of God, that you may use this writing of mine to the best of your ability, together with your written reply, to guide me in this and to know how to keep me to my evangelical duty. Given under my seal on the Holy Monday of Pentecost [June 9] Anno in the fifteenth hundred and two and twentieth.

512 Doctor Meyer's answer to the above letter from von Kronberg, the content of which is that he has never been a hindrance to the word of God, but rather a help to it, and that he does not hope that anyone can say that he would have been able to keep the Gospel alive in the thirteen years that he has been in Frankfurt.

If anyone had preached too much or too little of the gospel, he should be brought before his judge, and he would give an answer. June 11, 1522.

My willing service beforehand, mercy, dear Juncker. Your letter to me on the third day of Pentecost, I have read and well understood, answering to the article that I have mocked a Protestant preacher sent by you on the day of Pentecost, that he is not allowed to preach, I say that I am being wronged, No one has been to me, nor has anyone asked me for it, and I have asked a whole chapter on this day, whether there is anything asked of you, and they have replied to you in your faith and in your oath, no, there is nothing obtained from you, and so on, If you want to accuse me of the one who has brought such matters to my attention, I will speak to you so that you may learn that I am being wronged, and I have never been the one who has hindered God's word, but have always promoted it with words and examples, but that you write to me about my sermons, I have preached publicly before the whole world, and now in my thirteenth year in Frankfurt, and I hope to preach the truth and the holy gospel, which two or three thousand people have heard from me, and I freely confess my preaching before the whole world; But if anyone should think that I have done too much or too little, I have a proper judge, and I may be appealed to, and I will answer. With this good will I am pleased to prove to you. Date on Wednesdays after Pentecost [June 11] Anno XXII.

1. recognizing the mercy and grace of God, I, Hartmudt von Cronbergk, wish you, the parish priest of Sant Bartholomeus zw Franckford. My evangelical and fraternal duty compels me to write to you further on our scripture. The date is Pentecost Wednesday.

First of all, I have the preacher, whom I [sent] to Franckfurt, one sufficient, then it stands with it, as it is well, then nothing is in it. But that you have neglected to answer me, for what reason you have so highly exalted the papal regiment and the commandment and rule of man, and thus to suppress and flatter the irrefutable truth of God. Which may be publicly produced on you, by many people from Frankfurt and elsewhere, who have heard our sermon, therefore I have no sufficiency.

3) Also that you write how you have preached the holy gospel three and a half years between Franckfurt, whereupon I say that you have not preached the holy gospel, inasmuch as Christ commanded it, especially only in your own faith and faithfulness, where it is folkloric. 1) Blessedness and salvation.

4. for this reason, our faith, and that we call you a doctor of the holy creatures, is in accordance with the Holy Gospel and the Holy Scriptures, and is unjustly weak.

5. we may not say with any reason in the Scriptures that the Almighty GOD has given you or anyone else authority to mix the human laws, even the human dreams and good deeds, with the clear Gospel, or to preach them alongside, and to present or compare them with the Gospel.

6. Considering yourselves, if you give a servant an order to execute an advertisement according to the content of a clear instruction, and the same servant would say the word of the order or instruction, but for his own benefit he makes an addition to his master's order and commandment completely contrary, and makes as a whole a reworthy pretence at his master's command against his duty, which he would owe, on all doubt you will not be so grossly reasonable that you will put up with such an evil action from your servant, the servant will not be able to tell you with truth that he has punished his command.

7. in the same way, how can you excuse your evil deeds, which you have publicly committed against God's commandment and his holy gospel until now?

8. we have not all sheared the sheep against God's commandment and wickedly.

But also, which is much greater and heavier, the holy will of Christ has been trampled underfoot.

9 O what great soul-murder have you done in the three and a half years. Consider how severely justice judges a real murderer, therefore considering how much more horrible and unholy are the murders of you and yours, which do not go through the right door, but stand hyneyn as thief and murderer, allyn that you slaughter and kill. I praise God, the All-Mighty, who wants to deliver us from our own and your murderous violence through the knowledge of the good and blessed will of Christ, which we poor and wretched people have no need to practice according to our will by the grace of God, as much as we wish, from which we have learned to recognize our thieving and murderous ways (which Sant Paul also calls the devilish way), which is completely contrary to the way of Christ and sounds like a wolf compared to the way of an honest, right-going herdsman.

10. in your scriptures I have heard how you are to preach the sermon in your old way, and if this is displeasing to anyone, he may take you before your preferred judge for this 2c. 2c. Therefore, I say, we have a clear command from God, if you will confess your error and accept the grace of God, which appears to all of us, and praise you with us to the infinite mercy of God, to which I fraternally invite you, I will gladly accept you for a brother and prove fraternal loyalty.

11. But if you do not do this, I warn you and give you to understand that your opinion and will can not or may not take place, but that your action would be so glorified in the day that all people between Franckfurt may know and hold for true reason, that you are such a valiant advocate, as mentioned above, and that it is in all good conscience to act against you by deed, as much as it is possible to act against a ruthless wolf, a mysterious thief and murderer by words and deeds.

(12) And if you and the others shall plead that such things have been taken or acted against you unjustly, then the said judges shall not only be afraid to give speech and answer before your ordinary judge, but they shall also plead their case before an honorable council and the whole city of Frankfort.

1) This is supposed to mean well: for the blessedness of the people 2c.

The reason for this will be the indestructible Word of God, which is so strong that it will overthrow all eternal foundations, which you may build on the sand.

13 Therefore, I request and ask you once again, as stated in my last letter, to answer me in writing, for I am concerned that if you do not take the right path before the start of the punishment, you will neither be advised nor helped.

14 The Almighty God, who by His grace will take us all out of the devil's spell and rope. Date under my seal on Saturday after Pentecost [June 44] Anno Domini 2c. 2c. in the two and twentieth.

1. Dear Sirs, My devout prayer to God and willing unthreatening service of all fortune beforehand, I do not doubt that your will may have heard, as Harpmann von Cronbergk recently told me, I may not know how, on the basis of the information I have received, Harpmann of Cronbergk has recently sent me a clumsy letter, his status and nature completely unmeasured, to which I have answered him again with a kind, gentle and brief reply. W. knew [from] the copies enclosed here, and thereupon also promised me in my reply that he should, as an understanding, noble, though ungelled, when nobility joins me in my chastisement, have sufficed with a proper reply, and have left me more uncouraged.

2. in addition to the above, he has again sent another even more extensive and serious prayerful letter, the contents of which E. W. I am in no doubt that I have preached here in Franckfurth, and that I will not let anyone else hear the Christian and Protestant emptiness with other worthy learners here, and so that I will be able to read and understand these things, that I would have been presented with this letter by Juncker Harpmann, or, if he did not want to do so, that he would have sued me in the places where this had happened, but he could not have given me a fair trial.

I must therefore expect my damage, and if I will give myself my given emptiness and sermon right before all mercy, I will bear no complaint at all.

515 Ulrich von Hütten's complaint about D. Meyer, in a special letter to the council of the city of Frankfurt. April 1, 1522.

From Ritter's "Evang. Denkmal der Stadt Frankfurt am Main", p. 51.

My sincere greetings and all that I am able to do beforehand, dear, prudent and wise, favorable dear friends. From my childhood days on, and especially since then, I have, through the practice of fortune and misfortune, come to know worldly things, I have, as is generally known, also appeared out of my books and histories, which are publicly read, and have, as much as possible, stopped the confusion that has existed for many years between some of the Holy See's cities and some of the common nobility, and that the two orders, in which the greater power of the German nation lies, would come to an understanding and friendship among each other, therefore I respect this time, when I am forced out of necessary causes, I therefore consider that at this time, since I am forced to do so for necessary reasons, I do not need you for my particularly good reasons, and for which I have taken all good precautions to complain of my concerns, especially for the transcription and preface, in which I excuse myself to you, since I have such a good opinion of myself. I hope you know my mind and heart towards you, etc. And this is the matter, Doctor Peter Meyer, pastor of St. Bartholomew with you.

Although it is painful for any human being, and even for an innocent creature (as we can see in the minutest of them), to have his injuries, and it was within my power to reckon with him, I was nevertheless, but not in 1) pain, that the same thing had happened to me, and that I had further encouragement, which I had in all rights to In, Doctor Peter, when I also offered him to his sent to me at Franckfurth, on the day of the council, until this day, and what he thus offered against me would probably have been shaped by me into a perpetual bequest, half of my person, if only a few days ago he had again torn open and renewed the wounds that had healed themselves in my heart and were already covered with a rumor. By making the pious Christian and religious priest, Mr. Othen Brünfeltz, my servant, as the same at Steynnheim, preach the holy gospel and irrevocable word of God out of duty and by virtue of his office, by means of a dense false lie-afflicted accusation, hateful and unpleasant to the princes of the priests and the priests of the church, to such an extent that the pious, innocent man has been threatened with his life and limb by such accusations, as I myself know better than I can write to you, that if he had not been warned by good reasons, he would have been bound and smothered in cruel imprisonment, or even death. When I now see that with him, Doctor Peter, there is forbearance of his wicked deeds and crimes against me and mine, he has also poured into us his imprisoned goods, which he has poured into us on two of the enemies of the human race, from day to day, and all his new actions surpass the older ones in wickedness, but I recognize that I have changed to such an extent that I should have remained unharmed and unenvied by him, so after a long and (I estimate) over-

I have been forced by my lack of patience to put myself in opposition to him, and for this reason, as my especially good friend and friend, my earnest and imploring request is made to you, I beg you to take care of the said Doctor Peters, against me and against others who have been mistreated for a reason, and also that he, by his unchristian, unchristian, and gifted preaching, awakens much strife and discord in our city, which then, where it does not occur through wise people, leads to great trouble and much discontent, He was never to be counted on to reach any end from place to place where he walked, where he could remain peacefully and without arousing civil and internal turmoil and unrest. In as a wolf left in among the sheep, as a heymic giff and penultimate pestilence out of our city, which may not be longer in his beywesen on harm, do and separate, then you can think that would happen to me leydt from a iden the vorter [forer] mere with this of the devil apostles Teyl or had in common, although I would then like to hold you to all love and friendship, something too good in this, it is nevertheless to be considered that even if I stand quietly, it is possible that Doctor Peter, if he thus remained with you, would inflict eternal harm or disaster (which God forbid). I did not want to hold this against you in my good opinion. I am heartily willing to prove my love, friendship and service to you. Lord Jesus Christ Here, who has chosen to keep peace and love above all other things, also Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Our most gracious Lord's outgoing penal mandates, which you are undoubtedly aware of and have good knowledge of, have made themselves subject to Doctor Luther's damned emptiness, and have decided to do something more evil and to arouse more Christian love, disquiet and revolt, that we, in consideration of the royal outgoing mandates, do not allow, and much less favor, you in Franckfort as a royal city. We have therefore, in the absence of the King, decided to allow us to do so. Therefore, in the absence of our most gracious Lord, our kind and friendly prayer to you is that you, in consideration of our Christian faith, which is not based on any man's synn or reason, but is built on a hard foundation from the word of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, and is indestructible. We also accept the outgoing penal, reported Hartman Mach, because he is to be a spiritual person, from His Majesty the Emperor, to send us down to Meintz instead of and on account of our most gracious Lord, as your right ordinary archbishop, whom we also hereby demand from you, to be warned. We hereby demand that you send him down to Meintz to be warned, to continue his proceedings against him for the sake of his knowledge, and to keep to it, as we have then understood in the same case against those who have attempted to awaken the evil against you, and have done on your behalf, and are obliged and obliged to do in the future, that we want to provide ourselves amicably between you, and to freely complain and settle. But if this does not happen, and the said Hartmann, of his preaching and courageous will, would be allowed by you, either jointly or separately, we hereby protest that we will bring this to your attention and report it adequately, also bring it to the place where it belongs to him, and in all ways know the culprit to you. 517: Some neighboring noblemen, as Marx Lösch von Möhlheim, Georg von Stockheim and Emmerich von Reifenstein, all of them good friends of the Lord of Kronberg, letter of March 13, 1522, under the seal of Kronberg, in which they complain to the council of Frankfurt about the actions against Hartmann Jbach and demand that he be allowed to preach without hindrance. March 13, 1522.

From Ritter's "Evang. Denkmal der Stadt Frankfurt am Main," p. 45.

Our willing and kind service beforehand, honorable, wise, dear lord and friends, we are concerned how the servants of our Lord Jesus Christ, the alleged clergymen in our city of Franckfurth, are resisting to print the pure word of God holy! They are preventing the first evangelical preacher, Mr. Hartmann Mach, from preaching, and are handing out some commandment letters through or from clergymen to mentors, which is the highest wickedness and dishonor against God the Almighty, which they would like to do, who is merciful and gracious, who became man for the sake of the salvation of the poor people, of all the human race, who suffered death for us, and who left his divine word for us in the end, so that all who hear such words are assured of eternal life, if they wish; Such a true divine word does not resist the ravening wolves, the devilish clergy of Franckenfort, to snatch from eternal pious people in Franckenfort, therefore the Lord Christ has well told us that we shall recognize such ravening wolves in the created clauses of or by their fruits. After all this, our true and sincere love for the gospel carries us, therefore we are of the will and mind, with the help of God, to act against the true and wicked enemies of the word of God, as we know ourselves in the faith of the gospel, and as long as they do not turn away from their wicked advocacies; and we want to ask you, as the authorities of the city of Franckfurt, for your help. We ask you, as the authorities of the city of Franckfurth, that you instruct your supposed clergymen and enable them to renounce their un-Christian, devilish interventions and leave room and place for the Christian, evangelical preachers of Mr. Hartmann Jbachen to preach and tell the Lutheran-Gospel truth to our pious people, whom God has redeemed with His own blood, and where the devilish and obdurate clergymen want to persist in their interventions: So we recognize ourselves guilty out of evangelical duty and school, that we must act against them, as against the very worst enemies of the living Lutheran Word of God; and to such we are moved most of all by our love for you and your pious people, therefore we desire and ask of you to know that we and our helper will act out of a guilty evangelical duty against the aforementioned devilish clergyman, in fact against your life and goods, as against the worst enemies of Christ and His Divine Word, for which we therefore commit ourselves to you, the eternal and relatives of Christ.

shall see. Then our opinion stands against you and the eternal pious people no other than to act comfortingly and evangelically, so that [they] may be fed with the living proof, which is God Himself, with us, to the praise of our God and to the comfort of all pious Christians. Then we do not hope that God will let us become so foolish, that we should have his word, which he himself is, underprinted, therefore ask you, as of srommen Christians, a good Beßhriebene answer by gegenwertigen, to judge us according to it. Good luck! Gentlemen, special friend. Yours in reply to our previous letter in the matter of D. Mart. Luther on 17. 1) Nov. We have well received your reply, and gladly see that you, as you report, have carefully presented the matter to the Roman Emperor's Majesty, our most gracious Lord; but since you add what the Emperor's Majesty has decided in this matter, we would recognize from their letter at length, and see what you also consider good that it should be done by us in this matter: On the other hand, we would like you to know that we have received your ratification kindly and graciously; however, we cannot leave it undisturbed that, besides yours, no letter from the Imperial Majesty 2) has come to our hands, so we cannot judge at all of the content of such an imperial letter; but only ask that you take up D. Martin's cause in such a way that force is not needed against his manifold protestations and petitions. For, as they say, after my departure from Cologne, his books were burned in Cologne, as well as in Mainz and other places, which I was least concerned about, partly because Doctor Martinus has protested so often and is still protesting and asking to do everything that he can and must do with God and without detriment to the Christian name, and partly because we ourselves have asked that Doctor Martinus should neither be condemned unheard, nor should his books be burned. 2) This is letter No. 520, the delivery of which, as can be seen from this, has been delayed. On December 20, the Elector replied to it, No. 521.

I hope that His Imperial Majesty will graciously overlook it, and I ask that you interpret this for the best and humbly commend this man and his cause to His Imperial Majesty. By the way, we would have liked to write you something new; only, nothing is known to us at present except that recently people on horseback and on foot invaded Prussia, and are now fleeing and going home scattered. However, we do not know how the deal went and what outcome it had. Above this, an important uprising occurred in Bavaria, so that the citizens fell from the cities, attacked several castles, conquered them and razed them to the ground. As we have heard, this turmoil has also been settled these days. What end this will have is up to God. We have informed you of all this in our favor, and at the same time we ask that you humbly and sincerely commend us to Your Imperial Majesty. Date Alstädt, the 14th Dec. Anno Domini 1520.

The people of the Holy Roman Empire wanted to have them burned here and everywhere else in the Holy Roman Empire. Now the highborn our dear uncle Wilhelm Margrave of Assot and the wellborn our dear faithful Hainrich, Count of Nassau, our governor in Holannnd, have announced to us that your dear friend should be to us that we let nothing happen or be taken against the accused Lütter, who had been interrogated before, and because we want to stop this matter, we request your love with a high lead, that you bring the above-mentioned lutter with you to the next Imperial Diet in Wormbs, so that we may have him there thoroughly interrogated by learned and highly competent persons, and that no injustice or anything contrary to the law may be done to him. However, you should seriously order the infamous Lutter to prevent any further unpleasantness, so that he may not in the meantime write or issue anything against the Holy See or the See of Rome in any way whatsoever. And your love also pleases us to recognize the same in mercy, given at Oppenheim on the xxvijth day of Novemb. Anno Dni 2c. in the xxth our realm of the Roman in the other, and of the other realms in the fifth.

To the Highborn Fridrichen, Duke of Saxony 2c, of the Holy Roman Empire, our dear Oheim and Churfürsten.

521: The Elector of Saxony's answer to the Emperor, in which he gives very important reasons why it would not be a good idea to bring Luther with him to Worms. Date Alstädt, December 20, 1520.

From Cyprian's "Useful Documents," Vol. I, p. 484; also found in Spalatin's Annals, p. 22.

Most Gracious Sir, Your Imperial Majesty's letter, dated at Oppenheim on the eighth and twentieth day of November, I have received here at Alstedt with gracious affection, and have received it in submission. Mayt. indicate in such a letter that the Papal Heilik. Bottschafft Bey E. Kays. Mayt. several times sought with great diligence, Doctor Martinus Luther's books, as in your Mayt. Niederburgun

The High and Well-Behorned Gentlemen, Wilhelm Marggrave zu Arschott 1) and Count Heinrich von Nassau, have reported my request to the E. K. Mt. and because your Majesty would like this matter to cause a lot of trouble and confusion, he would like to put an end to it, so your Lord Mayt. graciously asks me to bring the aforementioned Luther with me to the future Reychtag in Worms. They want to have him sufficiently interrogated by learned and highly competent persons, and they want to make sure that no injustice or anything right is done to him, but I am to make sure that Luther does not, in the meantime, in order to avoid any further proceedings, again shout anything of importance or to the chair of Roma. On this I give your Ke. Mayt. I humbly acknowledge that I have never presumed to represent or be responsible for Doctor Martinus' writing or preaching, nor have I yet done so, but have left him to his own responsibility and submission, as I then have done to others, who have not yet heard him. I have also repeatedly written to others who have come to me on account of my Heyligk. and given them notice of it, but that I have asked the Margrave and the von Nassau to ask the Kr. I have therefore ordered that the truth and whether Luther is mistaken in his writing may be brought to light, then the same Luther has always offered to come forward with sufficient assurance, and to be interrogated by equal, honorable, and unpardonable judges, and where he has overcome with the Holy Scriptures, to be subjected to a submissive examination; As he has then had his request printed in the Lenge, this and nothing else has moved me to petition your Majesty. Mayt. through the petitioners, and also hoped that the matter would then be given peace and order by those who have recovered it, especially because Bebstl. Heyt. The authorities, among others, have let themselves be heard against me, to propose means in the matter, on which I should act, that I also offer to do on the proposal, so the Bescheen. However, I have been told that Luther's books, unhidden and unconquered with the Holy Scriptures, are to be burned at Koln, Mainz and elsewhere, which I had not foreseen, but rather hoped that, if Luther did not want to be regarded, he would be spared. Because then such about me

1) In Cyyrian: "Arsthott".

Please and be the first to ask for this. Heyt. pottschaftt erbierten bescheen, weil ich aus eure Mayt. schreib nit vermerken kann, dass solche verbrennen von eure Mayt. zulassen sei, und Luther vielleicht dargegen auch etwas, bevor dann dies eure Kays. Mayt's letter to me. So it will be difficult for me, as your majesty will only have to consider, to bring Luther with me to the Reichstag, for which reason I also cause to report all this to your majesty, and ask your majesty to keep the whole matter in mind. K. M. with all humility, that E. K. M. would kindly refrain from charging me to bring Doctor Luther with me to Wormbs, and that I refrain from doing so for the reasons stated, not to be displeased, then your Majesty, I am otherwise willing to show all humility, and whether or not it would reach your Kays. Mat. about it, that I should perhaps act something differently in this matter, then as mentioned above, or again the holy Christian faith. I also sincerely ask that this not be granted, since such, whether God wills it, shall never be my will, mind and opinion, but hope that God Almighty will grant me grace that I may, according to my ability, and as much as is in me, faithfully promote that which may suffice to strengthen and strengthen the holy Christian faith, all of which E. Ke. Mat. did not want to restrain me, and only ask your Ke. Mas. want to note all of this from me, which I am obliged to do for the sake of Ke. Mat. I am entirely willing to do so, and command your Majesty to keep me in subjection. Mayt, me in submissiveness as the obedient, Dat. Alstet on the XXth day of December, anno MDXX.

522 Chursachsen's other letter to Arschott and Nassau, in which the arrival of the imperial letter and the contents of the prince's answer to the emperor are also communicated to them and Luther's cause is again recommended. Date Alstädt, December 20, 1520.

This 'letter' is found in Latin in Cyprian's "Nützliche Urkunden", Vol. II, p. 195, with the heading "Chursachsen an eben dieselbe" (Arschott und Nassau); in German in Spalatin's Annalen, p. 18, with the remark placed above it that the Elector furthermore "dem Herr von Schiefers, Obristen kayr. Mat. Cemrer". - Schiefer may well have been the carrier of this letter to Arschott and Nassau.

After I have written to you again in response to your scream, which you did to me in the matter concerning D. M. Luther, I have written to you again that there is no writing from King Mat. my most noble Lord, such as your letter was to be sent to you: As I do not want to keep you now, that a royal letter has come to me here at this time, and has been answered, the date is at Oppenheim on the 28th day of February, which I have received with great honor. Therein mayor. Mayt. state, that the official Heyt. The authorities have often sought Luther's book, as it was published in the Mayan Niederburgundian hereditary lands. The court has also sought to have Luther's books, as they were in the Holy Roman Empire of Lower Burgundy, burned there and elsewhere, and it is assumed what form my request will take in the Holy Roman Empire against Luther. Mayt. against Luther not to allow anything to be fartunemenn or furgeweldigen, furgetragenn. Thereupon mayor. Mayt. requested me to bring the named Luther with me to the Reichstag in Wormbs 2c. How you then know the contents of such a letter. To which kayr. Mayt. I hereby answer, and request my opportunity and plea in the matter, as you also will not behave. And that you will respect my request in this matter, against royal mayor. Mayt. so faithfully, I thank you very much; which I also deserve. And even though I have never taken responsibility for Luther's matters, nor have I yet done so; I nevertheless hoped, especially because the magistrate's office in Cologne has let itself be heard against me by others, to find a remedy in the matter. I should also, if the proposal is made by me, offer to do so, and my request should be granted, that the truth, and whether Luther is mistaken in his case, should come to the day of the meeting, Luther was also not tried, especially because he always offered to come before the merciful and dignified judges 2c. I am, however, informed that Luther's books are in the hands of the royal court before I departed. Before I departed", they were supposed to have been lost in Colnn, Meintz and at other ends, and to have been lost with the Holy Scriptures. Because such things have come to pass, that I am nevertheless at the oppressive request, which has been made to kaye. Mayt. I have received from my side, and on the request of the authorities I have not provided, but rather hoped, where Luther did not want to be considered, that I would be spared. Mayt. schreyben ich nit vermerckenn mag, das solch verbrennen von ihrer Mayt. zulassenn war: So Luther may now have taken action against it again, before the royal decree. Mayt. schreybenn Ihme 1) to come, by which all the thing in weyterung gefurth,

1) According to Latin, instead of: "Ihme" is to lefen: mir.

Then you, the sapientes, have to consider that it would be difficult for me, because such a thing would be furious, to bring Luther with me to the Diet; therefore I have caused you to report all this to your Majesty and to ask your Majesty to spare me at this time. Mayt. to report all this beforehand, and to ask your Mayt. expressly to spare me this time, to charge me to bring Luther with me to Wormbs, and therefore kindly ask you to excuse me, for the reasons I have reported, expressly to your Majesty. Mayt. to the best of my ability, not to take this from me alone. And you should not have any doubts, I will, if God wills, keep myself in this and other matters as a Christian prince is entitled to. And if anyone wants to impose on me, I ask to be excused. Then my will, mind and will is to promote faithfully, according to my ability, that which may reach to the strengthening and strengthening of the holy, Christian faith. I do not wish to hold you to this, and I ask your majesty. Mayt. to give me the utmost care 2c. Date Alstet on the 20th day of Dec. 1520.

C. How the emperor changed his mind and indicated to Chursachsen that Luther should stay at Hanse, and what Chursachsen answered to that.

523 Emperor Carl V wrote to Chursachsen that the Elector should leave Luther at home if he did not want to recant before his departure; but if he did recant, he should not take him further than Frankfurt or its environs, because the Pope had already banned all those who traded or walked with Luther. Karl von Gots Gnaden Revered Roman Emperor, at all times Merer of the Empire.
Highborn dear grandfather and prince. When we recently wrote to you from Oppenheim, how our holy father Babst, by the same message to us, requested to have Martin Luther's books burned everywhere in the holy realm, as then Lolchs had happened in our Lower Burgundian lands, and in such the Wolgeborn Heinrich, Count zw Nassaw, our council,

We have talked with you about your love, how it should be ordered that nothing be done with the said Luther until he is interrogated. Thereupon we begged you to bring the same Luther with you to the riches day, since we want to order learned and high-souled people to hear the same Luther, and then to act according to fairness, so that this matter may be settled, but that he neither write nor let anything go out against the papal sanctity in the meantime. And because we now have a credible report that the same Luther has fallen into the Babst's highest ban and is also coming to the places and ends where he is coming, or is, that there the papal interdict has been made, that all who deal or walk with him are to have fallen into the obscene ban, so that we move that Luther should come here with your love, 1) it may come out of this . . . to the holy realm and the same end, to noticeable miss with foreign nations but may come to pass for this..; And so that this may be prevented, we therefore appeal to your love with an earnest plea that you notify and hold out to the reported Luther that he should revoke all that he has written against the Papal Holiness and the See of Rome, as well as against the laws of the Conciliates, now and in the future, revoke it, and refuse to recognize the reverend sanctity and the Council of Rome, that you then take it with you, but do not bring it here to Wormbs, but leave it at Franckfurt an Mayn, or in another place there, and expect it to be paid for there. But if he refuses to do so and will not do so, then let us stay at home until we have spoken and acted verbally with your love. We shall not do this to your love. And your love does our Christian judgment. Given in our and the holy. Imperial City of Wormbs on the seventeenth day of the month of December in the twentieth year of Christ. Chapter Seven, Section Two.

How the pope sought to thwart the emperor's sincere intention in Luther's cause by repeatedly banning him, but how the papal envoys at Worms sought to thwart the emperor's sincere intention in Luther's cause.

A. The new papal bull of condemnation against Luther, which confirms the previous one.

526 Pope Leo's X. Bull of Condemnation and Banishment, under the title: Damnatio et excommunicatio Martini Lutherei, haeretici et eius sequacium. Dated Rome, Jan. 4, 1521.

This bull is found in cherubim duliar. magn..., torn. I, x>. 618 and in Lünig's "pie. eeel., xars II, p. 376. It arrived in Worms at Aleander on February 10, 1521 (Köstlin, "Martin Luther" [3], vol. I, p. 422).

Leo Bischof, servant of the servants of God, in perpetual memory.

1. it befits the roman pope who, by the power given to him by god, has become the house of

(To restrain the ungodly undertakings of the perverse, who, with a malicious intention, have taken such a course that, ignoring the fear of God, and disregarding the canonical conclusions and apostolic commands, they are not afraid to invent new and false doctrines, and to cause an annoying division in the Church of God, or to encourage, cling to, and assist the scurrilous spirits who strive to tear the unstitched skirt of our Savior and the unity of the right faith) against such and their followers, so that the little ship of Peter does not seem to be left without a governor and helmsman, to use it seriously, and by sharpening the punishments and by other means to dispose of it in such a way (that such despisers, who have been given over to a wrong mind and that their followers do not deceive the poor people by false poems and the same cunning plots and plunge them into the same error and ruin and, as it were, infect them with a plague), also to the greater shame of the damned, to show and publicly announce to all believers in Christ what terrible ban and punishments they are subject to; so that, when they have been thus denounced and made known, they may go into themselves ashamed and contrite, and completely abstain from the forbidden intercourse and fellowship, as well as obedience, of such banished and accursed people, thus escaping divine vengeance and not falling into the same condemnation with them.

2. we have also already otherwise, since some false believers who seek only the glory of the world 2c.

Here, the other narrative is omitted because it is the whole bull (No. 444) indented above.

3. Since, however, as we have heard (although after the posting and publication of the letter), after the expiration of the deadline or deadlines which we have set in this letter (of which we hereby expressly inform and announce to all believers in Christ that they have now expired and run out; some of whom, having followed the errors of the said Martini, when they heard of the same letter and of our orders and warnings, were smitten with the spirit of correction, confessed their errors, abjured heresy into our hands, converted to the true Catholic faith, obtained the grace of pardon according to the power granted to the same nuncios concerning this matter, and the books and writings of the said Martini were publicly burned in certain cities and towns of reported Germany, in obedience to our orders, (which we state with great sorrow and consternation of our hearts), that Martinus himself, as a man "given over" in a wrong mind, not only did not want to recant his errors within the aforementioned period, nor to notify us of such recantation, nor to come to us, but as a rock of offense, still worse than before, he did not refrain from writing and preaching against us and this Holy See and the Catholic faith, and from inciting others to do so; because of which not only he has become a public heretic, but also others of great renown and dignity (who forget their own blessedness, and publicly and manifestly follow this harmful heresy of Martin, and unashamedly encourage, counsel and help him before everyone's eyes, and thereby strengthen Martin in his disobedience and obduracy), as well as others who hinder the promulgation of the said letter, the

The apostle says: "But a heretic man, when he is remembered once and again, avoid, and know that such a man, who sins in this way, is a sinner, because his own judgment condemns him.

(4) So we want such to be joined with Martino and other banished and cursed heretics, and as they follow in sinning said Martini's stubbornness, so they also become liable to the name and punishment that they are called Lutheran and are condemned as such, because their deeds are so denounceable and obvious, and they persist in such a way that there is no need for further proof, warning or demand from them. Which we hereby expressly resolve and declare. And our request is that Martinus and others who follow the same Martino (who remains obdurate in his wicked and damned purpose); likewise those who protect him by war power, cherish him, and by their own or other power in some way dare to support him, and to do and give him advice, help, and assistance in some way, have borne, and still bear, no misgivings (all of whose names, surnames, and status, however high and respectable they may be, are herewith expressly as good as named, just as if the name itself were there, or as it would like to be expressed quite circumstantially at the announcement of this letter), are held to be banished and accursed people, guilty of eternal curses and interdicts, and they and their descendants are considered to have forfeited all honor, dignity and goods, and to be incapable of it, to have forfeited their fortune, and to have been guilty of the vice of offended majesty and other judgments, banishments and punishments, which the canons also impose on heretics, and which are contained in the said letter.

5. We also wish that the cities, provinces, burghs and towns, and all the places in which they may be at the time or to which they may turn, and the principal and cathedral churches, monasteries and other sacred and consecrated places located there, as well as the exempt and the non-exempt, whatever they may be called, 1) be under the ecclesiastical interdict (or common ban); in such a way that, as long as this lasts, no pretext of any apostolic pardon (except in cases which the right to and in the same only with closed doors and with the exclusion of those who are under the interdict and ban) masses or other religious services are held. Which we declare by virtue of this apostolic letter, and declare them banished, accursed, guilty of the interdict, forfeited and incapable, and thus command and order that they be proclaimed as such everywhere, declared, and carefully fled and avoided by all believers in Christ.

6. And that such a great contempt of Martini against God and His Church, and his followers and adherents and other disobedient quite desperate boldness in all things be made rightly known, so that the mangy cattle do not infect the herd and thereby the pure part also falls into ruin: We hereby command, in virtue of holy obedience and under the penalties of the pronounced decree of excommunication, all and every patriarch and prelate of the collegiate churches, chapters, ecclesiastical persons and monks, of all, also of the mendicant orders, whether liberated or not, in all places, that they and all of theirs, if and after they are requested by virtue of this, within three days (one of which we appoint as the first, the following as the second, and the third as the last and final deadline or date and provisional canonical warning) the same Martinum and other exiles, Cursed, declared heretics, condemned and thrown under the interdict, deprived of honor and goods and declared incapable, and those named in the execution of the present letter, in their churches on Sundays and feast days (when the people gather more for worship) with the flag of the cross, They shall publicly display and announce the ringing of the bells, the lighting and extinguishing of the lights, and the throwing of the lights to the ground, and other ceremonies customary in such acts, and shall also order others to make them known, and all believers in Christ to avoid them with the utmost diligence.

7. We also command, to the greater shame of the said Martini and other heretics reported above, their followers, adherents and patrons, by virtue of holy obedience, all and every patriarch, archbishop, bishop and other church prelates, that, as they are set, according to St. Jerome, to resist the schisms, are set to resist the divisions, so now, when necessity demands it, because of their supporting office, make themselves a wall for the Christian people, and not be silent like dumb dogs that cannot bark, but shout unceasingly, raise their voice, and spread the word of God and preach and preach the truth of the Catholic faith against the above-mentioned damned and heretical articles.

(8) Likewise, to all and every ruler of parish churches and rulers of all monastic orders, including the beggars, whether they are already specially 1) liberated or not, likewise, in virtue of holy obedience, that as they are ordered by God to be clouds, so they also cause the spiritual rain to trickle down among the people of God, and to preach joyfully against the articles condemned, according to their bearing office. For it is written that complete love casts out fear.

9. Let you yourselves, and each one of you, willingly and devoutly take upon yourselves the burden of such a meritorious work, and be so diligent in its completion, and so zealous and diligent in word and deed, that from your labor, by divine grace, the fruits we hope for may spring forth, and through our care you will not only be worthy to receive the crown of honor that is due to those who fight in good causes, 2) but you will also earn rich praise from us and from the chair because of your praiseworthy diligence.

10. But since it might be difficult to bring this present proclamation and declaration letter to Martinmas and other such banished and declared heretical people person and presence by hand, because their patrons are too powerful: We wish that the posting and announcement of this letter at the doors of two cathedral or main churches, or only one cathedral and the other of a main church, which are in the said Germany, be arranged by one of our nuncios located there, binding and wearing them in the same way, as well as denouncing and accusing Martinum and others thus condemned and declared guilty in all respects and throughout, as if it had been personally delivered and handed over to them and to each of them in particular.

11) And because it might be difficult to bring the present letters to all the places where their announcement might be necessary, we want and order by the above-mentioned authority that their copy, which is printed with the seal of an ecclesiastical prelate or of one of our above-mentioned nuncios and signed by a public notary, is to be followed.

1) so I read pecutiariiter for xveuniam (Walch).

tario is signed by their own hand, shall be held in all places in the same way as this our main letter (first hand) would be held if it had been shown to them or handed to them.

(12) To which all other apostolic commands, laws and regulations, and everything else that we have already indicated and mentioned in the above-mentioned letter 1), as such things that do not stand in the way of this, should by no means be an obstacle; it may also have whatever name it wants.

Therefore, no one should dare to break this note of our present ordinance, declaration, commandment, decree, will and conclusion in the least, or to pass it over out of impudent boldness. But whoever dares to do such a thing, know that he will surely fall into the disfavor of Almighty God and His holy apostles Peter and Paul.

14. Given at Rome, at St. Peter's, in the year of the Incarnation of our Savior one thousand five hundred and one and twenty (1521), the 4th of January, but of our Papacy in the eighth year.

B. What the Papal Nuncio Aleander zu Wams has done against Luther from the Imperial Diet.

Luther's report to Wenceslaus Link before his journey to Worms, about which, as he had heard from Spalatin's notification, the papal legate Aleander had let himself be heard. End of January or beginning of February 1521.

This letter is found in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 8; in De Wette, vol. I, p. 555 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. III, p. 79. We have retranslated according to the latter.

Otherwise, there is nothing new with us, for I believe that Hutten's letters, which have been published about this matter, are with you. However, we expect news from Worms every day. The papists do not wish my arrival there, but that I simply be condemned and brought to ruin.

Spalatin writes that Aleander dared to say: 4) Even if you Germans, who pay the Roman pope the least money of all, should shake off the yoke of Roman servitude, we will see to it that you kill each other and perish in your blood. He brings this news. I have always said and written that this abomination against us is cherished and cultivated by the Romans. Now see how the pope feeds the sheep of Christ! Farewell. 528: Excerpt from the long speech delivered by the papal nuncio Aleander at the public convention of the imperial estates in Worms, in which he presents the papal bull against Luther in the original, violently disparages Luther, and urges the burning of Luther's books throughout Germany; at the same time, he asks the emperor to leave this heresy matter entirely to the pope, as it is disgraceful for him.

February 13, 1521.

On Ash Wednesday, February 13, 1521, the papal nuncio Aleander held a three-hour Latin speech against Luther before the assembled Diet of Worms, in which he read out many passages from Luther's writings to confirm his statements. In the Weimar archives, in the manuscript of the chancellor D. Brück, there is a summa of this speech in German, which has been printed in Förstemann's "Neues Urkundenbuch", p. 30 ff. From this Seckendorf made an excerpt, which he translated into Latin, nist. I^{Autk.}, Ud. I, p. 149. Frick has now retranslated this excerpt into German in the German Seckendorf, p. 331 ff, and Walch has included it in his edition. Since now the material,

3) On January 16, Luther reports in a letter to Spalatin that D. Henning Göde was hopelessly ill, and on January 21 he mentioned in a letter to Spalatin that he had died. After that our time determination.

4) These words of Aleander are also testified several other times.

which is found in Seckendorf, is sufficient for our purpose, we refrain from the complete reproduction of the text according to Förstemann, and limit ourselves to the correction of what is given in Walch's old edition according to Seckendorf.

Aleander showed the authentic copy of the papal bull against Luther, because, according to his pretence, he had recently heard in Antwerp that it was said that the bull was false, although the bishop of Liège, a highly learned and experienced man in these matters, had exequired it in his diocese. He told how he and his college at Cologne had received an audience with Elector Frederick barely after an eight-day delay, and had received no answer in accordance with his request; but he [Aleander] had said that they wanted to do what the bull demanded, and had received from the archbishop in Cologne that Luther's books were burned. Now, however, a new blasphemy is going around that this has happened against the emperor's knowledge and will, and Luther writes: the papal legates have brought about such a burning of books through money. But he referred to the imperial majesty and its chancellor, whether the orders had been given with their knowledge, or whether they had been bought for many thousands of ducats. He then asked to hear some of Luther's articles, which certainly deserve that 100,000 heretics be burned for them; as the articles in which Hus, even Wiclef, is defended, since he blasphemously pretended that the body of Christ is not truly and essentially present in Holy Communion, and that no Christian is bound to obey the authorities. This is also what Luther teaches in his book on the freedom of a Christian. He also denied purgatory and thus argued against hell, since purgatory had been established in the Concilio of Florence in the presence of Emperor John Paleologus of Constantinople, and at the same time it had been recognized that the pope was the head of the entire Christian church. As proof of this, he pulled out the bull of this Concilii, posed as if he had only now found it, and laid it before the Emperor, which the Archbishop of Mainz then picked up, and showed it with great pomp to that of Cologne and Trier. He [Aleander] added that although some Greek bishops had quarreled with the Roman see, all of Greece had always recognized the pope as the head. Luther had further sinned, as in denial of the purgatory against the subterranean spirits, so also against the heavenly angels, writing: Even if an angel from heaven teaches something different, as he said and wrote, he did not want to believe it. This was a great presumption, because it was not proper for him to speak what Paul had spoken. He sinned against the entire clergy, since he assumed all Christians to be priests in the book of the Babylonian prison. This book had been reprinted in Strasbourg and two dogs biting each other had been printed at the end of the book, as a sign of how the priests were biting the laity. He also rejected all monastic orders and all ceremonies. That is why Hercules gallicus 1) or Lucianus was printed and read in Wittenberg; as he ridiculed all pagan ceremonies, so the Christian ceremonies were also to be despised. Luther had advised in a letter that one should wash one's hands in the blood of the priests. He sinned against the saints, especially against St. Dionysius, whose books de caelesti Hierarchia he despised in his book about the Babylonian prison. He sins against the secular judges, because he says that no one can be punished with death penalty without mortal sin, which is most audacious. He sins against the Concilia, especially the one at Constance, which he calls a devil's cesspool. He [Aleander] has bitten off the articles of free will and indulgences with short words. He is surprised that there are people who pretend that he [Luther] preaches the evangelical truth according to the Holy Scriptures, interpreting them differently than the Fathers and the Church. Others say that Luther is a pious man from whom one has nothing evil to fear. Now he does not want to punish his life, but people are deceived by the devil under the appearance of goodness, and St. Jerome said that heretics are the greatest hypocrites. If he were pious, he would not desire to be more prudent than the fathers and the church. To the objection that Luther's books should not be burned because Origen's books were also kept, who had been noticeably wrong in many things because there was much good in them, he replied that it had always been customary to burn the books of heretics; Origen had not been a heretic, but at the time when he had lived there had been no one to instruct him. He then contradicted those who wanted to claim that Luther had to be heard first and given safe conduct. For Luther would not let anyone, not even an angel from heaven, instruct him; he had been cited by the pope, even with the promise of a safe conduct.

1) We are talking about the book: D Luciano Hercules Oallicus etc.. ^VitteruderMe. Octav, s. a.

but did not appear, he did not want to suffer the Pope's decision, but appealed to a council. He could not stand a council's decision either, but despised it. Accordingly, he asks Imperial Majesty to reject the insult done to their forefathers. This matter, concerning the faith, does not belong to them. The heretic Eutyches had been referred to the pope by the Emperor Constantine. It was not the duty of the laity to judge this matter, and the clergy themselves were not allowed to engage in disputation with heretics without papal permission, which is why St. Jerome refused to engage with John Hierosolymitanus. Thus Luther did not want to accept Pabst's judgment. Therefore, one must strive to prevent heresy from spreading, so that Jews, Turks and pagans do not speak: The Christians disputing their faith, namely the Germans, who are considered pious before others. He therefore asks for a public edict, by which he would be commanded to burn his books, and furthermore not to publish or sell them; if not, then the emperor and the bishops of Mainz, Cologne, and Liège would suffer disgrace because they had these books burned, if the same did not happen in all of Germany. Finally, he also complains that Luther has mistaken him for a Jew: "Dear God," he said, "how many righteous people are here who know me and my family, as I can boast in truth that my forefathers were Margraves of Isterstein in Istria; but that my parents fell into poverty is due to fate. For the sake of my family, I have legitimized myself by becoming a canon of Liège, which would not have happened if I did not come from a high and respectable family; but if I were a baptized Jew, I would not be rejected because Christ and the apostles themselves were Jews.

529 The princely learned councils have raised concerns about the bull of Eugenius IV, which the papal legate Aleander referred to in his speech and from which he wanted to assert the pope's supremacy. February 14, 1522.

How good or static and credible, however, berürte Bull sey, is to be noted.

First, from the fact that they went out in the Concilio in Florence against the Concilium in Bassel.

On the other hand, that such a thing happened in a time of a year, because it was still a 2) Babest, named Felix, who was born at the Duke of Sophoy.

Thirdly, that at the time of the establishment of such bulls the Roman King Albrecht was not present and did not give his consent to the German nation.

Fourth, that no German archbishop or bishop has been present and much less approved.

Fifth, that the seal of the emperor of Constantinople has been either lost or perhaps lost in time.

Sixthly, the bull calls the named Emperor of Constantinople the Roman Emperor, which is what the officials in the chapter venerabilem doctorem refer to as the transfer of the Roman Empire from the Churches, that is, from Constantinople, to the Germans in the person of Emperor Carol.

In the seventh place, this bullet is finished with plain, naked and ungreen words, saying that the Babest is a head of the whole Christendom, on all scriptural evidence and proofs of God's and man's scripture and literature.

Eighthly, we hear that the beasts have found the supposed bulls here at Wurmb, and it is well stated that they have not painted any of the Babest.

What has the Babest to command the emperors, royal princes, 2c., as he has understood himself ethically a hundred years, yes to depose them, and to disown their regalia, 3) if Christ, our Lord, has said that the Babest wants to be the governor, Regnum Regnum meum non est de hoc mundo. 4)

This writing is in the Latin Wittenberg edition (1551), torn. II, toi. 118 A part of it, §§ 12-15, is found in German according to Spalatin's manuscript in Förstemann's "Neues Urkundenbuch", p. 67.

Translated into German.

The Council of one who heartily wished to help both the Roman Pontiff's Highness and the tranquility of all Christendom.

(1) It behooves a Christian to be heartily attached to Christ's governor and to maintain his prestige as much as possible. Again, it is also due to the pope's godliness to hold nothing of what is his so dear that he does not prefer the honor of Christ, his prince and sovereign, to it. And those who hold the pope's honor and prestige in such high esteem must do so with prudence and

Do it with prudence. This happens when one defends it with such reasons that even righteous and pious men can approve. For otherwise no one does more harm to papal sovereignty than he who seeks to protect and preserve it with no other defense than terror and human rewards. Now that one is well disposed against the Christian religion, he also heartily regrets that this noise has been caused by some who have embittered Luther to write out some things more vehemently and freely; and who have stirred up the otherwise gentle heart of the pope to deal with Luther more severely than is perhaps good for the peace and tranquility of Christendom.

2) What Luther writes is now set aside; however, we are reminded to consider not only what is appropriate for Luther, but what serves the peace of the church; for one spares the guilty often and obviously, so that no greater noise arises.

First of all, it is sufficiently evident that the matter arose from an evil beginning, namely, from hatred of scholarship, which is now flourishing again in Germany, and from enmity against the languages, which are now reemerging everywhere, by whose splendor, as they think, their reputation is coming down, since they have hitherto been regarded as learned people without them. Some have done everything to suppress them, and in this they are of a completely different kind than the Roman pope, who has the greatest respect for such studies.

4 After that, as far as Luther is concerned, this misfortune is largely to be attributed to those who preached and wrote such things about indulgences and the power of the Roman pope that no godly and learned man could hear; so that, as far as the beginning of this evil is concerned, one might well think of Luther that he was moved by honest impulse and zeal for the Christian religion.

(5) That he began to write a bit more heatedly afterwards is at least reduced by those who do not otherwise excuse it by saying that he was not induced to do so without cause by some people's irritations and vituperations. They had not even read his books, and yet they proclaimed him to the people as a heretic, antichrist, and a spirit of the rotten. Before the papal sovereignty publicly intervened, no one listened to the man, no one referred to him, although he always offered himself for all disputation, as he still does; he was only always condemned. For the Prieria's answer is found even by the not good that the bull against Luther have acted.

When Eck's disputation was left to the judgment of the Parisian school, those at Cologne and Louvain, who were not charged with anything, came first and only condemned. And since they did it by agreement among themselves, they still do not agree in the articles, and indeed in the most noble ones. Next, the persons through whom the matter has passed are of such a kind that they may reasonably be thought suspect, because their cause was involved. For neither their doctrine nor their life is such that one may turn much to their judgment, especially in so important a matter. The best and most pious people are not satisfied with the way Luther was treated, even if he had written nothing but heretical things. And one is therefore not immediately attached to Luther if one does not approve of the origin and the way of proceeding, just as little as one approves of a murderer who says that he should not be executed until he has been properly convicted and sentenced.

(7) The bull issued against Luther too severely displeases even those who seek to preserve the Roman Pontiff's reputation, because it tastes more of the fierce hatred of some monks than of the sedan chair of him who is the most gentle of Christ's governors, and has nothing at all of the nature of him who has otherwise been so mild and kind. Therefore, it is strongly suspected that there are people who misuse his benevolence and his litter for their own desires. But the more everyone reveres the Roman Pontiff's reputation, the more it is to be seen that nothing comes from him that, according to the judgment of pious people, does not seem to befit him; no prince, be he as great as he likes, has to throw this judgment to the wind.

Moreover, the wider this matter extends and the more dangerous it is, the more diligently one should have seen to it that one did not bluster into the day. Everyone is well aware that the Christian way of life has, through gradual decay, departed very much from the true evangelical teachings of Christ, to such an extent that everyone admits that there is a need for a public and special improvement of the laws and customs. Just as this is not to be attacked thoughtlessly, so one must not bark into the day against those who, out of good instinct, remember one thing and another, even if it seems that they act too freely in this.

9 And if it were true that Luther had been completely wrong, it would have been theological kindness to give the people the following information and if he had been transferred and still did not want to improve, then to deal with him first, as with a corrupt limb. Those who give such advice do not keep it with Luther, but with the theological order and the papal prestige. For in this way Luther could have been completely subdued if he had first been removed from the minds of the people and then from the book halls. Now it is possible to get him out of the book halls to some extent by burning the books, but in the meantime his opinions remain stuck in the minds of many, since one sees that they are not refuted. The good minds of the laymen also have their judgment, which comes mainly from nature, even among the scholars. There are so many learned and also pious people, some of whom are quite honest-minded and hold firmly to the evangelical truth, and yet have found nothing offensive in Luther's writings. Such people want to be taught, but do not want to and should not be coerced. Donkeys can only be coerced, and tyrants know nothing but coercion. 1) Theologians should, at the very least, instruct and teach with all gentleness, but not go about with invective, parties and conspiracies.

(10) And here we must not only consider what Luther deserves, of which I am not judging anything in advance, but only what is most conducive to the peace of Christendom in the present danger. We see that Luther is everywhere regarded as a righteous man, and is thus firmly established in the hearts of the people, especially of the Germans; although in other nations, too, everyone who judges honestly, that is, is removed from everything that can corrupt a man's judgment, is least displeased with Luther. Everyone confesses that he has improved from his books, although perhaps one and the other can be justly left out. We know how the Germans are minded. We see that the Bohemians have been obdurate for so many years, and that the neighboring countries are not very far removed from such a mob. We hear daily the serious complaints of many who say that they could no longer bear the yoke of the Roman see, which they attribute perhaps not so much to the pope as to those who abuse the pope's power for their tyranny.

(11) Now, if it is all done in a violent and hostile way, anyone who is wise will easily see what a noise it will make.

1) Jos. Hall refers to this saying as that of Erasmus, thus he would be the author of this thought. (Walch.)

since we often see that in the world from a small beginning the most harmful disagreements have arisen. It also seems that the world, tired of the 1) old and too sophisticated theology, has a thirst for the sweet springs of the evangelical doctrine, and it can be seen that it will break in by force if the door is not opened, so that if one is not completely satisfied with Luther, one must at least put the sophisticated theology on a new and better foot.

12. Since the matter has had an evil origin, and it seems to have been provided for on both sides; first, on the side of those who have stirred up Luther's spirit with their ungodly irritations, and then soon embittered him more and more with hostile and grim cries; especially since it seems that they are seeking their own self-interest with this, since, on the other hand, such suspicion does not cling at all to Luther, who is content with his bad condition: it is clear that nothing would be more useful than for this matter to be settled and compared by people who are completely free of all suspicion. It is true that the decision on matters of faith belongs primarily to the Roman Pontiff, and he is not to be deprived of this right; however, for the sake of the common good, he will willingly entrust this matter to other righteously learned and honest pious men, on whom no suspicion can fall, either that they want to court the Roman Pontiff against the evangelical truth out of fear or hope, or that they hold the opposite view out of human partiality. Such arbitrators can be suggested by three kings who are also free of all suspicion, each from his own nation, namely the Emperor Carl, the King of England, and the King of Hungary. What they will say, after a diligent perusal of Luther's writings and a present interrogation of him, can be the end of the matter.
